"My husband was the founder of the Berlin Free-love Institution. He has been a believer in that free-love doctrine for about three years. A year ago or more he left home, ostensibly upon business, but he only roamed around in search of free-love companions, having found a small number of which, he took them to Berlin and founded the infamous den of lusts which now exists there. He left me with three little children to provide for, and nothing to do it with but my hands. I have stood for four days in the week over the wash-tub, laboring until my strength has many a time given way entirely, for the sake of a little money with which to feed my children."

In a speech at the Spiritual Convention, at Ravenna, Ohio, July 4th and 5th, 1857, Mrs. Lewis said:—

"To confine her to love one man was an abridgment of her rights. . . . Although she had one husband in Cleveland, she considered herself married to the whole human race. All men were her husbands, and she had an undying love for them. What business is it to the world whether one man is the father of my children, or ten men are! I have a right to say who shall be the father of my offspring."

A few years since a remarkable book appeared, called the "Educator." It is an octavo volume of 680 pp., which consists of instruction purporting to come from the higher order of spirits, and was given through the medium of one known as the Rev. John Spear. The book was edited by Mr. A. E. Newton, of Boston, who was editor of the Spiritual Age. This Mr. Spear became the father of an illegitimate child, by the direction of the spirits. The following defense of the conduct of the parties appeared on the editorial page of the Spiritual Telegraph, Dec. 18th, 1858, edited and published by Mr. Charles Partridge, of New York, though the editor himself did not approve of the course of Mr. Faber. The defense reads as follows:—

"It is reserved for this our day, under the inspiration of the Spirit-world, for a quiet, capable, retiring woman, to rise up in the dignity of her womanhood, and declare in the face of her oppressors and a scowling world, I will be free . . . And no man, or set of men, no church, no state, shall withhold from me the realization of that purest of all aspirations inherent in every true woman, the right to re-beget myself, when, and by whom, and under such circumstances, as to me seems fit and best."

THE APOCALYPSE.

Dr. Seiss, of Philadelphia, the Editor of the "Prophetic Times," is most deeply interested in the evidences that show the immediate second coming of Christ, and has commenced a course of lectures on the Apocalypse, which are heard by his intelligent congregation with special interest. He has given four lectures, which cover the first chapter. He gives a revised translation of the original text. These four lectures are now published in a pamphlet of about four hundred pages. We have never seen any work on the subject that we like so well.

The price is 50 cts. It can be obtained by addressing "Prophetic Times," Box 2245, Philadelphia, Pa.

"THE CHRISTIAN."—Bro. Hastings has shown us the first number of "The Christian," his tract paper, with which we are much pleased. We trust much good will be accomplished by its circulation.

THE SYRIAC NEW TESTAMENT.—We can fill no more orders for this work at present. The publisher will print no more until the high price of paper comes down.

SABBATH SCHOOLS.

Dear brethren and sisters:—I rejoice in spirit that there is a way in which I can speak to thousands, yes, tens of thousands. For a long time it has been the desire of my heart to in some way join the great congregation who, though personally scattered, are yet in concert labor.

For the past eight years I have, as far as opportunity and means permitted, been engaged in the blessed work of Sabbath School classes. O! how I love that work. How many miles have I walked and obscure places visited, to take by the hand some little child to lead to the dear Sabbath School. In a late number of the Crisis I read with much pleasure an article with reference to more interest in Sabbath Schools among the Advent churches. Christian friends, that is the mainspring of church organization. If the Bible is made to the dear children the living water,—if they are led to that living water,—if the faithful teacher gives them the cup of living water, it will spring up into everlasting life. O that I could tell you my experience. But why tell you? you all know the power of the sword of the Spirit, which is the word of God—the incorruptible seed, which liveth and abideth for ever.

It was this word of which we were born into the truth. Well do I remember the scriptures which I learned when a little girl. Truly they have been to me living waters, ever springing up into life. How precious they have been and are now to me, and I long to spend all my time in this one employment, to feed the lambs with the sincere milk of the word. Happy shall I be if in God's providence the way should be open to enter a field that shall employ my week days as well as Sabbaths.

Happy am I that I can speak through a messenger sheet to you all, dear brethren and sisters. Feed the lambs! Feed them with the bread of life. Do not depend on question books in your classes, but give to each young mind at least one text from the holy Bible to learn and repeat to you. It is my present practice; and I find it so far excels my former practice of talking a great deal myself before my class, as the sun shining in his strength excels the cold stars that borrow their light. Give them the glorious sunshine, beaming directly upon them.

When I take my Bible and sit down to make selections (which I write on a slip of paper for each one), I am at a loss to know what to choose from the guest table so bountifully spread. O, shall I forget till memory fades the glow on the face and in the speaking eyes of two of my little class, as they recite passages from the Gospel by St. John, and from the Revelations? No, it is an incorruptible seed, that liveth and abideth for ever. I thank my Father that he has so honored me as to stand and teach them the knowledge of Jesus Christ—his glorious gospel to the little ones.

Dear Sabbath School teachers, day school teachers, missionaries, all who teach,—I pray you teach the pure word of truth. Speak as the oracles of God, and you cannot fail. "In the morning sow thy seed, and in the evening withhold not thy hand." Work while the day lasteth. "Blessing, and honor, and glory, and power, be unto Him who sitteth upon the throne, and unto the Lamb, for ever and ever."

AT THE DOOR.

The evidence of our Lord's soon coming to take away his waiting, ready "BRIDE" is becoming clearer and more certain. The evidence we have shining from the seven-hilled city in Rome ought to make the lovers of truth lift up their heads and rejoice. Soon Babylon will go down like a mighty mill-stone in the sea, to rise no more. And I know not why it may not take place in 1866!

Our only safety is to be ready now and stay ready till our Lord comes. It cannot be long. The waters are becoming more rough, but with the help of the Lord I am trying to keep my bark headed up stream, gaining a [illegible]

THE WANDERERS.

Little Mary, whose photographs are being sent to brethren and sisters, is about eleven years old. Her mother and three children, and another woman with two children, occupied the same room in an old house on Bedford St. Such bedding as they have at command is laid upon the floor, and there the two mothers and five children slept, except when the cold weather prevented. A little window in a door lighted the room. The sides of the room were not lathed or plastered. Boards whitewashed, with laths nailed over the seams, constituted the walls, and furnished the only protection from the cold. I think that there are neither clapboards or shingles on the outside of the portion of the house they occupy. Mary's mother is sickly, while the other mother is lazy.

The photograph of Mary, in her old garb, looks considerably better than the "original," as far as clothing is concerned. We did not select her as a bad specimen. We have found boys and girls in a condition unfit to photograph. They were half naked. Little Mary had nothing but her little dirty, striped, thin black dress to cover her. The shawl, boots and hood belonged to her mother, and they were in a woful condition; but in the photograph they look quite nice. We have wondered that Mary did not freeze to death, as well as many others, during the cold weather of this winter.

We have not yet obtained a house for our children, but they are in good quarters, and well cared for. Thus the Lord has not left nor forsaken us. Prejudice against colored people is very strong in this city; hence the difficulty of getting a house; but we believe that the Lord will open a door for us in due time. Pray for us. Yours, in the highways and hedges,

F. H. BURBANK.

BEWARE OF IMPOSTORS!

Many of our churches have no shepherds, and are exposed to every wolf that is stealing around, "creeping into houses," etc., who pretend to believe in the Second Advent, and are doing nothing but getting up secret meetings, especially among the women. These are impostors. Holiness is their theme. When this class get a little community together under false pretences, they are then prepared to pull the mesmeric wires, and the effect is to denounce every body else and preach against preaching, etc.

Now this class of wolves have good access to our people, as some of them are so fond of new things; they are unstable, and easily led away. For twenty-three years I have been acquainted with this deception, and seen it always work destruction. If it begins in the Spirit, it ends in the flesh.

I have three or four times come in contact with these influences, carried on by one Noah Bailey, who makes it his business to gather such a class. I once felt it duty, after hearing a brother's story about Bailey's conduct, to get a warrant for vagrancy, and thus break up his nest. I understand he is gathering another community in Groton, Mass., and is floating around in Boston, also in Norway and other places, to gather enough together to support him.

Now I warn my friends of this impostor, for I have all the evidence I want to convince me of these facts. Surely we are in the perils of the "last days."

THE REASONS WHY.

BRO. GRANT:—In reply to questions, I will simply say: I have united with the Baptists,

1. Because I love them.
2. They love me.
3. They are kind and good to me.
4. They are, I think, in Gospel order.
5. I wish to be somewhere.
6. I can be more useful with them than with others, on the whole.
7. I can not and I will not spend my time in riding "hobbies."

I am very happy where I am. I am seeing scores and hundreds of souls converted to God this winter.

The Baptists said nothing to me of a change of my views; and I do not hear any complaint; and I have not changed them!

I am waiting for the Lord from heaven daily, and am seeking to get people ready for the event. God is with me.

Let me caution my talkative friends against looking through "green glasses."

THE TWO WITNESSES.

A FEW POINTS.

1. Is Paris or France "that great city which is spiritually," or by the Holy Spirit, "called Sodom and Egypt"? If so, where is it so called?

2. Is Paris the city "where also our Lord was crucified" literally? If so, when?

3. If our Lord was only crucified there figuratively in the persons of his children, has he not been thus crucified in a dozen different cities?

4. Is there any city which is called "Sodom" by the Holy Spirit, "where also our Lord was crucified"? (See Isa. 1: 10.)

5. If the "two witnesses" are the Old and New Testaments, why are there not twenty witnesses, or as many as there are different books in the Old and New Testaments?

6. If the Old and New Testaments have had power to turn the waters into blood, to smite the earth with all plagues, and to emit fire to consume those that hurt them, when did they ever exercise that power?

7. If the Old and New Testaments had "finished their testimony," what matter was it if they were slain, since the only object of their existence would seem to have been answered?

8. If the Old and New Testaments had "finished their testimony" at the time of the French Revolution, how comes it to pass that since that time more than ten times as many Bibles have been published as in all the ages before, and that the Bible is now issued in five times as many tongues as ever it was issued in before "the two witnesses" had "finished their testimony"?

9. When did the Spirit of life from God leave the Old and New Testaments, so that it needed to enter "into them" again?

10. If this whole prophecy in Rev. 11 is plainly fulfilled, why have Protestant commentators half a dozen different applications of it?

I ask for information.

Correspondence.

From Bro. D. Grant.

BRO. GRANT:—"They that feared the Lord spake often one to another," and as this, next to prayer, is the most pleasing duty a christian can engage in, we wish through the Crisis to speak a few words to our absent friends.

In reviewing the history of our little Zion, for the past year, we are neither surprised nor discouraged at the apparent smallness of our progress; but we are filled with gratitude to God that we exist at all. We are convinced that if God, through his Spirit, ever visited and sustained his church on earth, he has been with us.

The meek and the humble have in all ages been the instruments in God's hand of calling men to repentance. It is so with us here;—we have none of the great, the learned, or the wealthy ones of this world with us, but we have what is far better; although poor in this world's goods, we are rich in faith, and in the love of our Master, Jesus Christ.

Two years ago, when Bro. Grant proclaimed in this city the speedy coming of Jesus Christ, and life eternal through his resurrection, he did not find his supporters amongst the wealthy or learned; the large and popular churches were not placed at his command; their pastors did not invite him to sound the glad tidings to their congregations. Oh, no! on the contrary, they said, "We have found this man a pestilent fellow," and must put him down.

This opposition to the truth came not from the world, but from the (apparent) church of Christ, and so has it continued. We as a church have suffered, perhaps, as much petty persecution as can fall to the lot of christians in these latter days. Still we exist. Obscure and humble men and women, without any personal influence whatever, we have, through the power of God, been enabled to sound the news of the coming kingdom throughout the length and breadth of this great and benighted city, and many have heard and believed. Without wealth, we have never felt want, but have always had enough and to spare,—a little for the cause of the Lord; without learning, yet we have always been able to give a good reason for the hope that is in us.

Thus do we recognize the dealings of our God with us, and have learned to put our trust in his precious words,—"Fear not, little flock, for it is your Father's good pleasure to give you the kingdom."

But we have not been left altogether without encouragement. The seed sown is daily springing up into life. The mist that has so long hid the precious doctrine of our Lord's speedy return is being gradually lifted up, and the sight beyond hath cheered and comforted many a weary soul. Some years ago, we never heard of ministers speaking on Christ's second advent. Now we have had this winter, already, two ministers of the gospel lecturing on that subject; both, we believe, fully endorsing the Bible doctrine of the personal coming and reign of our Savior on this earth. Praise the Lord! the work is going on. "Cast thy bread upon the waters, for thou shalt find it after many days." We love to read and muse upon this passage; we think it was written for us.

Amid all the trials that daily beset us, amid all the reproach that has been cast upon us, it consoles and encourages us when we see that our labor has not been in vain, and that God seems to have used us as instruments in proclaiming the truth as it is in Jesus. Still we must keep watching and praying, and laboring in the Lord's vineyard. "The night cometh when no man can work." The Lord help us to keep faithful unto the end.

The enemy, to a great extent, has ceased his outward demonstrations of war. We are no longer attacked from without as infidels; we are no longer pointed to on the street as we pass along as soulless men, and laughed at by the ignorant and wicked. Nevertheless, the enemy sleeps not. He has only changed his base. Instead of attacking us from without, he has insidiously taken ground in our very midst. This he has done by introducing the idea that experience and conference meetings are not in accordance with the Scriptures; that a brother cannot stand up in a meeting and show his love for God and his cause by declaring what the Lord has done for him, without he is able to expound Scripture. Where, we would ask, can we find a place better adapted to speak of the Lord's goodness, than in a company of his saints? Some of us cannot expound Scripture, but we can testify from the heart how merciful, how gracious, and long-suffering, the Lord has been to us. Must we be silent?

We do think the enemy could not have employed any stronger means of scattering our little Zion, of destroying our usefulness, and ultimately getting the victory over us. Already have we observed with sorrow, painful, heartfelt sorrow, the effect this doctrine has had upon one of our dearest brethren in the Lord. This brother, through his spoken testimony and experience, has contributed more to our practical christian knowledge, and strengthened and encouraged us more to persevere in the way of the Lord, than we ever received from any preached sermon listened to. This brother, who was once the life of our prayer and conference meetings, is now silent in the church. Pray for us, brethren, that the Spirit of the Lord may guide us in all things. We feel, under the circumstances, that we need the prayers of all our Father's children.

That faithful servant of the Lord, Sister Mussey, began a second term of meetings with us on the 22d of last December, and still continues with us. She is much spoken of by all who have listened to her, and we have no doubt great good will result from her labors. Her simplicity of manners, her earnest piety and faithfulness in the service of the Lord, have endeared her to every brother and sister in the church. May the Lord reward her, and have her in his holy keeping.

May we grow in grace, and in the knowledge of our Lord and Savior, Jesus Christ.—Amen. Yours in the Lord, D. GRANT.

Montreal, C. E., Jan. 11th, 1866.

From Bro. I. K. Lombard.

BRO. GRANT:—I have to confess that I have been too much engaged in the things of this world for the last eight months of the year just closed. I have been overcharged, and have felt it too. I have not been laboring for my own benefit neither, but for my parents. In the time I have often been in perplexity as to duty. Sometimes I have resolved to break away as from bondage. At other times I have thought it better to labor on with my hands, mostly, preaching on Sundays, for another year, hoping then to have release. With such an experience my labors the past season have been few and faint. I have scarcely written for the paper for nine months. I fear that I have been little better than a blank in the cause of God in this time. But I am resolved to break away from such fetters, and give myself wholly to the work of God. I dare not waste more time in this way. It is too late in this world's history to be dallying thus. The perils of the last days are upon us. And while they are ensnaring the careless on every hand, the masses in the church are singing the syren song of "a good time coming." The men of the world are many of them wondering at the fearful state of things, and dreading the probable developments of the future.

In this fearful crisis—this day of decision, I cannot be an idle spectator. I cannot rest silent amidst all this indifference to surrounding danger. I cannot see the storm approaching, and yet silently acquiesce in the general unbelief in relation to its results. I must raise a warning voice. I must alarm the careless, admonish the froward, instruct the ignorant, support the weak, comfort the afflicted, and help the needy as the Lord shall assist. I expect, however, that but few will hear, while the many will refuse. I look for unbelief and opposition every where. According to the word, I can expect nothing else. They will hate God's message of love. They will treat with disdain his offers of mercy. They will defy the threatening storm, and raise their puny arm against the power of the Almighty. But how sad a picture does human nature betray by such treatment of divine things! What a poor figure does human wisdom make in its treatment of these last day perils! How constantly baffled by its own confusions, and lost in its own mazes! How wicked is unbelief, and how fearful in its results! How many are its victims, and how strange the spell that binds them!

O for a display of God's power and mercy in an outpouring of the Holy Spirit among us in these perilous times. Yours waiting for the Lord, I. K. LOMBARD.

From Sr. A. P. Morrill.

Beloved Brethren and Sisters in Christ:—My heart overflows with gratitude to my heavenly Father, that there is yet remaining a remnant seeking for holiness of heart and life, in the true sense of the word. My heart of love entwines around all such. I often rejoice that I can read the Word for myself, and understand it according to the teachings of the Spirit, which Jesus said he would send, and the apostle says it shall teach us all things. It has taught me that it is something more than a bare form or profession to be truly a child of God, a fit temple for the Holy Ghost to dwell in. We may talk about being holy, write about it, sing about it, and pray over it, and still not be what the word of God requires we must be in order to be all ready when Jesus comes, with all the heavenly host, to call the sleeping millions from their dusty beds, and to change the ready living, and be caught up to meet him in the air, and so forever be with the Lord.

O, how my heart is made sad (and I weep in secret places), to see those around me dreaming that God is coming to change these vile, corrupt natures of ours. But no, this is not as I understand the word. The apostle says, "We have exceeding great and precious promises, whereby we may become partakers of the divine nature, putting off the old man with his deeds, and putting on the new man, which is Christ formed in you the hope of glory." And "being risen with Christ," we shall "seek those things that are above, where Christ sitteth," etc. And also have our conversation in from whence we look for our Savior. "Not only so, but having these promises, let us cleanse ourselves from all filthiness of the flesh and the spirit, perfecting holiness in the fear of the Lord." O, brethren and sisters, it is required of us to be holy and perfect, as our Father in heaven is perfect, in order to be ready. For they that were ready went into the marriage supper of the Lamb.

Yes, this is as I understand the Scriptures, and I do not think the standard has been lowered one jot or tittle to suit my one's convenience or hobby; and oftentimes, while casting my eye around and within, I am led to exclaim, Who, then, can be saved? But thanks to our Father in heaven for the provisions made in the gospel for those who are truly laboring for the rest that remains for the people of God. Yes, the child of God may grow in grace, and in the knowledge of Christ his Savior, traveling on from one degree of grace and glory to another, until we become perfect men and women in the Lord. This is the privilege, and it is the duty, of every believer in the religion of Jesus.

Brethren and sisters, there is an example for us to follow—a perfect rule for us to walk by, so that we need not walk in darkness, nor grope our way along here half-hearted, hardly knowing where we are. I do pray the Lord to harness his humble children anew for the work of these last moments. I do believe with all my soul that the word of God, and the signs of the times, proclaim in thunder tones Jesus near; yes, very near, and what is done for ourselves, or for this poor world, must be done soon; and my cry is often, Lord, what wilt thou have me to do? I have been striving for the kingdom, amid all the darkness that surrounds me,—no meetings to go to of like precious faith,—but I expect, if faithful, to meet all my Father's family soon, in the kingdom of God.

Your sister in Christ, A. P. MORRILL.

From Sr. I. Stevens.

BRO. GRANT:—Through the goodness of God I still live and enjoy the blessed hope of the gospel. How cheering to the christian is the hope of soon seeing Jesus and being made like him. I have great reason to praise the Lord that I ever heard the sound of this gospel of the kingdom. The sound of "home" seems sweet to me. I love to think that we are almost there. And my heart goes out for those that do not believe this good news of the kingdom, that they might know the truth and be made free, for "the truth shall make them free."

I have not forgotten those practical sermons I heard at the conference at N. Norway, nor ever shall. I there resolved, by the help of God, that I would not be a forgetful hearer, but a doer of the word; but I fail in many points. I never realized until I attended that conference how straight the path is marked out for the christian to walk, to inherit eternal life; yet I mean to press on and persevere unto the end, and at last meet you in the kingdom. That conference was truly a blessed season to me, one that will long be remembered, and not only by me but by others who had the privilege of being present. How often in our little prayer meetings have allusions been made to that meeting and the good we there received.

There are a few here at East Hebron who love Jesus, his appearing, and his people, and who love to hear his word preached; but we have had preaching but twice since last Sept. Bro. Partridge preached very unexpectedly to us one evening, the first of June. It was truly refreshing to those who heard it,—a feast of fat things; it reminded us of what Christ told Peter when he asked him, "Lovest thou me?" when he said unto him, "Feed my sheep." We felt that we had been fed with gospel truth.

We love the Crisis more than ever; living as we do so far from others of like precious faith, and having little or no preaching, we know how to prize it. I love the paper so well that I send you ——, to help pay for some of the poor who love to read it but can not pay for it. Remember us here at East Hebron, that when Christ shall come he will say to us, "Come, ye blessed of my Father." Your Sr. in Christ, IRENE STEVENS.

From Bro. N. B. McMurphy.

"Fear not, little flock; it is your Father's good pleasure to give you the kingdom."

What a blessed hope is ours. What a glorious prospect lies ahead for the cheer and comfort of the true and faithful christian while passing through the trials and perils of these last days, while the enemy is using all the arts and powers within his reach to kill and destroy every thing that is good. Dear children of the living God, let us strive with all our might to be faithful and fight our way through to the kingdom of the blessed Jesus, that happy land promised to the faithful followers of the Lamb.

Poor wanderer and sinner, what are your prospects in that day of wrath which is soon to be poured out on a wicked world? Oh! look about you, turn from evil ways now, before the Spirit takes its everlasting flight from you. A few more warnings and all is over with you. Oh! be wise, and accept the great salvation.

Cheer up, dear children of the Lord, and may we all soon meet in the kingdom of our blessed Master. Yours looking and waiting.

Gilmanton, N. H. N. B. MCMURPHY.

From Sr. A. M. Beach.

BROTHERS AND SISTERS:—Realizing that the time is short in which we shall have an opportunity to labor for the Lord, let us not forget the assembling of ourselves together on the Lord's day, and offer our united petitions that he will protect us in this day of peril, and that he will strengthen our feeble efforts. Let us not get discouraged because our numbers are few. We have only to put forth the more effort to roll on the car of salvation. Wait a little longer, and He that is to come will come, and will not tarry. Let us keep a vigilant watch for the morning's dawn. It is but a little in the distance. The time has now come when we must look well to our own ways, or the eventful day will overtake us as a thief. AMARET M. BEACH.

Pleasant Valley, Ct.

From Bro. S. Dockum.

Dear brothers and sisters in the Lord:—How blessed is the thought of the soon coming kingdom of our Lord and Master. How it should encourage us to be faithful in every good word and work. How humble we ought to be, and how important it is that we should so live before the world that they may know by our daily walk we are on the Lord's side, and are still resolved in these last days to follow on to know Him more and more, whom to know aright is eternal life. Brothers and sisters, sometimes I feel to rejoice, and long for the time to come, when He whose right it is shall come and reign King of kings and Lord of lords.

Again I am sorrowful, as I have friends and loved ones who are out of Christ. I want them saved from that storm that is just approaching. I have two to go with, thank the Lord for that; and this animates and strengthens me to pray for the rest. Dear children, let us pray more fervently for our loved ones that are unsaved. Can it be possible that one of them will be left out? Solemn thought! The end of all things is at hand, and what is to be done must be done quickly. And may God help us to discharge all our duties in his fear, at home and every where, as we have opportunity; take the Word for the man of our counsel, and live so that we may claim those blessed promises therein.

This is a good way. The light shines more and more, and I believe it will to the "perfect day." Although it has been but a short time since I embraced this Advent truth, yet I thank the Lord that he has opened my eyes to see and believe the Bible truth; for, like others, I do believe we are living down in the end of time. What manner of persons ought we to be in all holy conversation and godliness, looking for the appearing of our Lord and Savior Jesus Christ. Some believe he will come this year; who will dare to say he will not? I want to bring it near, live every day as though it was the last day, for we know not what a day may bring forth. Let us be awake, and watch, lest when He comes he will find some of us sleeping, or contending about those things that will not be pleasing in his sight.

Praise the Lord that we have got most through. Lord, help us to shine as lights in the world, endure to the end, and when the Chief Shepherd shall appear, give us a crown of life that fadeth not away. Yours in hope of eternal life, S. DOCKUM.

South Poland, Me.

From Bro. C. J. Deyo.

BRO. GRANT:—I wish to say, for the encouragement of your readers, that we are having excellent meetings in this place. They have been in progress only one week, and seven have found the Savior. Backsliders are returning to their Father's house. Last evening twenty-five came forward for prayers, and confessed their determination to start for the kingdom, and the good work still goes on.

"Praise God from whom all blessings flow."

Brethren in Christ, let us labor earnestly till the Master appear. Your Bro. expecting eternal life when Jesus comes,

Linnville, Ill., Feb. 6th. C. J. DEYO.

BRO. JOHN A. BEST, of Pittsburg, Penn., wishes to give notice that he hopes in a short time to be prepared to print a series of tracts for free distribution, to rich and poor; and he invites any in that vicinity or elsewhere who have anything, pointed, definite and clear on the near coming of Jesus, the destruction of the wicked, the kingdom of God, and signs of the times, worthy of publication in tract form, to write to him, as above.

BRO. C. H. SWEET writes:—"The cause of Christ is upon the rise here in this place. Last evening, in our little social gathering, we resolved to go to work for the salvation of souls, and I believe the good Lord will bless us in our efforts. Pray for us."

Obituaries.

GOVE. Died in Whitefield, N. H., Feb. 10th, 1860, Anna Gove, wife of John M. Gove, aged seventy-six years, four months, and thirteen days.

Sister Gove was one of the choice ones of earth, beloved by all who knew her, a faithful member in the church, always at her post, a christian at home, or wherever she was. The Bible was her constant companion. She was always ready to give a word of comfort to any one in distress, and to administer to their wants. We cannot say too much in her praise. She has left a husband, several children, a large number of grand-children, and many friends to mourn for her. Sister Gove sleeps in Jesus, a blessed sleep.

She, with Bro. Gove, embraced the Advent faith when it first began to be preached by Bro. Miller. They have always been sound in the faith. Sister Gove has been very feeble for a number of years past. She had a paralytic shock that affected her speech so that she could not talk much for more than a year before she died, but, thank God, she will awake and sing soon on the other shore. May God bless the mourning friends.

Bro. J. Couch preached a discourse on the funeral occasion, from 1 Thes. 4: 18,—"Wherefore, comfort one another with these words."

J. A. CLEAVELAND.

MILLER. Fell asleep in Jesus, at Philadelphia, Dec. 19th, 1865, after a short but very severe illness, Anna M. Miller, daughter of Cyrus and Christianna Miller, in the thirty-third year of her age.

Sister Anna was an ardent lover of the christian's blessed home, and has long enjoyed its holy comfort. When a little girl, in the early days of Adventism, she became interested in the speedy coming of Christ, and embraced him as her only hope of future life and immortality. In this faith she continued until her death.

Sister Anna was beloved by all who knew her. She was naturally amiable and the grace of God made her more lovely. She leaves a dear father, mother, and brothers to mourn her loss, but they sorrow not as those who have no hope, for they have the blessed hope that when Jesus comes to gather his saints from the land of the enemy she will be of the number.

Many God sanctify the affliction to the good of the family, knowing that all things work together for good to those who fear God. May great grace rest upon the dear parents to comfort them in the hour of their affliction and trial.

O Lord, hasten the day when the graves shall be opened, and the saints raised to immortality and eternal life.

"Death itself shall then be vanquished,
And his sting shall be withdrawn;
Shout with gladness, all ye ransomed,
Hail with joy the rising morn."

EMMA KELLUM.

KEYSAR. Died in Pittsburgh, N. H., Dec. 10th, of diphtheria, after an illness of four days, Edmund C. Keysar, aged twenty years, one month, and eight days.

He was gifted with a rare intellect, possessed a kind and amiable disposition, and was only known to be loved. He bore his sufferings with patience and christian meekness. He has left a mother, brothers and sisters, and a large circle of friends to mourn his loss.

Ah, little thought we, when of late
We met his gentle eye,
Beaming with love and happiness,
That he so soon must die.

How could we deem that sunny brow,
Which knew no shade of gloom,
Would early thus be wrapt within
The shadow of the tomb?

Upon our lips his farewell kiss
Seems lingering soft and warm;
Though cold in the embrace of death
Now sleeps his lovely form.

His dying accents, thrilled with love,
Are sounding in our ears;
And in our hearts his image dear
Has been embalmed in tears.

O, may a heavenly influence sooth
These hearts by anguish riven,
Till all shall re-united be,
A family in heaven.

A SISTER.

PARKER. Fell asleep in Jesus, in Granville, N. S., Dec. 12th, 1865, of apoplexy, after a short illness of some forty hours, Bro. Stephen Parker, aged seventy-six years and nine months.

Bro. Parker embraced the Advent doctrine about twenty years ago, but not the definite time, as he saw prophecies to be fulfilled that would take a number of years to accomplish. He believed the Lord would come about this time. He was a believer in the sleep of the dead and the destruction of the wicked. He had quite an understanding of the prophecies. It seemed to be his delight to talk on the Bible. He loved to entertain strangers. I have often enjoyed his hospitalities, and have lost one of my best friends. He leaves four sons and two daughters to mourn his loss.

May this affliction be sanctified to the children and all the friends, and they in the morning of the resurrection be prepared to meet in God's everlasting kingdom.

The funeral was attended by the writer, at the Methodist house at the ferry, who endeavored to comfort the mourners from John 11: 21-6.

WM. M. INGHAM.

BRANNICK. Died, in Pittsford, Butler County, Iowa, Nov. 15th, 1865, of consumption, Fremont, son of Francis and Alzina Brannick, aged one year, eight months, and ten days.

Our Monty sleeps a peaceful sleep,
Safe from the woes and ills of life;
O'er him a watch our Savior 'll keep,
Till he shall come and bid him rise.
Then, bursting forth from death's embrace,
Triumphant o'er the grave he'll rise,
To meet the Savior face to face,
And join the blood-washed in the skies.
Our darling boy we then shall greet,
Immortal made, no more we'll sigh;
Our sufferings past, our joys complete,
No more to grieve, no more to die.

ALZINA BRANNICK.

DUNNING. Died in Pittsford, Butler Co., Iowa, Dec. 30th, 1865, from the effects of rheumatism and numb palsy, Loen J. Dunning, aged seventy years.

Father Dunning made a public profession of faith in Christ, and united with the people of God in early life; but amid the pressing cares, trials, and temptations of mortal life, he fell in a measure from his steadfastness in the faith, but still lived a life of usefulness, in pecuniary matters, with his fellow creatures, and in his last declining days, while crippled with sore disease, he said he felt that the Savior of sinners was his only hope and sure trust. May the rich, abounding grace of God be abundantly given to the aged christian companion and the five surviving children, to sustain them in their affliction, and may they all be led to a full and complete preparation to meet their Lord in peace when the last loud trumpet shall sound to call them and their deceased friends to the judgment.

Words of comfort were addressed to them by the writer, from Eccl. 12: 13. H. H. JANES.

TIFFANY. After a pilgrimage in this vale of tears of more than fourscore and three years, my beloved father, Jonathan Tiffany, of Hartford, Ct., on the morning of Dec. 12th, 1865, quietly fell on sleep, and was gathered to his fathers.

For more than forty years he was identified with the people of God, and for a long time had been a believer in and lover of the great truths of the gospel of the kingdom, and the near coming of the Savior to give life to his people and reign on the earth.

He rests in hope, and awaits a resurrection to life eternal, through Jesus Christ, at the last day.

Summary of News.

FOREIGN.

Liverpool, January 31st.

Government has issued another proclamation offering £2300 for Stephens' capture. An additional seizure of fifty rifles and bayonets had been made at Dundalk.

The Emperor and Empress of Austria are visiting Pesth. They were enthusiastically received.

The Spanish Ministry have assented to the introduction of a bill in the Senate in favor of the Pope's temporal power.

Intelligence from Lima announces that diplomatic relations are interrupted between Spain and Peru.

ITALY.—The dream of national unity which has filled the minds of the Italian people of late years, and at times has seemed on the point of being realized, has lately received a severe shock. They have looked to Victor Emmanuel as the regenerator of their country, and the man who should extend the national banner over the Papal States and Venetia, as well as over Lombardy and Naples. So long as the Papal States separate free Italy into two sections, and Venetia remains under the hated Austrian rule, Italy will be a country of fragments, and no true nationality can exist. The annexation of these two provinces to Victor Emmanuel's kingdom, therefore, is the ruling passion of Italians. Garibaldi, the apostle of the people, has held it up as the grand consummation of Italian glory, and the French Emperor has with difficulty restrained Victor Emmanuel from leading his armies to Rome and Venice. To this end the subjects of that prince have encouraged the formation of a great army, and borne the heaviest burdens of taxation. They have seen the national debt increasing at a terrible ratio, while taxes multiplied on every hand, but the assurance that a great army was being raised and organized has reconciled them. If only all Italy should be free and united, they were willing to submit to any sacrifice. Thus they have hoped and endured, only to be told recently by Victor Emmanuel's ministers that the army, which they fondly believed was to release their brethren of Venetia and the Papal States from the sway of obnoxious rulers, must be reduced in order to avert financial ruin. The weapon that was to make Italy a powerful nation, with the Eternal City for its seat of power, slips from their grasp. Italian "unity," for six years their darling passion, has proved only a delusion and snare, and they are caught in the meshes of a crushing system of taxation. They are distressed and querulous, and no wonder. An uncertain future is their only hope.—Journal, 16th.

DOMESTIC.

New York, Feb. 15. A Havana letter of the 7th inst. says the city of Mexico papers contain full accounts of the capture of Bagdad, and express the hope that the United States will make reparation, and thus remove all necessity of a declaration of war.

Kansas City, Mo., Feb. 15. The bank at Liberty, Clay Co., Mo., was robbed Tuesday afternoon of $72,000 under the following circumstances: Twelve men entered the town about two o'clock, three of whom guarded the suburbs; the other nine went to the Clay County Savings Association; seven guarded the outside of the building, while the other two entered and presented cocked revolvers at the heads of Mr. Bond, the cashier, and his son, forced them into the vault, and compelled them to deliver up all the money in the bank. As the robbers were leaving, Mr. Bond thrust his head out of a window and gave the alarm. A boy named Wymoon repeated the alarm, and was shot five times and instantly killed by the robbers, who mounted their horses and escaped.

New York, Feb. 17. A Vera Cruz letter of the 1st inst. states that there is great activity in French military affairs at Vera Cruz, but not of a character to indicate an early evacuation of the country by Europeans. French troops in large numbers were arriving at Vera Cruz from the interior and embarking on transports. They were not, however, bound for France, but, it was understood, for the defense of Tampico, which was seriously threatened by the Republicans, and it was even intimated that they were intended for frontier service against both the Republicans and the United States.

Large quantities of military stores were still arriving at Vera Cruz from France and were being sent into the interior.

REVIVAL AT NASHUA, N. H.—The Newburyport Herald reports that the union meetings of the evangelical churches of Nashua, which were commenced on the first of January, to continue one week, are still being held, their protraction having been signalized by many conversions. Evening after evening the churches are crowded, and hundreds are obliged to turn away for want of standing room. The meetings are intensely interesting, and numbers, varying from thirty to fifty, rise for prayers nightly. The school rooms are scenes of prayer meetings, and in two instances nearly every scholar has been converted. The largest number of conversions are at the Lowell street M. E. church, numbering fifty-six, while the others vary from four to thirty each. There is not the usual amount of excitement attendant upon such occasions, but all seem to be calm and sincere.

☞ The Newburyport Herald says:—"Some of the churches in this city are now holding extra religious meetings, and in the several churches perhaps fifty persons have recently professed conversion, and pledged themselves publicly to lead new lives."

☞ Persons under conviction for infamous crimes are to be excluded from the ballot boxes.

ITEMS.

☞ The last collection of Peter's Pence in France brought a rich harvest to the Holy See. In Paris the collection amounted on an average to ten thousand francs in each parish, and at Orleans Archbishop Dupanloup personally collected upwards of twelve thousand francs.

☞ The submarine telegraphic cable laid down by the French Government between Leghorn and Corsica is now open for the service of the public. The charge for a dispatch of twenty words between France and Corsica by that line is three francs.

☞ A French bishop said lately in a sermon—"Let women remember, while putting on profuse and expensive attire, how narrow are the gates of Paradise."

☞ Men are accountable for their actions; but I shall have to render an account for my thoughts. They are not only the foundations of my work, but of my life.—Joubert.

☞ It is reported that at the exhibition of 1867 the Emperor himself will be an exhibitor. He will exhibit some model lodging houses for working men.

☞ In the University at Middletown, Conn., all the students have been converted but six. Never was such a work known in that institution.

Conference.

The church at Casco, Me., purpose to hold a Conference at the Union Chapel, commencing Feb. 22d, to continue over the following Lord's day. Brethren and sisters wishing to come may stop on Mayberry Hill, at any of the Mayberry's, or with J. Sands, or E. Dyer, at the village, S. Leach, S. Sylvester, or Wm. Hodgdon. We hope to have a good meeting. If we would, we must come praying, and be ready to work. Bro. J. Couch is engaged to come, and other laborers are invited.

JAS. A. LIBBY.

Notice.

A protracted meeting will be held at the Freewill Baptist meeting-house, West Falmouth, Me., commencing Thursday evening, Feb. 22d, to continue as long as may be thought best. Brethren N. G. Reed, I. C. Welcome, and others, are expected to be present. All who have a mind to work are invited to attend.

For the brethren, R. R. YORK.

Maine Quarterly Conference.

Our next Easterly Maine Quarterly Conference is appointed at Lincolnville, to commence Thursday, the 22d day of February, at 2 o'clock P. M., and continue over the Sabbath. Friends and brethren will call on Bros. Daniel Fletcher, Ephm. and Wm. Calderwood, M. Young, Edmund Blood, etc. Love for the cause of Jesus prompts us to hope that all coming to the meeting will come prepared to labor in accordance with our hope.

M. YOUNG, Clerk.

Maine Eastern Conference.

The Eastern Maine Conference will be held at Corinna Mills, to commence March 1st, at 2 P. M., and continue over Lord's day. We want the preaching brethren to be faithful in attendance, and if any from other States, or from the west part of this State, should read this notice, and feel that the Lord says "Go," we hope and pray they may come, filled with the Spirit.

In behalf of the brethren, J. DAMMAN.

Notice.

The third quarterly meeting of the N. Y. Christian Association will be held at Brockport, Monroe Co., N. Y., commencing Friday, March 2d, and continue over the following Sunday. Come brethren and sisters, let there be a general gathering to this meeting, and come praying for the Lord's blessing. C. B. TURNER, for the Board.

For the World's Crisis.

WE ARE SIGHING FOR REST.

We are sighing for rest, we are weary now,
Earth's care and affliction have darkened the brow,
And the heart is oppressed with its burden drear,
And grief from the eye starts the briny tear.

We are sighing for rest 'mid the wrecks of time,
'Mid oppression, unkindness, unrest, crime;
'Mid toils unrewarded, with fears we restrain,
We are sighing for rest on Eden's fair plain.

We are sighing for rest on the other shore,
For the time when our conflicts will all be o'er,
For the songs we shall sing, for the crowns we shall wear,
For the glory undimmed we forever shall share.

We are sighing for rest, for the night is dark,
And the waves and the tempests are tossing our bark;
We can just see the light o'er the mad breakers' foam,
And we sigh to be there on the highlands of home.

We are sighing for rest in the city of God;
On its golden pavements the angels have trod;
'Mid its portals of pearl that are flashing sublime,
And the stars of our crowns that forever shall shine.

We are sighing for rest in the pilgrim's "sweet home,"
Where in pain and affliction we no more shall roam;
For the land of the peaceful, the home of the blest;
We sigh 'mid our toiling for soon coming rest.

Natick, R. I. M. R. PHETTEPLACE.

For the World's Crisis.

THE TWO LAWS.

1st. "The law of sin and death." 2d. "The law of the spirit of life."—Rom. 8: 2.

As "the law of sin and death" has the precedence in the divine economy, so we shall give it the precedence in our investigations. In order to ascertain what law is referred to by the apostle, we must examine his argument, as given in the 7th chapter. He first presents it by an illustration—the law of marriage—a law binding upon the wife as long as the husband liveth, but from which she is made free by death. He then applies his figure to the christian church.

Through the body of Christ, slain for them, the christian believer is freed from a law once binding, and can now be married to Him who died, but was raised from the dead, and by this union they are brought under a new law to Christ. But this figure fails to enlighten us fully as to what law he alludes, and from which he says they are delivered, that being dead wherein they were held. But, by quoting one command of that old law, he gives us the right understanding of it. "I had not known lust, except the law had said, Thou shalt not covet." It was the law given on the two tables of stone, amid the thunderings and lightnings of Sinai, that is by him denominated "the law of sin and death," for by that law was the knowledge of sin, and the penalty was death.

The apostle most graphically describes the condition of those who are under that law, which, though good in itself, holy and just in its demands, yet, "being weak through the flesh," it could not make those who were under it perfect; it had no power to crucify the law of sin, which was in the members, and continually warring against the law of God, bringing the individual into captivity to the lusts of the flesh, so that, though converting unto the purity of the divine law, the justness of its claims, and desirous of being obedient thereto, the individual cannot do the things that he would. He wills to obey, but how to perform that which is good, he knows not.

Hence the good he would do he does not, but the evil which he would not do, that he does. This clearly expresses the natural disposition and condition of man, under the law of sin and death. It makes no provision whatever for his native depravity. It does not save him from his sinful proclivities, induced by the fall, hence his condition is truly deplorable, and expressed by the apostle in such language as this,—"I am carnal, sold under sin." "O, wretched man that I am, who shall deliver me from the body of this death?" Not that the apostle was in this exceedingly wretched condition when writing thus; but he places himself at the time back into his former state, and personifies the condition of one under "the law of sin and death," vainly striving by the deeds of that law to attain unto justification and peace.

The 5th and 6th verses show that he does not mean to be understood as now occupying such a wretched position, for he says, "When we were in the flesh the motions of sin, which were by the law, did work in our members to bring forth fruit unto death; but now being delivered from the law, that being dead wherein we were held; that we should serve in newness of spirit, and not in the oldness of the letter," that is, his present service is under the new law—the law of the spirit, and not in the oldness of the letter—the old law written and engraven on stones.

Having asked how deliverance shall come from such a bondage as described, he expresses his thanks that it comes "through Jesus Christ our Lord." Then he says that "the law of the spirit of life in Christ Jesus" hath delivered him from the former "law of sin and death," and what that law through weakness could not do, God, by sending his Son Jesus Christ in humanity, by a sacrifice for sin, condemned sin in the flesh, so that now the righteousness of the law can be fulfilled in all those who walk not after the flesh, but after the spirit. He says those who are in the flesh, i. e., in a state of natural corruption, unrenewed, cannot please God.—Why? Because "the carnal mind is in enmity against God—it is not subject to the law of God, neither indeed can be," for they that are "after the flesh," unrenewed, "do mind the things of the flesh." "But," says he, "ye are not in the flesh, but in the spirit, if so be the Spirit of Christ dwell in you," otherwise you are none of his.

Under the former law, he says they were carnal—sold under sin—minding the motions and lusts of the flesh, and by them brought into captivity. But under this new law—the law of the Spirit written on the fleshy tables of the heart—there is an entire moral change effected—the individual becomes a new creature in Christ Jesus; the old man—the carnal mind—is put off with his deeds, and the new man, Christ Jesus, is put on, and through the power imparted by this indwelling Christ, Paul could perform the good he would do, and refrain from the evil he would not do.

How changed the strain, as he triumphs and exults in the glorious deliverance wrought out through Jesus Christ! "We have not received the spirit of bondage again to fear, but the spirit of adoption, whereby we cry, Abba Father." That spirit is one of freedom, of assurance, and filled with its divine power, he declares that nothing shall separate them from the love of Christ; not even tribulation, or distress, or persecution, or famine, or nakedness, or peril, or sword, but in all these things they are more than conquerors, through him that loves them.

And not only shall these temporal afflictions fail to separate them from the love of God, but more than these, "neither death, nor life, nor angels, nor principalities, nor things present, nor things to come, nor height, nor depth, nor any other creature," can produce a separation from that exceeding, unchanging love. And when, in another epistle, he has traced the triumph of the church to the final consummation, he breaks forth in similar language to that expressed when he first catches a glimpse of the deliverance effected through Christ, "Thanks be unto God, who giveth us the victory through our Lord Jesus Christ!"

But he does not wait until the victory over death and the grave is achieved, before he can utter the language of joyous victory, for among many exultant strains, we find him giving expression to the following: "Thanks be unto God, who always causeth us to triumph in Christ!"

No more doleful sounds proceed from his lips; no more complaints of wretchedness and bondage; no longer does he represent himself as a slave sold under sin, after being brought under the new law,—"the law of the spirit of life (not death) which is in Christ Jesus."

Reader, under which of these laws are you serving? Which of the two conditions harmonize with your own? To be under the one is to be in bondage, a servant of sin, obedient to the dispositions of the flesh, an heir of death. To be under the other is to be free; sin no longer hath dominion over you; the flesh is crucified with its affections and lusts, the Spirit of God reigns within; its fruits are apparent, and eternal life will be your reward.

"THE BEST EVIDENCE."

While listening to a very energetic "orthodox" discourse, recently, the speaker presented an argument so important, I thought it should be presented to the readers of the Crisis, as we all like evidence to support a doctrine.

Said the speaker: "The very best evidence that I can give that I have a soul within, is, that I can FEEL it. Feeling," said he, "is the most satisfactory evidence of conversion. We FEEL right, therefore we KNOW we ARE right," was the pith of his remarks. He also asserted that man possesses an "immortal mind." "Christ comes the second time at death." "The saints are rewarded at death," etc. He describes the mind as "an intellectual, thinking machine, composed of numerous faculties."

Let us consider these statements, and see if they will stand the test of reason, and Bible testimony. Now if feeling is the basis of knowledge, and knowledge is the result of feeling, how much must we feel in order to know a thing is truth? Where is the rule, or standard, or measure, laid down, to guide us in this respect? Could such a standard be established, while persons are so differenly affected by the same influence? If the "very best evidence" that can be given for the support of immortal-soulism rests for proof on the uncertain fluctuation of feeling, is not the foundation and support very weak and feeble? Can feeling be relied on as a sure evidence that we are right? We think not. Every day's experience teaches the opposite. We feel just as conscientious while supporting what may be an error as we do defending the truth.

To prove this, one example is sufficient. Take the case of the illustrious Paul, Acts 26: 9, and onward. Now he was just as zealous, and felt just as conscientious while persecuting the church as he did after his conversion while boldly defending and earnestly supporting its doctrines; for he says he verily thought he ought to do many things contrary to the name of Jesus of Nazareth.

Now feeling is produced by material causes, therefore if the soul can be felt it is material and mortal, for an immaterial, immortal soul cannot come in contact with matter. If man is "conscious in death," as the "orthodox" teachers assert, how is thought produced, seeing the "thinking machine" is dead, inanimate, and moldering in the tomb?

Must the assertions of mortal man be believed, while they stand in open and defiant opposition to the teaching of the Word of God? The "best evidence" we can adduce, is a "Thus saith the Lord." "Let God be true, (though it prove) every man a liar." "Cease ye from man, whose breath is in his nostrils, for wherefore is he to be accounted of?" Isa. 2: 22. "Search the Scriptures." "To the law and to the testimony; if they speak not according to this word, it is because there is no light in them." Isa. 8: 20.

What saith the Scriptures in reference to man's composition, state in death, and his relation to immortality? "And the Lord God formed man of the dust of the ground." Gen. 2: 7. "Dust thou art, and unto dust shalt thou return." Gen. 3: 19, 23. "He remembereth that we are dust." Ps. 103: 14. And God "breathed into his nostrils the breath of life, and man became a living (not an immortal) soul." "The King of kings and Lord of lords, who only hath immortality." 1 Tim. 6: 16. "Shall MORTAL man be more just than God?" Job 4: 17. "For it is appointed unto man once to die." Heb. 9: 27. "Thou takest away their breath (not a deathless spirit); they die, and return to their dust." Ps. 104: 29. "The DEAD KNOW NOT ANY THING." Eccl. 9. 5–10. "In that very day (of man's death) his thoughts perish." Ps. 146: 4. "The dead praise not the Lord." Ps. 115: 17; Ps. 6: 5; Isa. 38: 18. "Man lieth down and riseth not, till the heavens be no more, he shall not awake nor be raised out of his sleep." Job 14: 12. If the dead be not raised, "then they also that are fallen asleep in Christ are perished." 1 Cor. 15: 18.—"There shall be a resurrection of the dead, both of the just and the unjust." Acts 24: 15. "God will redeem my SOUL from the power of the grave." Ps. 49: 15. "I will be satisfied when I awake with thy likeness." Ps. 17: 15.

"For the Lord himself shall descend from heaven with a shout, with the voice of the archangel, and with the trump of God, and the dead in Christ shall rise first." 1 Thess. 4: 16. "For the trumpet shall sound, and the dead shall be raised incorruptible. . . . This mortal must put on immortality." 1 Cor. 15: 52, 53. "They which shall be accounted worthy to obtain that world and the resurrection from the dead . . . . can die no more." Luke 20: 35. "When Christ who is our life shall appear, THEN shall ye also appear with him in glory." Col. 3: 4. "When the Son of man shall come in his glory . . . then shall he say unto them on his right hand, inherit the kingdom." Matt. 25: 31–34. "I will come again and receive you unto myself." John 14: 3. "Henceforth there is laid up for me a crown of righteousness, which the Lord, the righteous Judge, shall give me at that day; and not to me only, but unto all them that love his appearing." 2 Tim. 4: 8. "Thou shalt be recompensed at the resurrection of the just." Luke 14: 14. "And behold I come quickly, and my reward is with me, to give every man as his work shall be." Rev. 22: 12.

Many more passages might be collated, but these are sufficient to teach us—

1st. That man is a mortal, dying being.

2d. In death he is unconscious.

3d. Without a resurrection death would be an eternal sleep.

4th. That event will take place at the second coming or advent of Christ, and then the saints will be rewarded.

5th. It is near at hand, "even at the door." Luke 24: 33.

Need we say more? "I know that thou believest." D. E. LYON.

Bloomfield, O.

DEATH IN THE DESERT.

Death from thirst! How terrible must it be! A writer of some painful experience thus describes the symptoms which he remarked in some of his unfortunate fellow travelers: "We had now neither eaten nor drank since the preceding day. Our horses and other beasts were equally destitute; though ever since nine in the evening we had been traveling rapidly. Shortly after noon we had not a drop of water remaining, and the men, as well as the poor animals, were worn out with fatigue.

"At two o'clock in the afternoon a man dropped down stiff, and as if dead, from fatigue and thirst. I stopped with three or four of my people to assist him. The little wet which was left in one of the leather budgets was squeezed out of it, and some drops of water poured into the man's mouth, but without any effect. I now felt that my own strength was beginning to forsake me; and becoming very weak, I determined to mount on horseback, leaving the poor fellow behind.

"From this moment others of my caravan began to drop successively, and as there was no possibility of giving them any assistance, they were abandoned to their unhappy destiny, as every one thought only of saving himself. Our fate was the more shocking, as every one of us was sensible of the impossibility of supporting the fatigue to the place where we were to meet with water again. At last, at about four in the evening, I had my turn, and fell down with thirst and fatigue. Extended without consciousness on the ground, in the middle of the desert, left only with four or five men, one of whom had dropped at the same moment with myself, and all without any means of assisting me, because they knew not where to find water, and, if they had known it, had not strength to fetch it; I should have perished with them on the spot, if Providence, by a kind of miracle, had not preserved us.

"This attack of thirst is perceived all of a sudden by an extreme aridity of the skin, the eyes appear to be bloody, the tongue and mouth both inside and outside are covered with a crust of the thickness of a crown piece; this crust is of a dark yellow color, of an insipid taste, and of a consistency like the soft wax from a bee hive. A faintness or languor takes away the power to move; a kind of knot in the throat and diaphragm, attended with great pain, interrupts respiration; some wandering tears escape from the eyes, and at last the sufferer drops down to the earth, and in a few moments loses all consciousness."

Thus, in 1805, perished a caravan of two thousand persons, and eighteen hundred camels, who on their journey across the great Sahara were disappointed in not finding water at one of the usual watering places.

Now let us suppose, dear reader, that just as they were coming into their greatest extremity, men and beasts beginning to drop on the hot sand, a voice should have been heard, clear and shrill, "Ho, every one that thirsteth! come ye to the waters." What a rush there would have been of that entire caravan! Then let us suppose that as some began to fall back with the reflection, It can't mean me, I have no money, the voice should be heard again:—"He that hath no money, come ye, buy wine and milk without money and without price." How many of that company, think you, would have perished? Not one! Why should they, after receiving such an invitation?

Now, in a moral point of view, millions on millions are perishing for lack of the bread and water of eternal life. All along the way they may be seen dropping into the grave, the raging fever of unsatisfied desire drinking up the very life. Perhaps bright visions of some unknown future have been indulged in by most of them; but a vast howling wilderness lies between them and the realization of their day-dreams; and without ever attaining to what they so ardently desire, they sink down and the darkness of an impenetrable future settles upon them.

But is there no remedy? "Is there no balm in Gilead? Is there no physician there?" Must the frail sons and daughters of man go down to endless night? No! "Glory to God in the highest; on earth peace, good will to men." Thus sang the heavenly host at the birth of our Savior; for "God so loved the world that he gave his only begotten Son, that whosoever believeth in him should not perish, but have everlasting life." Listen, ye weary ones, to his gracious invitation:

"Come unto me, all ye that labor and are heavy laden, and I will give you rest."

"The Spirit and the bride say, come; and let him that heareth say, come; and whosoever will, let him take of the WATER OF LIFE freely." Hearken, O ye that perish for lack of the bread and water of eternal life!

"Ho, every one that thirsteth, come ye to the waters; and he that hath no money; come ye, buy wine and milk, without money and without price."

What necessity, then, that you should perish? The most ample provision has been made for you. God, men, and angels desire you to come. The most touching invitations are extended to you. Your poverty, unworthiness, and deep depravity, are all taken into the account, and still the outstretched arms of mercy wait for you. Delay, then, no longer, lest ye perish forever!—Letter Tract, No. 2, Box 4, Presque Isle, Me.

CONFERENCE REPORT.

The Rhode Island and Eastern Connecticut quarterly conference met, in accordance to previous adjournment, with the Danielsonville church, on Wednesday, Jan. 3d, 1866, at two o'clock. Spent the afternoon in prayer and exhortation. Evening, social worship, and sermon by Bro. Allen Damman; subject, the confession of Christ.

Thursday, 9 A. M., met for business, the President in the chair. First, reading of the Clerk and Treasurer's reports, which were accepted.

Moved, That Brn. Allen Damman, Joseph W. Thomas, and David V. Corey, be invited to become members of this conference. Carried. They accepted of the invitation.

Moved, That we invite brethren not members of the conference to take part in our deliberations.

Bro. V. P. Simmons requested that his name be dropped from the conference roll, and it was moved that we grant him his request; but after he gave his reasons for making such a request, the motion was lost.

Moved, That the Chair appoint a committee of three to nominate officers for the year ensuing. Carried. The Chair nominated A. Durfee, V. P. Simmons, and Allen Damman, as that committee. The committee reported A. Durfee as Moderator, and H. F. Carpenter as Clerk and Treasurer. The report was accepted by vote.

Moved, That hereafter we make it a custom that the old officers serve during the session of the conference at which new officers are chosen.

Delegates. N. Shumway reported the Danielsonville church. The condition of the church does not differ much from the last report, with the exception that one has been converted and baptized. Preaching most of the time, by Brn. E. Bellows, M. R. Phetteplace, and H. F. Carpenter. We expect to build a chapel this winter. Through the untiring effort and indefatigable labor of H. F. Carpenter, nearly a sufficient amount has already been raised to build a house.

East Killingly church was reported by D. V. Corey. Not much improvement, but there is a desire to hear preaching. One sermon by D. S. Clark, of Illinois. Bro. Brackett unofficially reported the church in Abington. We have very interesting meetings. Sabbath school not as interesting this winter. One member of the school has been converted. Preaching by George Streeter, Morse, and H. F. Carpenter. We have a desire for more preaching.

Preachers reported their labors. H. F. Carpenter reported. My last report was made at Abington. One year's labor in Rutland, Vt. We have had some interest. We have succeeded in bringing in those elements that have heretofore divided and closed up the breaches of the church, which we think has accomplished much good. Some have been forward for prayers since my absence.

M. R. Phetteplace. Have but a small report to make. Have preached but little. Been to Riverpoint. The church is in a low state, but the prospect is brightening up. Preached at Natick. One has been soundly converted, and stands fast in the faith. Our social meetings are seasoned with grace. Been to Warwick Plains. This is an old and tried band. Peter Noka labors with them.

A. Durfee. I have not been out much. My labors have been confined to Mohegan. There is a lack of interest. Have some good times and some hard ones. Preached at Natick; had a good time. Been to Coventry Center; about as near dead as can be and crawl. Been to Summit; had a good time. I found that I could breathe freely. I thought there was a prospect of the truth taking deep root in Mohegan, but I have become discouraged. I know that the cause of Christ is good, and I love to labor in it.

V. P. Simmons. Have not preached for one or two years; do not know whether it is duty or not. Benjamin Roberts. My labors have been somewhat limited for the past twelve months. I have not ceased to proclaim the gospel and the near advent of the Lord.

Moved, That we adjourn the business part of this conference to Friday, at 9 A. M. Carried.

Two o'clock, Thursday afternoon, met for a social meeting. At three part of a sermon by A. Durfee. In the evening preaching by J. W. Thomas.

Friday, 9 A. M., met in accordance with Thursday's adjournment. Preachers' report continued. Peter Noka. My labors have been mostly confined to Warwick Plains. Have not been away from home much, and I feel that I have about preached out; consequently I have not come prepared to labor for the Lord.

D. V. Corey, A. Damman, and J. W. Thomas reported. Their several reports were full of cheer. After the preachers' reports were all in, the following question was introduced for discussion:

Is the year of the second coming of Christ to be definitely known from the prophecies of the Old or New Testament?

Moved, That we accept the question offered for discussion. Carried. Moved, that the speakers be limited to ten minutes. Carried. The question was discussed by Brn. N. Shumway, M. R. Phetteplace, V. P. Simmons, and J. Thomas. The discussion occupied about one hour and a half, when it was moved that we adjourn to two P. M., and was carried.

Friday, 2 P. M., the Freedman's Mission was the remaining business to be disposed of. The Clerk read the minutes of the previous session of the mission, and was accepted.

Moved, That there be a collection taken up for the benefit of this mission. Carried. The Treasurer reported that there were collected and pledged to the amount of $27.25.

After some discussion as to how the funds of this society should be appropriated, it was moved that the Treasurer of this mission be authorized to remit to the Treasurer of the General Advent Freedmen's Mission all of the funds remaining in the treasury at the close of this conference. Carried.

Moved, That N. Shumway and V. P. Simmons be appointed to act in concert with the Chair in providing preaching for this conference, and also to provide subjects for criticism at its next session. Carried. The committee reported the following subjects: Sermon for criticism, church government, as taught in the New Testament, by M. R. Phetteplace. Essays for criticism, 1st, What ought to be done to increase an interest in our Sunday Schools? by H. F. Carpenter. 2d, Has the first day of the week any claims upon the christian church as a day of rest and devotion above any other day? By J. W. Thomas.

Moved, That we adjourn to meet with the East Killingly church on the first Wednesday in April next. Carried.

Friday, three o'clock, sermon by Bro. Peter Noka. Six, evening, social meeting. Seven, preaching by M. R. Phetteplace.

Saturday, 10½ A. M., preaching by V. P. Simmons. Afternoon, conference and preaching. Sermon by A. Durfee; subject, The Atonement. Bro. Allen Damman remained over and preached to us on the following Lord's day. When the conference closed, we all felt that it was profitable to meet in conference and enjoy the society of the saints for a short season.

A LETTER FROM A BRUISED REED.

Come with me to the beautiful village of Elmira, N. Y., and after you have gazed with admiration upon all that is enchanting to the eye, we will walk down Church street to the railroad, which runs lengthwise of Wisner street, and we will stop in front of a large building known as Phœnix Furnace. There is a little cottage directly opposite this large machine shop, and, if you please, we will enter without ceremony, and quietly notice the internal arrangements, and perhaps have a little conversation with the occupants.

The first thing that strikes us is the evident fact that these people are poor, though perhaps not extremely poor. There is one bed in the house, and a stove, a table, and a few chairs; and if you look closely you may find a trundle bed for the little ones. We find the wife and mother at home, with her two children, the eldest a boy not quite four years old, and a little girl eighteen months younger.

But where is the husband and father? He is employed as book-keeper in the office connected with the machine shop just opposite. It is now four o'clock in the afternoon, and he is not expected home quite yet. He was out of employment, but through the efforts of Thomas K. Beecher (brother of H. W. B.), this place was found for him. His pay amounts to only about two dollars a week, which some of the readers of the Crisis would consider hardly enough to provide food, clothing, fuel, etc., for a family. But here he comes. He walks with crutch and cane, and seems also to be quite unwell. He says he was not able to stay in the office any longer, and is so ill that he cannot sit up.

We will now leave them, and call again in the morning. We find the sick man is better, and the little son complains of pain in his head, and is also quite sick. The wife works about the house till afternoon, doing what she can for the sick ones, when she too is suddenly prostrated, by the same disease that is already at work upon her husband and son.

What can they do now? No one comes to help them, and can the father lie there and see his family perish? There seems to be no other way, but for him, sick as he is, to rise and try to take care of the others. But what can he do? He seems helpless as a child. But he has a will to try. The blood in his veins seems ready to burst forth, so violent is the disease raging there; and it throbs with such force as to almost stream from his nose, and does not stop until he sinks back fainting and apparently dying, and the frightened wife is obliged to go for help.

In this condition they remain for five days, not knowing which will die first, and with but very little aid; when the boy, the "first born," after a night of untold suffering, closes his eyes in death. Mr. Rains, the minister, now comes in, and is at once pointed to the little bed, where lies the dear boy, calmly resting; while sobs and moans from the living fill the ears of one, who evidently does not feel at home in such a scene.

Preparations must now be made for a funeral, but who will pay the expenses? It must be a public charge. The little coffin is brought, and kind strangers decently shroud the body and prepare it for the "narrow house."

When all is over, and the little family are left alone once more, death still stares them in the face. For some time the husband and wife seemed to be on the verge of the grave, but in time they recovered, although very slowly.

When able, they removed quite a distance from the place where they had passed through such severe trials, and the sorrow for the loss of the darling boy was beginning to heal, when the daughter was suddenly taken away. Another little coffin is brought, and another dear child is laid away in the cold grave. Poverty still presses the little family, and this funeral, too, is a public charge.

The question may be asked, "What is done with the earnings of the husband and father?" All that he received for six months' service in Elmira, was fifty dollars—only two dollars a week. Is that enough to pay rent, furnish fuel, clothing and provisions for a family through sickness and health? Most families require more.

The head of this family, the "Bruised Reed," who writes this letter, does not average to earn three cents an hour for the time he is employed—yet he does not at this time "come before the public as a beggar" (quoted from H. L. H.), but as a benefactor. I now enclose three dollars and twenty-five cents for the Crisis Poor Fund, to pay for the paper for the poor. I have never been a free subscriber on the "poor list" of the Crisis, and do not intend to be. "Where there is a will there is a way," and I have a will to pay for the paper as long as I take it.

Perhaps this letter is already too long, but I wish to add a little more. Are there not some among the twenty thousand or more who read the Crisis, who are in better circumstances than the writer of this? I live in a dilapidated old shell of a house, through the roof of which the rain pours, and the snow sifts. It needs no patent ventilators, for there are countless cracks and crevices through which the wind enters at pleasure,—but when the temperature is zeroic, it gives but little pleasure to the poverty-stricken inmates.

I ought not (perhaps) to insinuate that some of those whose names are on the free list are as able to pay as I am, but let me hear at least one response from some quarter, and let some one follow the example of GOD'S LOVE FOR SINNERS.

"And the spirit and the bride say, Come. And let him that heareth say, Come. And let him that is athirst come. And whosoever will let him take of the water of life freely."—Rev. 22: 17.

Dear reader, is it not delightful to notice that the revelation of God closes with such a free, full, and unlimited offer of salvation, in which the Holy Spirit and the church unite, whilst all are charged to circulate the glorious news? Is it not sufficient, my unconverted friends, to convince you that God bears for you a wondrous, inconceivable love? And do you not see how very much he desires you to come unto him, that you may escape the awful doom which awaits you, and live? How are you repaying him for this love? Are you not going on day by day sinning against him, trampling his laws and mercies beneath your feet, and exclaiming in your actions, if not in words, we will not have this man to rule over us?

Jesus stands holding forth to you a cup of living water, and invites you to drink. But instead of accepting the offered gift, you spurn all his love, thrust the cup from his hand, and trample it beneath your feet. O, sinners, beware! Jesus will not always bear these insults. Soon He who is now your best friend, will be your Judge. Then you will bow the knee in humble prayer, but too late. The cry will then be, "The summer is ended, the harvest is past, and my soul is not saved."

Sinners, consider this subject well, and do not be so heartless as to longer continue to abuse One who has done so much for you, and who is willing to do more, if you will but let him. If you will but repent, he stands ready with outstretched arms to receive you.

NAMES AND ORDER OF THE BOOKS OF THE OLD TESTAMENT.

The great Jehovah speaks to us
In Genesis and Exodus;
Leviticus and Numbers see,
Followed by Deuteronomy.

Joshua and Judges sway the land,
Ruth gleans a sheaf with trembling hand,
Samuel and numerous Kings appear,
Whose Chronicles we wondering hear.

Ezra and Nehemiah now,
Esther the beauteous mourner show;
Job speaks in sighs, David in Psalms,
The Proverbs teach to scatter alms.

Ecclesiastes then comes on,
And the sweet Songs of Solomon;
Isaiah, Jeremiah then
With Lamentations takes his pen.

Ezekiel, Daniel, Hosea's lyres,
Swell Joel, Amos, Obadiah's:
Next Jonah, Micah, Nahum come,
And lofty Habakkuk finds room.

While Zephaniah, Haggai calls,
Wrapt Zechariah builds his walls;
And Malachi with garments rent,
Concludes the ancient Testament.

A WINTER EVENING.

It was growing dark outside, but the bright firelight made up for the want of daylight or lamps in the pleasant parlor where five little brothers and sisters were gathered one winter evening. Their father and mother had gone out to spend the evening, telling Carrie to take good care of the younger ones.

So when they grew tired of play the kind elder sister put away her book and devoted herself to their amusement.

"I have thought of something we can do till tea is ready; come, Harry, and Lulu, and all of you, and let us sit round the fire."

What a little bunch they made, crouching round Carrie, Lulu in her lap, Harry and Clarence on the rug at her feet, and Jenny in her rocking-chair close beside her.

"Now what are we to do?" asked Harry.

"We will each in turn choose a character from history, or from some story we have read, and tell all we can about the person we have chosen, without mentioning any names, and see if any one can then guess who it is."

"Oh, that will be good fun. Now you begin, and see if I can't guess," said Clarence.

So Carrie began her story.

"There was once a young man who had three brothers in the army. I think he would have liked to be there too, but he was very young, and so he stayed at home to help his father on the farm. One day his father said to him, 'My son, I want you to go and see how your brothers are, and take them some loaves of bread and some parched corn.' This father also gave him some nice cheeses to carry to the captain of his brothers' company.

"So the young man did as his father told him, and went to the place where the army was encamped, and saw his brothers, and talked with them, and gave them the nice bread from home. But his brothers were not very kind or grateful, for when they saw him talking with the other soldiers, and asking them about the enemy, they were angry, and said, 'Why did you come here? You are so young that you had better have stayed at home and taken care of the sheep.' Perhaps they would not have spoken so if they had known what a great general he would soon become.

"Oh, was it General Grant?", cried little Lulu, eagerly.

"No, indeed," said Clarence. "General Grant didn't have three brothers in the army, that I ever heard of. But I don't see who it was; do you, Harry?"

"No. I have thought of all the great generals, and I can't think of one it could be."

"I have not told you quite enough," said Carrie. "When you hear how he became so great, I think you can guess. While he was talking with his brothers, a very tall man, dressed in armor, came out from the enemy's army, and said, 'I defy you all. If any man will come out and fight with me, and conquer me, we will all submit to you.' He spoke so very loud that all the soldiers could hear him; but he was so very strong that no one dared to accept his challenge. Seeing this, the young man said 'I will fight with him, and God will help me to overcome him and save the country.'"

"Oh, I know, now," cried Jenny. "It was David; and the great, strong man was Goliath."

"Yes, you are right, dear," said Carrie.

"I might have known," said Harry; "but I didn't think of any army but our own, and I didn't remember about his three brothers."

"You had better read the 17th chapter of the first book of Samuel, and there you will find the whole story."

"Now, Jenny, it is your turn, as you guessed first."

"Must it be a Bible story?" asked Jenny.

"No; whatever you like."

And this was Jenny's story:

"There were four kings who reigned over different parts of the same country. One of them died, leaving three little sons, and their grandmother took care of them. Their uncles were cruel, wicked men, especially two of them, but I forget their names."

"You are not to tell any names, you know, so that is no matter," said Harry.

"Oh, I forget. Well, these two uncles sent word to the grandmother that if she would send the children to them they would make the oldest king, as he ought to be, in place of his father. She was glad, and so were the little boys, and they went very joyously. But their wicked uncles put them in prison, each in a separate dungeon.

One day, when their grandmother was feeling very badly about them, an officer of the uncles came into the room where she was sitting, with a pair of scissors in one hand and a dagger in the other, and this was what he told her: 'The kings say you must choose for your grandsons, Shall they be put to death or have their hair cut off?'"

"I shouldn't think she would have to consider long about that," said Clarence.

"Oh, but," replied Jenny, "the law of that land was, that if their hair was cut off they could never be king; and so the queen said that she would a hundred times rather have the children die than let their long hair be cut.

"So the officer told the king and he killed the two eldest children himself. But when he sent to the dungeon for the third child, he was not to be found. Some of his father's servants had come and taken him away. So the poor grandmother was a little comforted because one was left. When the little boy grew up, he was very good and charitable, and he spent his life in helping the poor and unfortunate. He never claimed his kingdom, but cut off his own hair, and lived quietly all his life near ——."

"Don't tell the name of the place yet. We must guess," said Carrie.

"I can't guess, I'm sure," said Harry. "It sounds like the story of the two little princes that were smothered in the tower by their cruel Uncle Richard; but it wasn't them, I know."

"No, it wasn't in England at all," said Jenny.

"Well, I shall give up."

"And so shall I," said Clarence.

"And I too," said little Lulu. Whereupon they all laughed, though Lulu could not guess why.

"Then I shall have to tell," said Carrie; "although, as I read the story to Jenny from my little French history, I can hardly call it guessing. The four kings ruled over France in the 6th century. The names of the two cruel uncles were Clotaire and Childebert. The grandmother's name was Clotilde, and the little boy who was saved and grew up was Clodoald. He lived near Paris, at a place called since that time 'St. Clodoald,' or St. Cloud,' where there is now a beautiful palace."

"Now it's your turn again, Carrie," said Harry and Clarence at the same time.

"Yes; but since I have told one story, I will give my turn to little Lulu."

But while Lulu was wondering what she should tell, the tea-bell rang, and the children had to wait for her story till after tea; and I think we shall have to wait awhile, as the good Independent has other things to print, and cannot let the children have all its columns.—Independent.

NEATNESS.

"Mary, which of your friends do you like best to visit, Caroline or Lucy?"

"I like them both, mamma; Lucy is a good natured girl, but I don't like to go and see her."

"Why, my dear?"

"Because everything is in such confusion. Her doll, and books, and play things, are all scattered about the floor; and if we want to make dresses for the doll, needle-book, and thimble, and scissors, must be looked for, and perhaps not found after all. The very last time I was there, we were going to take a walk, but it was so long before Lucy could find her gloves, that it was too late."

"You think, then, that Lucy would be happier, and make her friends happier, if she were more attentive to neatness?"

"Yes, mamma, I am sure of it, but why do you ask?"

"Would you be very much surprised if I should tell you I think another little girl of my acquaintance in danger of acquiring the same habits?"

"You do not mean me, mamma?"

"Yes, dear, I do."

"Why, mamma! I did not know that I was at all like Lucy."

"I do not think your offences against good order are so flagrant as hers, but I think they will become so, unless you guard against them. For instance, do you recollect what you did with your hat and gloves this morning?"

"Yes, mamma," (blushing.)

"You know the natural progress of such habits is from bad to worse, and therefore I think it important that you should begin now to correct them. Are you willing to try?"

"Yes, mamma."

"Well, then, I will endeavor to assist you; and, as the first step towards your good habits, I advise you to have a particular nail for your bonnet, where it shall be hung."—Stories for Children.

For the World's Crisis

NEW JERUSALEM.

Fair city of peace, within thy portals,
All weary of earth, I fain would be,
City of gems and bright immortals,
City of long eternity.

I look for thee, like the patriarch father,
Though not through the gloom of so many years,
And for thee do my heart's best longings gather,
And in waiting my eyes all swim with tears.

And why I thus yearn through thy gates to enter,
And why I thus long and wait for thee,
I know that Christ, as thy King and center,
Shall sit in his glorious majesty;

I know he shall call the blest of his Father
From the groaning land and the heaving sea,
They shall come as clouds, and like doves will gather,
And I trust with them mine and myself will be.

Coming from death to this deathless city,
From beds of pain to this painless clime,
Tears may not fall, none are there to pity,
All sorrow is left in the waste of time.

Blest city, I hail thee! the place of hiding
For all the saints in earth's day of doom,
And earth will claim thee as here abiding,
When dressed for thy coming in Eden bloom.

THE DOCTRINE OF THE PHARISEES AND OF THE SADDUCEES DEFINED.

And an Explanation of the Parable of the Rich Man and Lazarus.

"E'en adders hear,
But turn, and dart into the dark again."

"He is a slave who fears to be
In the right with two or three."

THE DOCTRINE OF THE PHARISEES AND OF THE SADDUCEES.

WAR TACTICS.

"Then said Jesus unto them, Take heed and beware of the leaven of the Pharisees and of the Sadducees... Then understood they how that He bade them not beware of the leaven of bread, but of the doctrine of the Pharisees and of the Sadducees."—MATT. 16: 6-12.

In the tactics of war in these days, a flank movement upon the enemy either on the right or the left, or both, has proved quite successful. Instead therefore of approaching directly the stronghold of the errorists of these last days, wherein they have entrenched themselves in the faith of a conscious existence after death, and a state of rewards and punishments immediate on the occurrence of death (Luke 16: 19-31), we have determined upon an attack on both divisions of the forces of the enemy, and after dispersing the two wings of the marshalled hosts against the truth, move at once upon the stronger fortifications and seize them, taking possession in the name of the Lord; when we shall turn the guns of their strong defences upon the enemy and rout them; and running up the flag of eternal truth at mast head, let it float in triumph in the pure breezes of heaven.

If any attempt to make their escape from this citadel of error, to carry on an unholy war against the truth, we will follow them through all those passages of Holy Writ, whereby they attempt to flee from the ever successful march of truth, and compel them either to an honorable surrender, or an inglorious defeat. Why not have a "holy war" in earnest against error which is becoming more and more defiant and that error too which seeks to hide the light and glory of the truth of a coming Redeemer, and the resurrection from the dead of the blessed and holy to immortality and eternal rewards? In the name of the Lord, we will; and "the weapons of our warfare are not carnal, but mighty through God to the pulling down of the strongholds."

THE LEAVEN—THE DOCTRINE.

Our divine Lord teaches his disciples to "beware of the leaven of the Pharisees and of the Sadducees," which he afterwards explains to be "the doctrine of the Pharisees and of the Sadducees." The Pharisees and the Sadducees were the two principal and rival sects among the Jews in the days of Christ and his apostles. The doctrine of these sects of which the Savior bids us "beware," related to their views and traditions respecting a future state after death. We will therefore notice

1st. That of the Sadducees. The belief of this sect of the Jews consisted in a denial of a resurrection of the dead to life again. "The Sadducees say that there is no resurrection, neither angel nor spirit."—Acts 23: 8. In fact, they denied any future existence of man after death, regarding death to be an "eternal sleep," and hence were bold and defiant infidels. They encountered our Lord in an argument, and propounded a question to him which they supposed unanswerable, and would present an insuperable objection and difficulty to the doctrine of the literal organic resurrection of the dead, and of any future state of recognition. For they concluded that if mankind existed in a future state at all, they would of course "know each other there."

An old Welch minister was one day interrupted in his studies by his good wife asking him the question: "John Evans, do you think we shall be known to each other in heaven?" Without hesitation, he replied, "To be sure we shall,—do you think we shall be greater fools there than here?" The Sadducees presented the following difficulty in the way of the resurrection, taught by Christ, as recorded in Matt. 22: 23-28:—"The same day came to him the Sadducees, which say that there is no resurrection, and asked him, saying, Master, Moses said, If a man die, having no children, his brother shall marry his wife, and raise up children unto his brother. Now there were with us seven brethren; and the first, when he had married a wife, deceased, and having no issue, left his wife unto his brother; likewise the second also, and the third, unto the seventh. And last of all the woman died also. Therefore in the resurrection, whose wife shall she be of the seven? for they all had her."

The Sadducees now supposed that they had presented an objection which involved Moses' law in difficulty, and made it short-sighted in conception, providing the doctrine of the resurrection from the dead to a condition of recognition be true; for if, in this world, "seven men" should have one women to wife, could it be otherwise than that there should be jealousy among the seven husbands in another world, and a quarrel as to whose wife she should be, provided they were all favored with a resurrection to life? To this Jesus replies: "Ye do err, not knowing the scriptures, nor the power of God. For in the resurrection they neither marry, nor are given in marriage; but are as the angels of God in heaven. But as touching the resurrection of the dead, have ye not read that which was spoken unto you by God, saying, I am the God of Abraham, and the God of Isaac, and the God of Jacob? God is not the God of the dead, but of the living."—Matt. 22: 29-32.

Thus Jesus shows that the future is to be one very different from the present, and by no means involving Moses' law in difficulty, or chargeable with want of foresight relative to a future state. And he reaffirms the doctrine of the resurrection before these skeptics, by quoting the language of God to Moses in the bush in support of it; as St. Luke records the words of Christ:—"Even Moses showed at the bush, when he calleth the Lord the God of Abraham."—Luke 20: 37. As the Sadducees had quoted Moses against the doctrine of the resurrection, Jesus now quotes him in support of it, and clearly shows that God and Moses would both be involved in greater absurdity, and their language far more irreconcileable and unmeaning, providing there was to be no resurrection; namely, God proclaiming himself to be the God of dead men!

Some have attempted to prove from this language of Christ to the Sadducees that these patriarchs were not then, nor are they now dead, but living; thus wresting our Lord's words from their plain and obvious meaning, and making his argument in favor of the resurrection of the just of no force. This is the Pharisaic attempt on the resurrection, nullifying its importance. If those patriarchs were not dead, nor now dead, but living, how does our Lord prove that "they shall rise from the dead," "in the resurrection they shall rise"—Mark 12: 23-26), by his argument and quotation from Moses? Our Lord's argument is this: "God is not the God of . . . dead" men. Therefore "touching the dead, that they rise," "that they shall rise from the dead." "In the resurrection, they shall rise," God has declared when he said, "I am the God of Abraham, and the God of Isaac, and the God of Jacob. God is not the God of the dead, but of the living." By virtue of his promise they must live again. It is expressly affirmed that Abraham, Isaac, and Jacob, together with the faithful of that nation, are dead; "these all died in faith."—Heb. 11. If these faithful patriarchs are regarded by the Scriptures as it is said of them, they "live unto him"; for "he is not the God of the dead, but of the living; for all live unto him," Luke 20: 38; it is by virtue of his promise, and the fact that "He" who "quickeneth the dead calleth those things which be not as though they were." Rom. 4: 17. Says Mr. Bonar upon the above scriptures:—"The great point on which Abraham's testimony bore was the resurrection; and the terminating point of the divine testimony to the relationship subsisting between the patriarchs and the God who entered into covenant with them was the same: 'As touching the resurrection,' etc., verse 31. And it was this same testimony that embodied the anxiety shown by these patriarchs 'concerning their bones.' One feels that it is round the tomb of Abraham—the place where his dust lies waiting for resurrection, that a special interest gathers. It is this tomb above others that is the intimation of patriarchal faith and hope. Could we get access to the case itself, we might find the bodies of these patriarchs still there, or at least that of Jacob, for we read: 'And the physicians embalmed Israel.' Gen. 50: 1. There are mummies in Egypt as old as the days of Abraham. Their resurrection does not depend on this. They were careful about their bones, only that they might have a testimony to their hope. They waited the resurrection."

The Sadducees, at the reply and argument of Christ, were confounded and silent. The Pharisees, rejoicing to see this rival sect dispersed, gathered around him, and tried him with questions, also to their own confusion. Matt. 22: 33-46.

PRAYER.—What a privilege it is that we can come and put God in mind of his promise to his Son in regard to the kingdoms of the earth, knowing that he will not be offended, but that he will regard our request with special favor. None of us can be too poor to pray, nor too weak. God never grows weary in hearing our prayers. We can never ask him for more than he is able to do. We may open our mouths wide; think of all the persons we would pray for, all the subjects of prayer. He is able to help them all. Why then should we not pray more earnestly and more fervently, Thy kingdom come? He who prays at stated times only will make but poor progress heavenwards. If there was more prayer, there would be more converts and fewer critics, more penitents and fewer sleepers in our churches.

"EIGHTEEN HUNDRED SIXTY-SIX."

The following article on "1866," by Lieut. Col. W. C. Slather, is from the January number of the "Rainbow," published in London, Eng. We are glad to learn that much interest is being awakened among christians in all countries on the immediate coming of Christ.—ED.

The "Scripture dates of the time of the end," in The Rainbow for November last, is a communication of the deepest interest. Ever since those who love the appearing of their Lord have sought with prayer and supplication to discover, from the living oracles of truth, the probable period of the close of the Gentile Dispensation, the year 1866 has always stood prominently forth as big with events of the most solemn import. It was so at first, because that year, in accordance with the year-day theory, completes the prophetic term of the great Roman Antichrist, dating from the year 606, when the tyrant Phocas confirmed the Bishop of Rome as the supreme head of the church. And although the close of the sixth millenary from the creation of Adam could by no means have then appeared to synchronise with 1866, still the most profound and enlightened interpreters, almost unanimously, brought the lines of unfulfilled prophecy to converge and terminate in that year. In this confidence they successively departed, and bequeathed their testimony to us, on whom "the ends of the age have surely come."

It is a signal and triumphant proof of the honesty and faithfulness of the interpreters of past generations, that although the date which their views of prophecy compelled them to assign as the termination of the present age completed not, by many years, the sixth millennary, they still adhered to it, leaving in faith the discrepancy to be adjusted in God's own time and way. And how have their faith and integrity been honored! Modern chronologists have discovered that we are, in fact, so much further advanced on the course of time, that only seven or eight years are now lacking to complete the full 6000 years since the Lord formed man upon the earth.

And as the year approaches which so many with solemn anticipations have desired to behold, numerous new events and proofs have occurred to demonstrate that it is, indeed, an era of marvellous significance. The author of "Scripture dates" shows by dates deduced from widely distant points, yet all converging to the same, that 1866 is, in all probability, the termination of Israel and Judah's long captivity. And modern chronologists have confirmed this probability by demonstrating that, in seven years subsequent to 1866, i. e. in 1873, 6000 years will be fulfilled since the Adamic creation. These are very remarkable evidences, to which, if we add the decreed removal of the French troops from Rome, and the occurrence of a jubilee of jubilees* towards the close of the ensuing year, it must surely be conceded that 1866 will, in all probability, be an era of "wonders."

Now should the events which shall happen during 1866 prove it to be, indeed, the long-looked-for year for the fulfillment of many prophecies, what may, possibly, be the first occurrence which shall mark its wondrous course? Let it be distinctly understood that the assertion is not made that 1866 will be the culminating year of prophecy. We speak with all diffidence, and, as it becomes those who handle such themes, with the profoundest reverence and self-distrust. We would draw all our inferences from the sacred oracles, and gather wisdom by comparing Scripture with Scripture.

Reverting to Ex. 12: 1-28, we find the institution of the Passover. This feast was appointed in commemoration of the deliverance of Israel from the land of Egypt. It was observed on the 14th day of the moon of the month Abib, thenceforth to be to Israel the beginning of months, or the first month of their year. On the day after the Passover was the feast of unleavened bread; and on the day succeeding the Sabbath was to be presented the sheaf, or first-fruits of the harvest, which from that day began to be gathered (see Lev. 23: 10-12, and Deut. 16: 9), and was completed in seven weeks, and consummated by the feast of Pentecost. These were types and figures for the time then present, all of which were fulfilled in Christ; though they are probably susceptible of a fulfillment still more remote. He, the great antitype, the true paschal lamb, was slain on the 14th of the month Abib, and, on "the morrow after the Sabbath," in the capacity of High Priest, presented himself before the Father as the first-fruits of his body, the church. (See 1 Cor. 15: 20-23, and John 20: 17.)

Now, as Jehovah is "a God of order," and is pleased to conform himself to that eternal pattern of his sovereign will, his written word, may we not, in accordance with Divine analogy, humbly and reverently infer that the day on which our Lord rose from the grave (the morrow after the Sabbath succeeding the full moon of the month Abib), and in the capacity of High Priest presented himself a wave-offering before the majesty of the heavens, may be that day eternally appointed for gathering the first fruits of the harvest of the church, when "the Lord himself shall descend from heaven with a shout, with the voice of the archangel, and with the trump of God"? Everything is, analogically, in favor of the inference. What day so probable for the gathering of the saints as that very day which commemorates the occasion of our glorious "first-fruits from the dead" presenting himself before the Father on behalf of his body, the church, that great harvest yet to be gathered from the field of the world?

But let us, in attempted antitypical interpretation, closely adhere to the typical pattern. We are informed that the duration of the Jewish harvest was seven weeks; during which period all the corn of the fields was gathered—it being only the first-fruit sheaf, which, at the commencement, was presented as a wave-offering before the Lord. May not this be intended to signify that the final harvest of the church is to continue during Daniel's last hebdomad, or period of seven years, being ushered in by the wave-sheaf of the 144,000, "the first-fruit unto God and to the Lamb"? (Rev. 14: 5.)

As in a grain country all the corn is not ready for the sickle at the same time, and, if reaped immaturely, would only wither and perish; so in the christian world, when the seven years of harvest ingathering shall come, all will not equally be ready, and must therefore remain in the field until ripened by the sun of trial and tribulation. A small proportion who are waiting and watching for their Lord and loving his appearing will be taken up, as the first-fruits, the wave-sheaf, the earnest of the coming harvest—and, after that, will commence the fierce sunbeams of "the great tribulation," during which "a great multitude that no man can number, of all nations, and peoples, and kindreds, and tongues," shall be gathered in, successively, and by degrees, as was Israel's harvest;—and finally, just anterior to the stupendous Pentecost of wrath, "the angels shall gather together the remaining elect, from the four winds, from one end of heaven to the other"; and so, the harvest of grace being accomplished, the vintage of wrath will commence! And it is remarkable that the feast of tabernacles, or booths, which was the festival of gratitude for the fruitage, and vintage, commenced on the 14th day of the seventh month, Tisri—about our October. Thus, possibly, after "He that cometh from Edom, with dyed garments from Bozrah" shall have trodden the winepress of the 'fierceness of his wrath, and shall have slain "all those his enemies who would not that he should reign over them," there may be a season of universal gratulation, antitypical of ancient Israel's joy, when the Lord had crowned their year with his goodness, and had made the hills to rejoice on every side.

Very humbly, then, we deduce this inference from Israel's feasts, that whensoever the Lord Jesus shall descend for his waiting people, be it next year, or any future year, the period may be analogous to that when the literal Israel came out of Egypt—when the true Israel (Prince with God) by his sufferings as the true paschal Lamb, redeemed his people from a tyrant more terrible than Pharaoh, and a bondage immeasurably more dreadful than that of Egypt.

In a word, as the month Abib comprises parts of our March and April, that may be the set time for the Lord's appearing to take up the first-fruit, the wave-sheaf of his church!

And if, oh! if the notes of warning given by our chronologists and interpreters be true; if the year 1866 be the commencement of Daniel's 70th week; then it may be (for the time must finally come) that in a few months hence the "sons of the prophets" may seek in vain for the "Elijahs" who shall have ascended in their chariots of fire, and left far behind them the world and its coming tribulation!

"Who is wise, and he shall understand these things? prudent, and he shall know them?" "for the wise shall understand"; "and they that understand among the people shall instruct many"; and "surely the Lord God will do nothing, but he revealeth his secret unto his servants the prophets."

* It may be worth while to remark, that a Jubilee of Jubilees, or forty-nine times forty-nine years, reckoning from the decree of Cyrus for the restoration of the Jews, will be completed in November, 1861.—The Last Vials, September, 1864.

For the World's Crisis.

IS THE LORD COMING?

Yes! I believe he is. I believe a few more years will tell the story, and the sooner he comes the better I shall be pleased. Oh, how long the church has been waiting. How many weary days she has spent, sometimes disappointed because he did not come as she expected, and celebrate the marriage and provide the marriage supper. But after all there has been something sweet about this waiting, because there has been all the while an expectation of a joyful meeting with the long absent friend. So, while waiting, she has spent the time singing, to keep her expectation alive with interest. How often has she sung,—

"In expectation sweet,
We'll wait and sing and pray,
Till Christ's triumphal car we meet,
And see an endless day.
Thrice happy morn for those
Who love the ways of peace!
No night of sorrow e'er shall close
Or shade their perfect bliss."

Oh, how interesting to believers is the present time; their days of waiting are nearly ended; their disappointments because he did not come as they expected are all in the past. I believe this. So I did not write the question,—"Is the Lord coming?" as expressive of doubt. It may be taken in that sense; it may be asked with trembling anxiety, mingled with a new brightening of the hope, by one who has become almost discouraged, has not given up, but how often has the question forced its way out of the anxious breast—When, oh, when will he come?

Now new evidence is presented, the tried one of earth sees the "star" brightening, and gathering courage, but yet leaning on stronger ones for the evidence, asks,—Is the Lord really coming? Yes, dear saints, your trials are almost over. Wait, and patiently bear a little longer.

"Faint not now, for your reward
Will be quickly given."

Again, when the strong man, who has run through the long line of prophetic evidence, searching history for proofs of its correctness, and discerning the face of the sky for its signs, and the moral world for its evidences, he sees the work the Lord will do in prospective, how he will "overturn, and overturn, and OVERTURN," ruling with a rod of iron, and dashing to pieces as a potter's vessel all the heathen nations; how he will purify the earth, and make the place of his feet glorious, gathering out of every nation his loyal subjects, and organizing a government so permanent, because of the purity of its principles and the fidelity of its subjects, that it will stand forever, and banishing all that will offend; and when in review he sees how the mighty nations of the earth have tried all this and failed, leaving to the Mighty Rider on the white horse of Rev. 19: 11, to do his work in righteousness. Oh! how my mind is overwhelmed with the great light of present truth comes thus flashing in its brilliancy over it, and it is made to feel that the coming of the Lord is the great talisman of all this work stupendously sublime.

Then the question comes to the heart of the nearness of the event, and not in doubt, not as a fearful one, but awfully conscious of the nature of that coming, the believer in prophetic truth asks the weighty question, "Is the LORD coming?" Such a Lord as this, such a ruler, such a deliverer, such a friend of his people. Thank God! YES! and coming soon—this year, EIGHTEEN SIXTY-SIX, may tell the story; at all events, it will greatly increase the evidence that he is coming soon, and increase it, too, as no previous single year has done.

Oh! I love the Advent cry—Dominus Noster Venet, to wit, "Our Lord is coming." "Let the echo fly," not simply "is he?" but "he is coming."

DEATH COVENANTERS.

"Wherefore, hear the word of the Lord, ye scornful men, that rule this people which is in Jerusalem. Because ye have said, We have made a covenant with death, and with hell (sheol) are we at agreement; when the overflowing scourge shall pass through, it shall not come unto us: for we have made lies our refuge, and under falsehood have we hid ourselves."—ISA. 28: 14-15.

This portion of Scripture is most certainly having its fulfillment in these last days. In fact, since the "old drunken lady" enunciated the doctrine that death is the gate to glory, the men that rule this people which is in the church have hid themselves and their flocks in this refuge of lies.

Now we are told by Paul that the Spirit expressly declared that "in the latter times some should depart from the faith, giving heed to seducing spirits, and doctrines of devils." Satan was a seducing spirit in the garden of Eden; and what was the seductive art employed by him there? "And the woman said unto the serpent, We may eat of the fruit of the trees of the garden; but of the fruit of the tree which is in the midst of the garden, God hath said, Ye shall not eat of it, neither shall ye touch it, lest ye die. And the serpent said unto the woman, Ye shall not surely die; for God doth know that in the day ye eat thereof, then your eyes shall be opened, and ye shall be as gods."—Gen. 3: 2-5.

Thus we see that Satan comes out first with a positive denial of God's word, "Ye shall not die" (doctrine of devils), then employs the seductive—"Your eyes shall be opened, and ye shall be as gods." It was evidently Satan's intention first to create a dissatisfaction with their condition and residence, and then to awaken an ambition to know as much, and to dwell among the gods, or angels; for we cannot conceive that the gods mentioned were other than the angels of God, whose abode is in heaven.

Now in all the long record from the Fall to the Flood, and from Noah down, through the patriarchs and prophets and apostles; in all the historic side-glances of heathen nations in the faithful record of backsliding Israel, we can find none so presumptuous as to back Satan in calling God a liar; and although God has again repeated the penalty, "The soul that sinneth, it shall die," none (down to a period long subsequent to the apostles' days) was ever found bold enough to hide in Satan's refuge of lies. It has been reserved for an apostate (anti) christian church to say with Satan, in the face of God's truth, "Ye shall not surely die."

We always find the ancient saints regarding death as an enemy. We hear a patriarch lamenting that his gray hairs shall come down with sorrow to the grave. We hear the sweet singer of Israel in tones of triumph singing, "Thou wilt redeem my soul from the power of the grave." We see a good old king of Israel lying on his bed, sick unto death. The Lord sends his servant, the prophet, to notify him to arrange his affairs, for he must die. What does he do? He was a good man, a servant of the Lord. Does he break out into ecstasies, and sing in the language of an orthodox hymn—

"Happy who in God doth live;
But happier still are they
Who to God their spirits give,
And 'scape from earth away.
Lord, thou read'st the panting heart,
Lord, thou hear'st the praying sigh;
O, 'tis better to depart,
'Tis better far to die."

No; he wept, and prayed, and pleaded his faithfulness for a prolonging of his days. God saw his tears, and heard his prayers, and added fifteen years to his life. Like a true man and servant of God, he loved life, and prayed that he might be still possessor of the precious boon; and that his prayer was consistent with the will of God, we learn from the fact that God answered it.

We find the dear Savior, when upon earth, manifesting his power to the discomfiture of death. It is written in Hosea 13: 14, "O death, I will be thy plagues." Our blessed Savior met with two dear sisters who were (not rejoicing because their beloved and pious brother had gone through the friendly gate of death into glory, but) weeping the bitter tears of sadness and grief, because their brother was dead. Their friends wept with them; and Jesus—did he rebuke their grief, as being unnecessary and improper, and console them with the assurance that their brother was more alive than ever—that he was happy in glory now, ranging the fields of Elysian bliss? No. When he saw their justifiable grief, he too was sorrowful, and "Jesus wept." O, ye who are disposed to make a covenant with death, read this beautiful narrative in John, 11th chapter.

So also in the case of the widow of Nain, Luke 7: 11-15. She, weeping because her only son was dead, excited the compassion of the dear Savior. And he exhibited a sample of his power, and the purpose for which he came into the world (Heb. 2: 14, 15), by raising her son from death.

The apostles of our Lord and Savior Jesus Christ understood these things, and we never find them doing homage at the shrine of death, in the utterance of such sentiments as the following:

"Ah! lovely appearance of death,
What sight upon earth is so fair?
Not all the gay pageants that breathe,
Can with a dead body compare.
With solemn delight I survey
The corpse when the spirit is fled,
In love with the beautiful clay,
And longing to lie in its stead."
* * * * * * *
"To mourn and to suffer is mine,
While bound in a prison I breathe,
And still for deliverance pine,
And press to the issues of death."

We find a Paul groaning, not for death, but for the "redemption of the body" (Rom. 8: 23), and exhorting the church to yield themselves unto God "as those that are alive from the dead" (Rom. 6: 13). And again, the apostle says (Rom. 8: 24), "For we are saved in hope; but hope that is seen is not hope." We see death, but that is not our hope; we look beyond, and say with Peter, "Blessed be the God and Father of our Lord Jesus Christ, which according to his abundant mercy hath begotten us again unto a lively hope (or, as in the original, hope of life,) by the resurrection from the dead."—1 Pet. 1: 3.

Now, brethren in the ministry, it is our duty to try to break this spell, this delusion of Satan, this covenant with death. We are not to mince matters in this direction; the issues at stake are too important. Men will not receive present truth until they learn the ancient truth, that when a man is dead he is dead, and will remain so until Christ comes to raise him from the dead; then will they see a necessity for the coming of the Lord. With their present views regarding death as a messenger of peace and bliss, who is going to bear them away they cannot see why the Lord should come. They do not "love his appearing." "All they that hate me love death."—Prov. 8: 36.

"Beyond the bounds of time and space,"

What does the Lord say about these death covenanters? Isa. 28: 18,—"And your covenant with death shall be disannulled, and your agreement with hell shall not stand; when the overflowing scourge shall pass through, then shall ye be trodden down by it." And the rocks and mountains will not hide them in that day when this glorious promise is fulfilled to the saints of God, "He will swallow up death in victory; and the Lord God will wipe away tears from off all faces; and the rebuke of his people shall he take away from off all the earth; for the Lord hath spoken it."—Isaiah 25: 8. "The last enemy that shall be destroyed is death."—1 Cor. 15: 26. "So when this corruptible shall have put on incorruption, and this mortal shall have put on immortality, then shall be brought to pass the saying (promise) that is written, Death is swallowed up in victory. O death, where is thy sting? O grave, where is thy victory?" 1 Cor. 15: 54, 55.

GREAT TRIBULATION. MATT. 24.

BRO. GRANT:—There has ever been a dark spot in my mind touching the Great Tribulation, until of late. Now that darkness has passed away, giving me perfect satisfaction.

Some suppose that this great tribulation refers exclusively to the seven years war on Jerusalem. Others, that it is a tribulation to the church of Christ, under the papal power, during the 1260 years. There is truth in both of these ideas, but not the whole truth. The whole truth is this: The great tribulation commenced on the Jews, and Jerusalem, A. D. 65, by the Roman power, and it continued down to 1780. Both the Jews and the Christians are embraced in this time of trouble, and millions of both classes were slaughtered between these two dates.

I do not propose to give an exposition of this chapter, but simply to express a few thoughts which will readily throw the true light, as I conceive, before all minds. In order to do this, I will divide the chapter into sections, that the reader may more readily grasp the subject.

First, Christ had been talking to his disciples about the destruction of Jerusalem, his coming, and the end of the world; hence the inquiry of the disciples,—"Tell us, when shall these things be?" etc. Christ gave them a full answer, which may be found in Matthew 24, Mark 13, and Luke 21.

Now from the 4th to the 14th verses of Matthew 24, there is one chain of prediction, extending from Christ till the end of the world.

Commencing with the 15th verse, we have the second chain of prophecy, spanning the 1810 years of Gentile times, from A. D. 65 to A. D. 1875, the end.

Commencing with the 29th verse, and running to the 36th verse, we have a chain of signs introduced immediately on the ending of the Great Tribulation, and extending to the Advent, which are positive indications that redemption is drawing nigh.

Beginning with the 37th verse, and running to the end of the chapter, we have a cursory view of this world as it is to be in the last days, or time of the end.

Having made these divisions, we wish to direct all minds to the following quotations: Matt. 24: 15-22; Mark 13: 14-20; Luke 21: 20-23. That these three citations of Scripture refer to the same events, does not admit of a doubt in my mind. The abomination of desolation, spoken of by Daniel the prophet, can be nothing more nor less than the Roman power; and this power has two forms, Pagan and Papal. For the Dragon gave his power, his seat, and his great authority, to his successor—Papacy. Rome Pagan commences the Great Tribulation, and Rome Papal ends it.

This tribulation stands in connection with the 1810 years of Gentile times, and the 1260 years with the church in the wilderness. Christ says, "Ye shall be hated of all nations for my name's sake." This is as truly applicable to the Jews as to Christians; both have been wonderfully hated by all nations, and wonderfully destroyed by that wonderful power that waxed exceeding great.

In order to justify this last idea, I will introduce a short extract from Josephus, found on the last page of his History.

"Tacitus' hatred and contempt of God's peculiar people, the Jews, and his attachment to the grossest idolatry, superstition, and astral fatality of the Romans, were therefore so strong in him as to overbear all restraints of sober reason and equity in the case of those Jews, though he be allowed so exactly to have followed them on other occasions relating to the Romans. Since, therefore, Tacitus was so bitter against the Jews, and since he knew that Christ himself was a Jew, and that his apostles and first followers were Jews, and also knew that the christian religion was derived into the Roman provinces from Judea, it is no wonder that his hatred and contempt of Jews extended itself to the Christians also, whom the Romans usually confounded with the Jews; as, therefore, his hard words of the Jews appear to have been genererally groundless, and hurt his own reputation instead of theirs, so ought we to esteem his alike hard words of the Christians to be blots upon his own character, and not upon theirs."

Pagan Rome put to death millions of Jews and Christians, before he gave up his seat, power, and great authority to the papacy; since which, the papacy has destroyed wonderfully the mighty and the holy people—from fifty to seventy-five millions of Christians—and God only knows how many millions of Jews; for they were hunted down like the wild beasts of the forest for about seventeen hundred years. Should any doubt that the Great Tribulation continued thus long, let them read the twenty-sixth chapter of Leviticus, and the twenty-eighth chapter of Deuteronomy, and there they will find that God's sore plagues were to follow Israel after they were scattered among all nations, and they were to be of long continuance.

The denunciations of God against this people have been most literally and signally fulfilled. Let the reader note the fulfillment of God's judgments, graphically described in these chapters, from the 20th to the 23d pages of Thurmen's work on the "Sealed Book of Daniel Opened," and all must see where the Tribulation commenced and ended.

The first toleration that was extended to the Jews seems to have taken place in 1753, during the reign of Queen Anne. In 1780, when Joseph II. ascended the throne, he published his Edict of Toleration, by which he opened to the Jews the schools and Universities of the empire, and gave them the privilege of taking degrees as doctors in philosophy, medicine, and civil law. Milman's History of the Jews. From 1780 up to the present time, both Jews and Christians have not suffered the deadly hatred of Gentile nations, but these nations have rather sympathized and sought to ameliorate their condition.

Then the Great Tribulation is found located between A. D. 65 and A. D. 1780. It is surely numbered with the things that are past. Now, says Christ, "Immediately after the tribulation of those days," or, as Mark records it, "in those days, after the tribulation (what days? 1810 years of Gentile time), the sun shall be darkened, the moon shall not give her light, and the stars shall fall from heaven." "And upon the earth distress of nations, with perplexity," etc., all of which has been literally fulfilled since 1780, and this generation that exists after the tribulation ends, is not to pass till Christ comes to judge the world. Oh! how certain it is that the church of Christ is almost home. My faith is unwavering. Blessed be God!

GENERAL FEELING.

There is a general impression that some remarkable event is about to take place. Everywhere I find this feeling ripening into a strong conviction. Let the origin of this feeling be what it may, the feeling really exists extensively.

What the nature of the event is to be all are not agreed, and many have no definite conceptions. Some are looking for the end of Popery and Mohammedanism, to be succeeded by the conversion of the whole world to Christianity. Others are looking for monarchical rule to end, and Republicanism to spread over the whole world. Others still are looking for the system of Spiritualism to monopolize the whole world, and become, morally and politically, the morning star of a new dispensation. Many stand in a quandary, wondering what is coming.

But a few unpopular students of heaven's prophetic record feel confident that the King of glory is coming to raise the dead saints, and set up his celestial kingdom on earth. Now is the time to let the light shine on this great question. There is a deep anxiety to hear. We must not put the light under the bushel. If there is any thing reliable in the prophecies, we are nearing the end of our world's history. This truth must not be concealed by those who have the light. We must make it conspicuous in our sermons and publications.

Let us scatter the light through this new field. You who cannot preach can scatter tracts. Make a little sacrifice to spread this Heaven-given light.

THE SEWING MACHINES AND DICTIONARIES.

"A Webster's Dictionary is something that I very much want, and I should be glad if I could make up a list of ten subscribers, so as to obtain it. But those who sympathize with our views are so few here, that I shall be unable to get the number required. The five which I have sent are all I can get."

"With a large family to support, and no dependence but my needle, a Sewing Machine would be a great help to us; and if there were more of our faith in this place, or more who look upon it with favor, I should go to work with some hope of securing it. If the requisite number (32) were not so large, I think I could, as it is; but I must be content for the present, to go without what I so much need."

We have received a number of letters like the above, and to put the Sewing Machine and the Webster's Dictionary within the reach of all who are thus situated, we make the following offer:—

For every $5.00, with five new subscribers, and $2.50 from each for one year, one copy of WEBSTER'S ($12.00) UNABRIDGED DICTIONARY.

For every $20.00 with sixteen new subscribers, and $2.50 from each for one year, one of GROVER & BAKER'S ($55.00) SEWING MACHINES.

This offer, with the other, extends only till the 1st of June. All names for the Dictionaries or Machines must be sent in before that date.

THE WORLD'S CRISIS.

Valuable Premiums for New Subscribers!

SEWING MACHINES AND DICTIONARIES.

To every one who shall, any time before the 1st of June, send us, with the money, THIRTY-TWO NEW SUBSCRIBERS for One Year, ($2.50 each), or Sixty-four for Six Months, ($1.25 each), we will send, by express or rail, a

Grover & Baker's ($55) SEWING MACHINE,

one of the simplest, most durable, completest and best, (in our opinion the very best), in the market. A great labor-saving machine and blessing, in the family and work room; and a gift of priceless value, which you can now, with a little effort, present to your thankful wife, sister, mother or daughter.

FOR TEN NEW SUBSCRIBERS, with the money for One Year, or Twenty for Six months, one copy of

Webster's ($12) UNABRIDGED DICTIONARY,

containing 10,000 words and meanings not found in other Dictionaries, over 3000 fine Engravings, and more matter than any other single volume in the world. Invaluable to every student, minister, or general reader.

FOR THREE NEW SUBSCRIBERS, with the money for One Year, or Six for Six Months, one copy, postpaid, of

or a Bible Dictionary; either and both of which are indispensable helps in the study of the Scriptures.

The names and monies can be sent in as fast as they are obtained, and when the full number is received, the Gift will be forwarded.

Come, brethren, a general rally from Maine to California! The Judge is at the door; and, with these gifts in view, and the greater reward yet to be given to all who do what they can to prepare a people for his coming, let us every one see what we can do.

CHRISTIAN DUTY.

Dear brethren and sisters, are we living up to our duty as the children of God? Are we carrying out in our daily life what we profess, namely, entire consecration to God and his cause? Let us examine closely and see. Do we on all suitable occasions recommend the religion of Jesus to our friends? Does our daily life always point the sinner to Christ? Have we given all for Christ, thus renouncing the world, with all its pomp and show? or are we living in the gratification of self and sin? If we expend anything for needless show in dress, it is just so much spent to gratify pride, and is worse than wasted, for it is leading others by our example to do the same. If we pay fifteen dollars for a garment, when ten would have bought one as servicable but less showy, we have paid five dollars to gratify pride in dress. Every cent thus spent is worse than thrown away. Every yard of ribbon, my sister, you wear for mere show, is just so much wasted, over which God hath made you steward, and for the use of which he will hold you accountable in the day of judgment.

Some of us are in the habit of using that filthy weed, tobacco, thus robbing God of his just dues. This is not right. It is at best but a filthy habit, doing no one any good (except in some cases where it is used medicinally), but much hurt, wasting our Lord's money, poisoning our breath, destroying our health, and all this for the gratification of a depraved appetite. Shall we go on thus? Dare we continue thus deliberately to sin against God, against our neighbor, and against our own souls?

All we can possibly give is needed to feed the hungry and clothe the naked, to supply the destitute with the gospel of the kingdom, with religious reading to lead them to Christ. Many are doing much, but there is much more to be done, and time is fast passing away. What thou doest must be done quickly. Now is the time to act. Spend not your Lord's money for that which profiteth not, but do all with an eye single to the glory of God. "To him that knoweth to do good, and doeth it not, to him it is sin."—James 4:17.

PHILADELPHIA.

Our meetings in the "city of brotherly love" commenced Monday evening, Feb. 12th, and continued over the following Lord's day, and resulted, we trust, in much good. We made an acquaintance in that city with some very devoted christians, in different denominations, who are very strong in the faith that Jesus will soon come to set up his kingdom. Theirs is an active, living faith, showing itself by good works, and earnest efforts to persuade people to be ready for the day. It was a rich feast to enjoy their society. Among other interesting visits, we enjoyed a short interview with Dr. Seiss, the editor of the "Prophetic Times," an ably conducted monthly, which advocates with much earnestness and boldness, the speedy coming of Christ. He is the author of several interesting works on the evidences of the Second Advent of our Redeemer. "The Day and Hour," which he has recently published, is a work that every one should read, especially those who think we can know nothing about the coming of Christ. It is just the thing to lend to your neighbor, who quotes the passage—"Of that day and hour knoweth no man." We think, after he has read what Dr. Seiss says on the subject, he will not feel disposed to use that passage any more as an objection against knowing when Jesus will come.

Our meetings in Philadelphia were held in three different places,—the Mt. Zion meeting house, in Christian street, below Sixth; corner of Ninth and Spring Garden; and in the German Baptist meeting house. Some eight or ten requested prayers, and four were baptized, who were much blessed.

The meetings were to be continued through the next week, and we hope to hear that a goodly number have been converted. We had pleasant interviews with Brn. F. H. Burbank and Stewart, who will preach to them the word of life.

We remember our visit to Philadelphia with much pleasure. Jesus has some warm friends in that city, who are anxiously waiting and watching for his return to our planet.

While there, we had some interesting interviews with some noted Spiritualists, who were out to hear our exposure of Spiritualism, last autumn. Soon after our arrival in the city, this time, we learned that one of them was out of health, and was anxious to have us call on him, which we took an early occasion to do. We received a most cordial welcome. This gentleman was formerly a preacher, but was seduced by the spirits, and has been an earnest supporter of Spiritualism through the press, and otherwise. He is a professor in the fine arts, and a man of superior talents, whose name has been often seen appended to interesting articles, in prose and poetry. Soon after our first greeting, he said, "Elder Grant, your position in relation to Spiritualism is right. It is of the devil." He now feels anxious to recover his health, that he may be able to lift his warning voice against this great delusion. It led him on, till he doubted whether there was any God. He now thanks the Lord for his affliction, which has been instrumental in leading him to see that he had been following "seducing spirits," who were endeavoring to lead him to destruction. He feels like a shipwrecked mariner, taken off from a floating plank in mid-ocean. We hope to hear interesting tidings from him as soon as he is able to write. We are rejoiced to learn that others are getting their eyes open to see that Spiritualism is Satan's crowning work of deception.

Monday, Feb. 18th, we left our good home at Bro. L. Reimer's, en route for Washington, D. C., from which place we now write, and will report in due time.

THE FENIANS.

The Fenian movement has become one of gigantic dimensions. But few, except themselves, are aware of the power now in their hands. Their numbers and wealth render them already a first-class power in the world. It is very evident, from some facts that have lately come to light, that the whole movement is anti-Protestant, and is a grand effort to make Catholicism once more triumphant in the world.

"In a Fenian book found in Tyrone, Ireland, besides a list of names, was the following toast:—'Here's to ——. Long may he live; may he live till he sees chapels built ten miles long, and seven broad—built with Protestant bones, thatched with ministers' skins, whitewashed with their blood, and their backbones for scrapers at the doors.'"

We learn from reliable authority that their President is a radical Spiritualist. We also learn, from very satisfactory evidence, that Napoleon III. is a supporter of the Fenian movement. It is said the two leading Fenians are now in Paris, or were a short time since, in the vicinity of the Tuileries. Napoleon is also a confirmed Spiritualist.

The French government has recently given notice of its intention to rescind the "extradition treaty" within six months. Should this be done, then the Fenians could have full protection in France, while employed against England; and so could any other powers, that were friendly to the French government.

When in Philadelphia, we gathered some interesting facts relative to the Fenians, which have accidentally come to light. The present movement began with twelve Irish noblemen, in Paris, seven years ago. Till within about two years, they received none into their ranks but Irishmen who were considered sharpshooters. But, for the last two years, they have received all who would not oppose their principles; consequently, all their members are in submission to Catholicism. Each member pays ten dollars when taken into the society, and fifty cents a week afterwards. Last October, every member in Canada and the United States was required to pay twenty-five dollars extra, which was all they expected to need for the purpose of making Ireland free from the British yoke. According to the report made to the Fenians last Oct., they then had three hundred thousand in America, one hundred and eighty thousand in Canada, sixty thousand in England, forty thousand in Scotland, twenty thousand in Australia, many in Mexico and Italy, and three hundred thousand in Ireland, making over nine hundred thousand. It is said their principal officers in Ireland, amounting to one hundred, are "veteran officers of the American army."

It is well known that England feels quite secure from an attack from the Fenians, in consequence of her strong army; but we learn from the same source from which we derived the foregoing facts, that there are two hundred thousand Fenians in the English army; so that when the time comes to strike the decisive blow, England will find her support weaker than a broken reed. For some years it has been the policy of England to recruit her army by Irishmen, little thinking she was thus taking the instruments of her own destruction into her bosom.

It is also stated that the Fenians have been making a move towards Canada for the purpose of causing England to send some troops there, knowing that they would be mostly Fenians, and hence be ready to help deliver up Canada, when the time comes for the decisive blow to be struck. Those who know best, say there is no chance for England to stand against the attack of the Fenians, supported as they are by Napoleon. Truly, we may say, with all careful observers, "Startling events are at hand."

It is a well-known fact that the Fenians have purchased most of the government ships and stores that have been sold since the close of the American war. While they report only about $120,000 paid into their treasury, and about $67,000 on hand, it is said they have many millions in their treasury to be appropriated for the success of their enterprise. They are trying to conceal the vast extent of their power and wealth, till the hour of action arrives, which is said to be just at hand.

EXTRAVAGANCE RUN MAD.

The extravagance in dress and other things at the present time seems to know no limits. One might reasonably conclude that the chief business in this life was to dress in costly apparel, and keep in the fashion. This shows a very low state of religion, corresponding with Paul's description of "the last days." It is the result of pride, which is one of the special tokens that the last days have come. Those who would be ready for the coming of our Lord, must keep "unspotted from the world."

The following facts are alarming, and demand the attention of the candid:—

"There is no sign of the times more full of dread omen to the nation than the unbounded extravagance of the women. Their desire for display is astounding. They riot in wanton waste, seemingly without a thought for propriety. In the name of that refinement and economy which ought to be the ennobling characteristics of American womanhood, we call for the staying of this wild tide of recklessness.

Among the looked-for results of the war, it was hoped that the country would be purged of slavish obedience to the mandates of Parisian monde, and its attendant extravagance. Twice every year the followers of so-called fashion were wont to attend at special displays of the milliners, and learn what they had to wear the ensuing season. Many of the most refined in the land thought it no disgrace to seek instruction in the arts of French courtesans—who are in reality the makers of the fashions that are so lavishly adopted in this country. With scarcely a thought, they yielded subserviency to a land wholly alien to us in morals, religion, political and social life, and, not the least of all, in climate. But it did not seem that so much of imitation, reckless waste, and useless display, could possibly survive the sad discipline of a war. And when our literature come out of the ordeal clothed with nobler life, and in sturdier form, it gave cause for hope that the taste and habits of the women of the land would also be of a purer and more provident character. How delusive was the hope, the wild dissipations of the past summer, and the rush at the recent displays of the fashion-mongers, too well attest. There is, indeed, a danger before us, and every interest demands that it be fairly met before it shall be too late.

At the breaking up of the war, in the spring, it did not seem possible that the sorrow and desolation of four years of conflict could be so entirely ignored as to permit a season of unexampled profligacy. What with a half-million men either dead, or maimed for life, and with mourning at the inner or outer door of every house in the land, there was reason to expect that motives of propriety, if no other, would stay for a time, the reviving of any useless scenes of extravagance. But while the procession of death was yet flitting past, with cripples, and bereaved homes, and sights and sounds, and pain on every hand, the servility of borrowed fashion, and the shamelessness of unaccountable riot, began their round anew. We look back upon the season of pleasure now ended with shame and regret; shame that the women of the country should manifest so little for the lessons of the hour, and regret that they did not set a nobler example of economy and good taste.

The tide has turned towards the metropolis again, with its fashion and thoughtlessness, hungering, it would seem, for a new carnival, of yet wilder pleasure. There is no indication any where of the dreadful scenes from which we have just emerged.

Do the women of the country understand whither these things lead—upon what rock their extravagance will wreck them? The fashions, as prescribed in France, are caught up by our own profligates, who watch for the openings in the spring and autumn, most faithfully. All along our streets the dissipated and shameless appear side by side with the pure and respectable. There is no sign to distinguish the one from the other, for both worship at the French Moloch. Already the cities are bearing the terrible plagues of French life, until the good old simplicity and modesty of American women seem passing away. If it is desirable that the evil shall become general, the women of the land have only to continue their present foolish system of expenditure and dress.

Are the good ways and less forward customs of the olden time to be wholly ignored? Shall the decent and the indecent adopt alike the wretched fashions of libertine France? Is it reputable for American women to live, so many of them, beyond their means? Would it not be to their good fame and honor, in view of the vast debt of the country, and the call for economy on every hand, if they should renounce the millinery of French imitations, and adopt more modest and tasteful habits of dress? We cannot but believe that the mass of American women are yet within the reach of an appeal to good repute, and good taste, and here we are content to rest the matter for the present."

SPIRITUALISM.—NO. 9.

THE MORALS OF SPIRITUALISM.

We will close the evidence on the moral tendency of Spiritualism by introducing the testimony of Dr. Wm. B. Potter. He has had much experience in Spiritualism, and is well qualified to speak on the subject. An article from his pen, under the heading of says:—"We have through our own mediumship and that of others, had 'Spirit manifestations,' which the most careful and rigidly scientific investigations have shown, beyond all doubt or possibility of mistake, to be of spirit origin. Fifteen years of critical study of Spiritual Literature, an extensive acquaintance with the leading Spiritualists, and a patient, systematic and thorough investigation of the manifestations, for many years, enable us to speak from actual knowledge, definitely and positively of 'Spiritualism as it is.' Spiritual Literature is full of the most insidious and seductive doctrines, calculated to undermine the very foundations of morality and virtue, and lead to the most unbridled licentiousness.

"We are told that 'we must have charity,' that it is wrong to blame any one, that we must not expose iniquity as 'it will harden the guilty,' that 'none should be punished,' that 'man is a machine and not to blame for his conduct,' that 'there is no high, no low, no good, no bad,' that 'sin is a lesser degree of righteousness,' that 'nothing we can do can injure the soul or retard its progress,' that 'those who act the worst will progress the fastest,' that 'lying is right, slavery is right, murder is right, adultery is right,' that 'whatever is, is right.' That sexual union is necessary for health and development; that it is a great help to mediums to get 'Spiritual elements, but if the parties are not adapted it is a great injury and an 'awful wrong,' that 'as persons develop they become unadapted, and poison each other,' that 'VARIETY is more productive of mental and physical development.'

Hardly can you find a Spiritual book, paper, lecture or communication that does not contain some of these pernicious doctrines; in disguise if not openly. Hundreds of families have been broken up, and many affectionate wives deserted by 'Affinity-seeking' husbands. Many once devoted wives have been seduced and left their husbands and tender, helpless children to follow some 'higher attraction.' Many well-disposed, but simple-minded girls have been deluded by 'Affinity' notions and led off by 'Affinity hunters,' to be deserted in a few months, with blasted reputations, or led to deeds still more dark and criminal, to hide their shame.

It is a notorious fact, that leading teachers, noted mediums, and popular speakers, have deserted companions, obtained divorces, gone off with 'Affinities,' or practiced promiscuous intercourse to get 'Spiritual element,' or to 'impart vital magetism for the cure of disease.' The outside world has no just conception of the folly, 'Free Love,' and licentiousness among Spiritualists; especially on the part of 'healing,' and 'developing mediums.'

We could give the names of hundreds, but for the present we spare them. Indeed so strong has been the 'Free Love' tendency, and so numerous and influential mediums, speakers and Spiritualists of 'Free-Love' proclivities that we do not know of a single Spiritual paper that has paid expenses, that has not had their assistance and promulgated their doctrines.

At the National Convention of Spiritualists at Chicago, called to consider the question of a national organization, the only plan approved by its committee especially provided that NO CHARGE should EVER be entertained against any member, and that ANY person, without ANY regard to moral character, might become a member. Notorious 'Free-Lovers' and libertines have been especial and HONORED correspondents of Spiritual papers. Conventions of Spiritualists have accepted as delegates, and elected to office well known, persistent habitual LIBERTINES. The late National Convention of Spiritualists at Philadelphia, through its committee, refused to even read a proposition to disfellowship known libertines, but formed a permanent, National organization with annual delegated Conventions, from which the lowest and most BEASTLY LICENTIOUSNESS SHALL NOT EXCLUDE ANY ONE."

In a work by Dr. Potter, entitled "Spiritualism as it is," when speaking of the "tendencies" of Spiritualism he says:—

"So strong has been the Free-Love tendency, and so numerous and influential media, speakers, and Spiritualists of Free-Love proclivities and practice that we do not know of a single spiritual paper that has paid expenses, that has not had their assistance, and promulgated their doctrines.

One of the oldest if not the most influential paper, has several noted Free-Lovers and libertines as special and honored correspondents.

Parting husbands and wives is one of the notorious tendencies of Spiritualism. The oldest and most influential teacher of Spiritualism has two wives, each of whom he encouraged to get divorced before he married them. When one of the most eloquent trance speakers left her husband, he came out and stated that he knew sixty cases of media leaving companions. We heard one of the most popular impressional speakers say to a large audience, that she was compelled by spirits to secede from a husband with whom she was living very happily. We lately heard a very intellectual, eloquent and popular normal speaker say, in an eloquent address to a large convention of Spiritualists, that 'he would to God that it had parted twenty, where it had parted one.' In short, wherever we go, we find this tendency in Spiritualism."—Spiritualism as it is, pp. 10–11.

Again he says on p. 20,:—"After years of careful investigation, we are compelled much against our inclinations, to admit that more than half of our traveling media, speakers and prominent Spiritualists, are guilty of immoral and licentious practices, that have justly provoked the abhorrence of all right thinking people."

In view of the foregoing well-attested facts, as given by advanced Spiritualists, who are well informed in this matter, and speak from actual and extensive observation, we could ask the candid reader if he sees any thing in the moral influence of Spiritualism, that resembles ancient Christianity? On the other hand, is not its tendency directly the opposite,—only anti-christian? In all its moral bearings, it is in complete harmony with the idea that the spirits who profess to be those of our friends, are only "seducing spirits," or demons. Their influence is just what we might expect from such a source.

We are personally acquainted with one who claims to be Christ's medium, and a medium for the higher order of spirits, as the apostles, and other holy men; and yet we heard a prominent spiritualist say in Concert Hall, Philadelphia, during the National Convention of Spiritualists, held there in Oct. 1865, that this very medium was "a vile wretch;" and that he held dark circles with persons in their nude state. This same medium has so abused two wives that they cannot live with him. He says he is to have seven wives. In connection with all this, we have rarely found a man who would talk purer morals than this person. After hearing him speak of Jesus and the "Christ principle," one might suppose him to be a true follower of our Savior; but when the test is applied, the whole is found to be one of Satan's counterfeit. Instead of "Christianism" being synonymous with Spiritualism," as claimed by the spirits and Spiritualists, they are as unlike in their moral influence as are Christ and Belial. We might as well affirm that a house of ill-fame was a nursery of virtue, as to say that Spiritualism exerts a good moral influence upon society. Satan would be glad to make people think so, but facts contradict any such position. Those who have been so far deluded as to be made to believe that Spiritualism was calculated to make men and women virtuous, wiser and happier, find at last they have only been chasing an ignis-fatuus,—a snare of Satan to lead them to perdition.

A GOOD MOVEMENT.

Several prominent preachers in different denominations, seeing the sad results of sectarianism and party strife among the various evangelical churches, have held some meetings in Philadelphia, for the purpose of devising plans to unite all christians in one common brotherhood. Thus far those meetings have been largely attended, and promise very happy results. It is a movement in the right direction, judging from what we are able to learn of their purposes.

The association is called "The American Christian Union Association." It was organized in 1863. The following adopted report will give some idea of the object proposed to be accomplished:—

DECLARATION OF PRINCIPLES AND PLANS.

Knowing it to be the will of our Lord Jesus Christ, the King and Head of the Church, that his people should be all one, in and through him; and believing that the Holy Ghost by his Divine power, hath in these latter days wrought effectively upon the hearts of christians, thus drawing them together as by a mystic bond, and unifying them in faith, hope, and charity: Therefore, moved by convictions of imperative duty, and encouraged by the events of Providence, we, the members and the friends of the American Christian Association, do set forth the following declaration:

1. That the unity of the Spirit creates the unity of the one Holy Catholic Church.

2. That the doctrines of the common salvation set forth in what is called the Apostles' and the Nicene Creeds, compose the broad basis with which all subsequent formularies of the evangelical denominations of the Christian Church cohere.

3. The Church thus one in spirit, and agreeing upon the cardinal and eternal truths of revelation and redemption, ought to be, and may be, so unified in visible fellowship, as to give evidence to the world that it is one in spirit, faith, and purpose.

4. Denominational organizations do not destroy spiritual oneness—any more than the several members of the human body destroy its integrity—so long as they are animated by the mind of Christ.

5. As the "communion of saints" is an article in the universal creed of the church, and ought to be incorporated among its usages, we believe that wise, fraternal, and expedient measures should be taken to bring into closer communion all who now love and serve the same Lord, and confess themselves to be "brethren one of another."

These five propositions compose the fundamental principles on which the Christian Union Association has been organized. These furnish the warrant for its existence, and define the main object it will labor to attain. We believe its aims will be approved by those who know what the will of their Lord is respecting his people; and though obstacles to its realization must be expected, yet do we fervently thank God for help in our past efforts, and take courage from the righteousness of our cause to labor for large results in the future.

In farther prosecuting its undertaking, it has, in our judgment, become necessary to define more exactly than has been done hitherto what is the main outline of the plan of operations to be observed. For the sake of clearness, this plan may be described first in its negative, and second in its positive characteristics.

First—Negative. (a.) The Christian Union Association does not intend to assail peculiarities of denominational doctrine, usage, or worship, nor to question the right of the several denominations to maintain their own forms of culture.

(b.) It does not intend to express its preference for one form of policy over another; nor to urge that there shall be but one type of custom or usage common to all branches of the church catholic.

(c.) It will not allow any denominational ascendancy to define its aims, control its operations, or execute its plans of christian usefulness. Its existence and influence are both conditioned upon its close adherence to the fundamental principles herein contained and in order set forth.

(d.) It is not the purpose of this Christian Union Association to organize a new sect, denomination, or order, nor to aid any one denomination in finding fault with another.

The positive features of its plan are these:

(a.) To recognize the existing spiritual unity of the people of God as a grand and potential fact, to be set forth, proclaimed, and enforced by all the arguments and sanctions of truth and charity.

(b.) On this vital fact as a ground-work to promote, so far as possible, the spirit of brotherly confidence, of courtesy, and of toleration, among all who agree in essentials and differ only in non-essentials.

(c.) To diffuse this feeling of confidence, and to exalt the idea of spiritual oneness, the Association will aim to employ all the customary channels through which the christian people of this and other lands may be addressed. These channels will include the pulpit, the platform, the press, and such affiliated organizations as may be established throughout these States in union.

(d.) While this Association cannot undertake to foretell whereunto its work, as above defined, may grow, nor to commit itself to possible results, still it frankly expresses the hope that the day is not distant when it will be found practicable to convene a body of representatives of various christian denominations to discuss such plans as may be proposed, whether of federative or organic union among believers, and to adopt such measures as may seem best calculated to strengthen the common defences of Zion, to promote peace and good will, and to further the gospel throughout the world.

The members and friends of the Christian Union Association adopting this declaration, claim for themselves no wisdom other than the word of the gospel has made common to all. Sorrowing as they do over real or seeming divisions which now impair the strength of the church, they have undertaken in no spirit of self-confidence, and from no motive of partisanship, to realize, so far as the infirmities of our partially sanctified nature will permit the unrepealed declaration: "One is your Master, even Christ; and all ye are brethren." . . .

LITTLE WANDERERS' HOME.

Yesterday morning, feeling that "the Lord will provide," I purchased a house on Lombard St., above Fifth, for a home for our little ones, which the Lord has given us from the highways and hedges. The building is of brick, three stories in height, with a high basement, and finished attics. There are eleven good sized rooms in all, and all in excellent order. There is a large yard back of the house, suitable for a play-ground for the children. The price of the house is $2500.00, and the ground rent is but $40.00 a year. I have engaged the place in the fear of the Lord, trusting in him to give me the $2500.00 in season to have the house paid for by the first of April.

I want no subscription lists in the papers, but I ask all who love Jesus to pray for us, that the Lord may supply us with the means necessary to purchase the house, and the care of twenty-five or thirty children. We shall hold an afternoon school in the house for our little ones, an evening school for men and women. We leave the Lord to do all the knocking upon the hearts of his children who love his appearing, for he will knock at the right hearts at the right time. If I was to undertake it, I might make many mistakes. I condemn no one who does not give, for the Lord knows their hearts better than I do. "The Lord will judge his people."

The house is within forty rods of "Satan's Seat," yet it is in a good neighborhood. We ask all who love Jesus to pray for us who are laboring for Christ among the poor in the highways and hedges. We feel that the message is to be sounded by us in these places until Jesus comes. Souls are coming to Christ. We are willing to spend and be spent for him. From your Bro. in the Lord,

F. H. BURBANK.

THE ROUND POND CONFERENCE.

The brethren and friends assembled in the Free Meeting-house, Jan. 18th, in the evening, according to appointment. We found the people interested in the meeting, with open hearts and houses. There was a good audience the first evening, who listened to a sermon by Bro. Leverton, from the text,—"Come!" The congregation increased in numbers and interest at each meeting, and many of the old soldiers were on hand to help in the good work of the Lord. The preaching was good and instructive; and backed up, as it was, by the Holy Spirit and the exhortations of the brethren, we trust an abiding impression was made on the hearts of the people. The prayers and exhortations were from the warm hearts of faithful christians; and this, with the blessing of God, made it one of the best quarterly conferences ever held in this place. Union and peace were some of the leading features of the meeting. Preaching Brn. present: R. R. York, C. H. Leverton, N. G. Reed, L. Rhoades, I. C. Wellcome, Wm. H. Mitchell, S. K. Partridge, J. Solmes.

At the business meeting, J. Partridge was chosen President, and J. Hemenway Clerk.

Adjourned to meet at Jefferson, Trask meeting-house, June 14th.

Thus closed a good and interesting meeting in Round Pond. Sunday afternoon we had an interesting communion season, when about fifty gathered around the table of the Lord. Love prevailed among the dear friends of Jesus as they sat around the sacramental board. We received very kind treatment from the friends at Round Pond. There is an open door for the welcome of truth and its supporters.

REVIVAL IN NEW BEDFORD.

Protracted meetings were commenced at the Advent Chapel on Kempton St. six weeks ago yesterday, under the labors of Elds. C. E. Piper, J. W. Thomas, Allen Damman, and the writer. The interest has steadily increased up to the present time, and still many are crying, "Men and brethren, what must we do to be saved?" Over fifty have been forward for prayers at one time, and about one hundred and fifty have been converted and reclaimed, including all classes, old and young, rich and poor, noble and ignoble, black and white, young men and maidens, old men and children.

The Advent Chapel was soon found too small to contain the multitude, and Eld. Piper commenced laboring with the Middle street Christian Church, which is now constantly crowded with eager and attentive inquirers after the peace that Christ alone can give. The interest has crossed over the river into Fair Haven; and in that place, for the last two weeks, large numbers have been forward for the prayers of God's people. No such religious interest has been known in New Bedford for twenty years. It seems like the compelling message; men and women seem determined to have salvation. They stand out in the streets, watching an opportunity to hear the word of life. Thirty-seven have been baptized, and many more are expecting to be buried with Christ in baptism next Sunday. The converting power of God has been felt in leading the people to believe the truth in the Lord's speedy coming, and in the state of man in death, believing that eternal life is to be obtained only through faith in Christ.

It seemed duty for me to be at Lowell St. Chapel yesterday. The work of the Lord is commencing there in earnest. Eight arose for prayers in the evening, and indications are favorable for a reformation in this large, ungodly city. I expect to come back here in about a week to labor in the name of Israel's God.

Brethren and sisters, we are doing our last work. Let us be faithful in warning the perishing to escape a judgment soon to come, and the Lord will crown our labors with success. JOHN G. HOOK.

IN AFFLICTION.

BRO. GRANT:—For the information of many friends, and in answer to the inquiry of a number concerning the sickness of my wife, I will drop a few lines for the Crisis. For the past sixteen months she has been suffering with a cancer, growing gradually more troublesome from its commencement, and baffling the skill of the many doctors consulted.

Some four months since, finding all outward applications a failure, she submitted to the knife. The whole gland of the breast was removed, and the surgeon said he felt sure of a permanent recovery; but in a short time he found that a portion of the virus still remained and soon all our hopes for her recovery and stay among us were blighted by the appearance of a fully developed rose cancer, which has grown most thriftily, and caused her more suffering than pen can describe. She resigned herself to her fate like a true christian, bearing all her pain with patience; until now, weary of life and its many aches and ills, she longs for rest in the grave, and she will find it soon. It is a severe trial for us to see her thus suffer, and to expect soon to lay her away in the grave.

Remember us, dear brethren and sisters, in your prayers. Some have written us words of sympathy and comfort. Let me tell them they have greatly cheered the heart of poor Lizzie, as well as mine; and I can but love them better for such sweet remembrances. Your Bro. in affliction, JAS. A. LIBBY.

THE RIBS: WHO DO THEY REPRESENT?

"And, behold, another beast, a second, like to a bear, and it raised up itself on one side, and it had three ribs in the mouth of it, between the teeth of it: and they [the ribs] said thus unto it, Arise, devour much flesh."—DAN. 7:5.

No one will dispute that the "bear" represents the Medo-Persian kingdom; but what do the "ribs" in the "mouth of it between the teeth of it" represent?

It must be obvious to all that to be in the mouth of a bear, and between its teeth too, is to be in a tight place; and it is a little singular that they, occupying the position they do, should say to the bear, "Arise, devour much flesh." But it so happens sometimes that people and things do not realize their true position until it is too late to avoid evil coming upon them. This, we think, is the fact in the case now before us.

We can arrive at no other conclusion, save that the ribs represent Haman, in his plot against the Jews. See Esther, 3d chapter. I presume some one is ready to say, "The position Haman occupied was rather on the back of it than between its teeth!"

Well, I presume he thought about so himself when king Ahasuerus (Artaxerxes) was promoting him, and advancing him, and setting him above all the princes that were with him; and all the king's servants "bowed and reverenced him"; but I apprehend that about the time his head went through the gallows he had prepared for Mordecai he found himself "in the mouth,"—yea, "between the teeth" of the animal upon which he just before thought himself riding. Correspondence.

From Bro. L. Boutell.

Bro. Grant:—As our object is to scatter light and truth, and by every possible means to reform men, morally and theologically, I wish to say that I have received and read the "Christian," just issued by Bro. H. L. Hastings, from his tract repository, and I consider it an efficient auxiliary to our weekly paper in the pleasurable work of making men better. It is adapted to old and young, to rich and poor, in short, to all classes. When welcomed into families, with its variety, it will do all good.

It is the thing to scatter as on the wings of the wind. The first piece, "Fishers of Men," characteristic, but instructive, pithy, worthy to be heeded by all the church, especially by those to whom is committed the living oracles, and, instead of Christ, are beseeching men to be reconciled to God. "Talks to Young men" is well calculated, if given heed to by the youth, to save from shame and infamy in after life. "Large print tracts," easily read and more easily digested, adapted to children and profitable to all who would not be slaves to habit and sell their birthright for nought. The power of "faith in prayer, trusting the promises of God," bringing needed relief in extremity when every thing else fails, truthfully illustrated in narrative, showing the faithfulness of the living God, is not less important to inspire confidence and holy trust in all the believing.

Finally, there seems to be nothing in the "Christian" but what would be beneficial to the reader, entreating him to cease to be bad and learn to be good, to leave the wrong and do the right, and thus make a "mark" monumental of good to be admired by all who love God, good and right. It can be had with or without money, No. 19 Lindall street, Boston. Send and get it; read and scatter it among your neighbors as fast as possible. Let us save all we can. Time is short.

L. Boutell.

From Bro. J. E. Ainsworth.

Brethren and Sisters:—I write a few lines to you through the Crisis, believing that we are very near the great day of God. How shall we appear before him? Have we the wedding garment? is it unspotted? does the light shine upon our pathway? do we know where we are? shall we be glad to see Jesus? can we say from the heart, Lo, this is our God, we have waited for him? If so, we may be glad and rejoice in his salvation.

Paul says to the Hebrews, Let us hold fast the profession of our faith, without wavering; for he is faithful that promised. And let us consider one another to provoke unto love and to good works. Not forsaking the assembling of ourselves together as the manner of some is, but exhorting one another; and so much the more, as ye see the day approaching. Thus we are trying to do in Brimfield. There are but a few of us, yet we get together every Lord's day. We claim the promise, and get the blessing; therefore we have confidence in the promises of God, that whatsoever we ask in faith, believing, we shall have.

Perhaps some of the readers of the Crisis will remember a short letter that was published in the Crisis about a year ago, in reference to scouring up the jewels; that the writer believed there were some in Brimfield yet that might be scoured, and that his house would be a good scouring place, and inquired if there were not some of God's ministers who would come this way and help us? yet none of those whose names were mentioned have been near us. Nevertheless, from that time we commenced meeting together, once in two weeks, and experienced such a blessing by so doing, that we felt that every week would not be too often.

Thus far the goodness and mercy of God have led us along. We feel that we can testify to the truth, that when God's people walk in accordance with his word, that word will be a light to them in all the ways of righteousness.

Dear brethren, is this all that is required of us, to meet together to exhort and pray? Are there not other duties taught us in the word of God, to which we are to take heed? How shall we perform the sacrament if there be no head to the body? As we receive the light, so should we walk in it.

Yours, looking for Jesus soon to come,
John E. Ainsworth.
Brimfield, Jan. 19th, 1866.

From Sr. S. A. Gilman.

Brethren and Sisters:—Through the providence of God, and the kindness of Bro. Grant, I am permitted once more to address you. Six months ago I expected never to see another new year dawn. For five long months I have been confined to the house, three, mostly to my bed. I had marked out a very different path in which to walk, but my Father has been testing me, whether my faith stood in the power of God, giving me lessons in trust, patience, and submission to his will.

In the early part of my sickness I was brought to the entrance of the "dark valley," but without a fear, "leaning my head on Jesus' breast," I implored the everlasting arms to be underneath me, when O, what peace filled my heart. Sweetly came these words of Jesus, "I say unto you that I will pray the Father for you, for the Father himself loveth you, because ye have loved me." O! what precious views of the character and love of my dear Savior I enjoyed, while struggling against the evidences that I was a mortal, dying worm. Never before had the relation to him seemed so near and dear. The dearest earthly friend was powerless now, but my Savior had the keys of death, and had "numbered all my dust till he should bid it rise," and I was satisfied if I could "awake in his likeness."

Pleasant was the thought that the last conflict was nearly over, battling against sin, and that never more should I grieve my heavenly Father by my imperfect endeavors to serve him, but rest, and home, and glory, were mine. I did not forget I was to leave my children amid the perils of these last days, but I knew the care my God could take of them would be such as his love and wisdom could bestow, and even a mother's love and care could not compare with this. Committing them to him, I felt he could use such instruments as his wisdom saw fit to bring them home, knowing if he saw they needed me, he could have kept me from the "tyrant's" power. All I asked was that he would bring them to his kingdom with me when I awoke.

Contrary to the expectation of all, I survived, and slowly recovered. I supposed my life work done, but again I am called to duty and labor, and will you, who know the worth of prayer, raise one fervent petition that God will help me to "live unto the Lord"? If it is only in my own home circle, I pray God to help me do it faithfully there, remembering it is not doing good alone, but being good that must be my aim. May God help us to be every day christians, as well as meeting christians.

Do you suppose the world charms me now? That its fashions and follies absorb my mind? Standing, as it were, upon the "Delectable Mountains," my soul is filled with rapture as I look forward to the promised land, and I watch each omen of my coming Lord "more than they that watch for the morning." I long to behold the face of my Redeemer, and hear that swelling chorus vibrate through the vault of heaven, "Worthy is the Lamb that was slain to receive power, and riches, and wisdom, and strength, and honor, and glory, and blessing. Alleluia:—for the marriage of the Lamb is come, and his wife hath made herself ready." Will not the marriage of a bride to a bridegroom receiving such an estate transcend any thing of earth?

O, my God, wilt thou permit such a worm as I to sit down to that marriage supper? How can I love thee as I ought, who hast such riches of grace in store for me! and so soon to receive it. Blissful thought. How my soul is moved while I see men grasping after bubbles instead of this glorious crown, shadows instead of this enduring substance. How I long to tell them how much more blessed and sweet it is to be a child of God, a joint heir with Christ.

Yours waiting for the morning,
Sarah A. Gilman.
South Windsor, Ct.

From Bro. R. S. Jackson.

Bro. Grant:—I would like to say to our brethren who are called of God to stand upon the walls of Zion, how gladly would I (had I the means) defray the expenses of some one or more of them, and bid them welcome to a pilgrim's home while here, could they come and preach the truth to the people. How willingly would I support a preacher, and his family, too, for the unspeakable pleasure of hearing the gospel, and giving the people the privilege of hearing on the Lord's coming. But, alas! I have but very little means; yet, if some of our efficient laborers could come, I would rejoice to welcome them to my humble home as long as they wish to stay, and try and do a little besides.

I have not heard an Advent sermon since I left Poultney, Vt., two years ago. I am trying to live a christian, and let my little light shine. I am circulating those tracts which you sent me, and some are interested. Some express a wish to hear the living preacher. How often I have seen in the Crisis a string of appointments from some good brother, and end with—"If these conflict with others," etc. I have thought if that brother knew the moral destitution of the West, he would go out in the strength of the Lord, and sound the cry in this region.

O that the Lord would open the hearts of his children to sustain the heralds of the cross in their arduous labors. Pray for me.

R. S. Jackson.

From Bro. H. N. Chamberlin.

Dear Pilgrims:—How glad I am Jesus is coming so soon to redeem his people, to gather his saints to the marriage supper of the Lamb, to give them eternal life in the kingdom of God. We are living in a cold, selfish world, surrounded with wicked influences, and our pathway is beset with snares and temptations, foes within and foes without; then what could we do without our blessed hope—the hope of soon seeing Jesus, and being made like him? Truly ours is a blessed hope, sure and steadfast. How it gladdens our hearts as we toil on to know that redemption is so near, that we shall soon rest in the kingdom. How important that we gird up the loins of our minds, and press onward, having our thoughts brought into captivity to the obedience of Christ, and all our words seasoned with grace, and all we do done with an eye single to the glory of God.

May the Lord help us to purify our hearts by obeying the truth, live by every word that proceedeth out of his mouth, run the race set before us with patience, then we are sure of the prize—a home in the kingdom, free from sorrow; no ills to bear, no tears to wet our cheeks or damp our joys; but crowns of glory, palms of victory, the society of angels, and all the good and great of earth. The good are only great.

Press onward, weary pilgrims,
O, faint not by the way;
Jesus soon is coming,
All hail the glorious day!

Press onward, never falter,
The crown of life's before;
A few more days at longest
We'll reach that happy shore.

Press onward, lonely pilgrim,
O, keep the narrow way;
It leadeth to the City,
Which shines with brightest ray.

Press onward,—Jesus' coming,
O, don't you see the light?
The city of gold, with joys untold,
Is heaving now in sight.

Press onward! see! the angels
Are waiting on the shore,
To give us shouts of welcome
Where we shall part no more.

Press onward; there is Jesus;
We'll walk with him in white,
With all the saints and angels,
In that bright world of light.

From Bro. W. R. Clark.

Dear Brethren:—Through the Crisis I wish to confess my ever blessed Lord, and what he has done for me. One year ago I took a violent cold, which settled in my throat, which was very painful for five days, and much swollen, so much so that I could not eat, or scarcely breathe. I did what I could for it, but to no purpose. The neighbors said, Get a doctor. I thought they could do nothing.

On the fifth day, at evening, it was at the worst; and I thought I could not live long, yet I felt firm and resigned. I wanted to live if it was God's will, and I looked up and said, Lord, help me, for vain is the help of man. I thought if I could eat, I would like to take the last supper of our Lord, in remembrance of him. All of a sudden, the walls of the west side of the house were gone, the rest stood firm, and to the west I saw a company of men coming, and as they drew near, I saw it was the Lord, and some half dozen of his disciples. They looked tired and travel worn, and were all dressed in plain linen garments, and the disciples passed on without compassion, and were hidden from my sight; but the Lord stopped in front of me, and looked very weary, and I spake and said, Lord, if thou wilt, thou canst heal me, as thou didst in the days of old. And the Lord smiled on me, and passed on behind the wall yet standing, and in an instant I felt my throat open, and the pain was gone, and the swelling also. Then I rejoiced and praised the Lord, for I saw the blood of the covenant, and could see through the floor to the grave, which I had escaped, and like Jacob of old I camped alone that night long to be remembered, and praised the Lord on towards the break of day. It was a plain vision, for I saw the country, and the great halls of a great building, like the country and temple of the days of the Lord's travels in doing good. Some ten years before, I saw him in Pilate's hall, arrayed for crucifixion, and the soldier's mocking him, which overcame me. This, also, I saw with my eyes open, in the day time.

Dear brethren, twice I have seen Him in his humiliation, and with you I hope to see Him in all his glory soon. Come, Lord Jesus.

Piqua, Jan. Wm. H. Clark.

From Bro. B. Perham.

Bro. Grant:—I am very much pleased to find so many letters in the Crisis on the life and death question, and on the evidence of the near coming of our Redeemer. How much I admired Bro. O. R. Fassett's concluding article in a late Crisis. It was excellent indeed. I feel heartily thankful that so many are engaged in the noble work of spreading the truth on those two important subjects. I wish I was able to do more.

I am sorry to think that our brethren do not manifest a greater anxiety to assist in every possible way to spread the most important truths that are brought to view in God's holy word; for I would in kindness ask any candid person how those thousands and millions of professors of religion can be saved at the coming of Christ, when, in fact, they have fought and braced themselves with all their might against the most important truths that can be found in the Bible, and predicate their salvation on the heathen dogma of immortal-soulism, which does away with the necessity of a resurrection, and virtually robs Christ of the credit of his great mission from heaven to earth, which was to save us from the second death, and give us eternal life.

Vernon, Vt. B. Perham.

From S. D. Deyo.

Bro. Grant:—Having been a reader of your paper for a number of years, and with great pleasure, I wish to converse a while with my brethren in Christ. I am a lover of truth, and have sought to know it and preach it to dying men and women. But I am old and broken down; yet I want the cause of Christ to prosper, truth to prevail, and error to fall to the ground. Some inquire, What is truth? Jesus says, "Thy word is truth." John 17: 19. "Sanctify them through thy truth; thy word is truth." So let us dig deep, and apply it in its proper place. When God says, "Be ye holy," is it not to be sinless? and what is it that defileth a man? It is sin. That which cometh out of the mouth, not what he eats or drinks, if it is with thanksgiving. Happy the man who sins not in word or deed. So let us be careful not to unchristianize a brother because he eats or drinks what you and I cannot. Do not live by bread alone, but by every word of God, for it is yea and amen.

I am a frail mortal. I go stumbling along, laboring to keep my eye on the mark, wading through this world of sin and drunkenness, with the spirit of the day, strife, hatred, malice, selfishness, fighting, killing one another, pride. Some of our brethren and sisters wear gold, and think it no harm. To some it would be sin, so it would be to me; but shall I say to my brother or sister, you cannot see the kingdom, nor enter in, because you wear it? It is not for me to say. God looks not at the outward appearance, but on the heart. Son, or daughter, give me thy heart. If so, all is well. If not, all is lost. No life eternal, no crown of glory, no seat in his kingdom. The Lord help you and me to lay aside the sin that doth so easily beset us, and run with patience the race set before us, and so run that we may obtain. Look ahead, that we may foresee the evil, and flee to the Rock (Christ) for shelter; he will hide us, and save us in his kingdom. S. D. Deyo.

From Bro. T. H. Walker.

Bro. Grant:—Sister Anna E. Smith, Sister Bojde, and Brn. Wilkerson and Campbell from New York, were here according to appointment, the 18th of January, to hold a protracted meeting in this place. At the first meeting two went forward for prayers, and the next evening there were six. The meeting continued eighteen days. It was a blessed meeting from beginning to end. To God be all the glory. There were twenty-eight reclaimed and converted. After the first two or three days the house was filled daily until the close of the meeting. The people came from east and west, three or four miles, and were very anxious to hear the truth. We think that prejudice is on the decrease.

Obituaries.

Dixon. Fell asleep, Sept. 10th, 1865, Hattie Hastings, youngest child of Charles F. and Sarah E. Dixon, aged four months and nineteen days.

Rest, little sufferer, rest!
Naught shall disturb thee now,
Earth, now receive thy guest,
Hold her to thy breast,
With grief we bow.

'Tis thus the loved and fair
Are torn from our embrace;
Birdling of sunny hair,
Gift beautiful and rare,
Go to the place—

The place where all do go,
The young, the gay, the proud,
Each in their snow-white shroud,
Wail! wail! ye weepers loud,
For great your woe.

This shall not always be,
Death shall not thus invade
Our homes, and cast a shade;
By faith the day we see,
That makes us free.

Then peace, my troubled soul,
Though waves of sorrow roll
Around thee now. That peace
Shall come, that will release
Thy burdened soul.

Munson. Died in Whateley, Mass., Feb. 19th, 1866, Bro. Oseo Munson, aged seventy-two years.

He had been for many years a devoted follower of Christ, and had not ceased day nor night to warn his neighbors to flee from the wrath to come. He died, as he lived, a good man.

Words of comfort by the writer, from Psalm 37: 37,—"Mark the perfect man, and behold the upright; for the end of that man is peace."

E. McCulloch.

☞ The last sale of negroes in the Valley of Virginia, was made by a gentleman of Stanton, April 9, 1865. He sold two negro children, aged nine and twelve years, for 5000 cabbage plants.

Summary of News.

FOREIGN.

Queenstown 11th.

Political news unimportant.

The cattle plague was the leading topic in both Houses. The Morning Herald believes that the existence of the Ministry depends upon the way it deals with the subject.

The Dublin police had discovered a second extensive Fenian manufactory of ammunition in that city. Some soldiers charged with Fenianism were being court martialed.

It was stated that Austria was about to send a note to Prussia, firmly refusing the demand of the latter in regard to the Duchies.

Queen Isabella's baby has been christened. The godparents were the King and Queen of the Belgians, represented for the occasion by the Belgian Minister and the Princess Royal, Maria Isabel of Spain. The Papal Nuncio officiated, and the water sprinkled on the child's head was carried for the purpose from the Jordan. All the dignitaries of the State and the foreign diplomacy attended the ceremony. The Infante has received at the font one hundred twelve names, "comprehending," as the official papers inform us, "all the invocations of the Most Holy Virgin." The first and real name, however, is that of the blessed Francisco de Asia.

The benediction of the waters of the Neva by the Metropolitan of Novgorod and St. Petersburg was lately celebrated with great pomp in the presence of the Imperial family.

Notwithstanding the assertions of the Journal de St. Petersburg that Russia is making no military preparations, a very unusual activity has been observed of late in her fortresses and arsenals. There have been special inspections of troops at Warsaw, Kijow, Riga, and many other towns. In the fortresses very costly experiments in mining are frequently made, and the soldiers who were employed as laborers have been ordered to rejoin their regiments.

Valparaiso dates of Jan. 17, and Callao of 28th, confirm the declaration of war by Peru against Spain, but hostilities had not yet commenced. The blockade of Caldera had been raised, and the Spanish squadron was concentrating at Valparaiso. Five or six sailing vessels had been burned by the Spaniards. The Chilian coast is now open to trade. Several vessels from Europe had been warned away from Valparaiso and had gone to other ports. The Peruvian squadron had been sent to join the Chilian squadron. All Spaniards in Peru are given a certain time to register their names, failing in which they are treated as spies.

DOMESTIC.

Revivals among the Methodists.—Our New York correspondent "Observer" sends the following account of revivals in Methodist churches in different sections of the country:—Journal.

"A remarkable revival interest is experienced in the Methodist church in this section and throughout the West. Nothing like it has been experienced before since 1857, and even then it was not so powerful in many places as at present. The editor of the Christian Advocate of this city says, 'for the last three weeks we could have nearly filled the Advocate with revival communications, but have been compelled for lack of space to give them in the briefest possible form.' A correspondent of the same paper says that within the bounds of the Holston Conference in East Tennessee, recently organized by the Methodist Episcopal Church, of members that belonged to the Southern Methodist Church, eight thousand at least, have professed conversion and united with the church, and the work is still progressing. In Towanda, Pa., the revival is so powerful that the places of business are nearly all closed, and lawyers, doctors, merchants, mechanics, the rich and the poor, are equally interested and laboring to promote the work. In Indiana and Ohio the revival is very powerful and extensive. In the small town of Delaware, in the latter State, no less than three hundred have professed conversion, most of whom have united with the church. In the city of Philadelphia the revival is quite general. The pastor of the Emory Church writes that over four hundred have been converted and there is no abatement to the work.

The Methodists regard this general revival interest as being in answer to prayer, which was offered in all their churches on the first Sabbath in January for the blessing of God upon the Centennary year."

A Moonless Month.—This month of February, 1866, which is now almost gone, will be marked in the astronomical calendar as the month which had no full moon! January had two full moons, and March will have two, but February has none. Of course this peculiar conjuncture of periods that makes the full moon show her face but a few hours before the month comes in, and again a few hours after the month goes out, is a rare thing in nature—but how rare, do you suppose, gentle reader? It has not occurred before in your lifetime, nor ours—not since the time of Washington; not since the discovery of America by Columbus; no, nor since the Christian era, nor since the fall of Adam, nor since the creation of the world, unless that be placed back myriads of years, and it will not occur again, according to the computation of astronomers, for two millions and a half of years.—N. Y. Evangelist.

A Trait of Louis Napoleon.—A Paris letter says that whenever the Emperor wishes to retain the memory of anything he hears in conversation he makes a note of it on a blank book, which is always on his writing desk; he tears out the leaf on which he has written the note, reads it attentively, and then tears it up. This habit one day greatly puzzled the Prince de Metternich, the Austrian Ambassador, to whom his Majesty was giving audience. The Ambassador expressed his astonishment and curiosity. His Majesty at once gratified it by saying that whenever he once wrote and afterwards read attentively the written note he never forgot it.

Curious Prophecy.—The following prediction is a great deal talked about: It is said that at the death of the present Pope, a darkness so intense that it may, as it were, be felt, will overspread the whole world for three days. During that time, no fire or light of any kind will burn except blessed candles.

President Johnson will soon issue a proclamation declaring that the republic is at peace, and that the war for the suppression of the rebellion is ended.

He has notified Gen. Howard, Superintendent of the Freedmen's Bureau, that the expiration of the operations of that bureau, limited by the law establishing it to one year after the close of the war, will be closed one year after the date of this proclamation.

ITEMS.

☞ New Orleans is to be lighted by three thousand petroleum lamps.

☞ In Southern Italy the clergy are doing their utmost to prevent the introduction of civil marriages among the people. Not only is civil marriage denounced from the pulpit as unlawful, as in Genoa, but absolution and extreme unction are denied to those who are not married in a church.

☞ One of Maximilian's recent extravagances was sending to Europe for one thousand trees to adorn a new highway.

☞ A contagion has broken out in the bee-hives of certain districts in France. A distinct sort of infusoria fastens on the bee, and multiplies on his body with such rapidity that death ensues in a few hours.

☞ A letter from San Francisco says that city has become a rendezvous for rogues and cut throats from all parts of the South. Such a thing as respect for law is not known. Murders are of almost daily occurrence.

☞ Rev. Alexander Campbell, the leader in the reform in the Baptist church popularly known as "Campbellism," died in Kentucky lately.

☞ There are reports of the appearance of a disease among cattle, resembling the rinderpest, in Montgomery county, Pennsylvania. The State Senate has appointed a special committee to make an investigation.

☞ The excavations now making at Pompeii have brought to light several vestiges of the ancient Christians. In the palace of the Edile Pansa, in the Via Fortuna, an unfinished sculptured cross has been found on one of the wells, as well as abusive inscriptions and caricatures ridiculing a crucified God.

☞ The committee appointed to inquire into the origin of the fires which have been lately so frequent in the forests of Algeria, has concluded its report. It attributes the fires to Mahometan fanaticism, and says they are connected with the projects of a holy war, which are entertained at Mecca. The committee proposes to compensate the proprietors of the forests, and re-establish the principle of collective responsibility in regard to the Algerian tribes.

Northern New York Conference.

This conference will be held at the Red School-House in Lorraine, Jefferson County, commencing Tuesday evening, March 6th, and continue as long as it seems duty. We hope to have a good meeting. Let there be a general rally. Come, brethren and sisters, praying for God's blessing.

C. E. Sweet.
C. H. Williams.

Minnesota Quarterly Meeting.

The third quarterly meeting of the Minnesota conference will be held (Providence not preventing) in the Dudley school-house, near Utica station, commencing on Saturday afternoon, at 2 o'clock, March 31st, and continue over the following Sunday. As it is the last general meeting prior to the annual conference, we hope to see a general attendance of ministers and people throughout the state.

Thos. K. Allen, Sec.

Maine Eastern Conference.

The Eastern Maine Conference will be held at Corinna Mills, to commence March 1st, at 2 P. M., and continue over Lord's day. We want the preaching brethren to be faithful in attendance, and if any from other States, or from the west part of this State, should read this notice, and feel that the Lord says "Go," we hope and pray they may come, filled with the Spirit.

In behalf of the brethren, J. Damman.

Notice.

The third quarterly meeting of the N. Y. Christian Association will be held at Brockport, Monroe Co., N. Y., commencing Friday, March 2d, and continue over the following Sunday. Come brethren and sisters, let there be a general gathering to this meeting, and come praying for the Lord's blessing.

C. B. Turner, for the Board.

Maine Second Advent Tract Society.

Wm. H. Mitchell, R. R. York, S. K. Partridge, } Executive Board.

I. C. Wellcome, Treasurer and Business Agent.

It is desired that all orders for tracts and books for distribution by this Society be addressed to the Agent, I. C. Wellcome, Yarmouth, Me., who will supply them as fast as the means are furnished.

All our ministers will receive subscriptions for the Tract Fund, and they purpose to raise $300, or more, for free distribution in Maine for 1866.

I. C. Wellcome, Agent.

"The Christian."

The number for January contains "Fishers of Men," "Prayer for the Sailor," "Introductory," "Notes of Discourses No. 1," "Blind Bartimeous" (poetry), "Marks Good and Bad," "The Double Freedom," "I shall rest" (poetry and music), "Come to Christ" (poetry), "Sold Cheep," "The Good Master," Notices, etc., all by H. L. Hastings. Also, "De Gruchy and De Carterette," "William Tennent, or Deliverance through a Dream," "Infidelity testifying to the Truth of Prophecy," "Andrew Duncan," etc. Each of these articles are soon to be published as tracts, if the Lord will.

The second number will contain articles of similar character, and will be prepared as early as practicable. Persons wishing to distribute these papers can have any quantity by ordering them in advance, at $3.00 per 100, at the repository, or by express or mail at $4.00 per 100. No. 1 was offered at $3.00 per 100 by mail, but the postage being larger than was anticipated, this advance in price becomes necessary. These rates are intended to be permanent.

The subscription price is 60 cents per year, 10 copies for $5.00. Ten copies for free distribution in Sunday schools, or elsewhere, $4.00. To the poor, and to preachers who will act as agents for it, free. Address all orders to

H. L. HASTINGS, } Scriptural Tract Repository, 19 Lindall St., Boston.

Correspondence.

From Bro. L. Boutell.

Bro. Grant:—As our object is to scatter light and truth, and by every possible means to reform men, morally and theologically, I wish to say that I have received and read the "Christian," just issued by Bro. H. L. Hastings, from his tract repository, and I consider it an efficient auxiliary to our weekly paper in the pleasurable work of making men better. It is adapted to old and young, to rich and poor, in short, to all classes. When welcomed into families, with its variety, it will do all good.

It is the thing to scatter as on the wings of the wind. The first piece, "Fishers of Men," characteristic, but instructive, pithy, worthy to be heeded by all the church, especially by those to whom is committed the living oracles, and, instead of Christ, are beseeching men to be reconciled to God. "Talks to Young men" is well calculated, if given heed to by the youth, to save from shame and infamy in after life. "Large print tracts," easily read and more easily digested, adapted to children and profitable to all who would not be slaves to habit and sell their birthright for nought. The power of "faith in prayer, trusting the promises of God," bringing needed relief in extremity when every thing else fails, truthfully illustrated in narrative, showing the faithfulness of the living God, is not less important to inspire confidence and holy trust in all the believing.

Finally, there seems to be nothing in the "Christian" but what would be beneficial to the reader, entreating him to cease to be bad and learn to be good, to leave the wrong and do the right, and thus make a "mark" monumental of good to be admired by all who love God, good and right. It can be had with or without money, No. 19 Lindall street, Boston. Send and get it; read and scatter it among your neighbors as fast as possible. Let us save all we can. Time is short.

L. Boutell.

From Bro. J. E. Ainsworth.

Brethren and Sisters:—I write a few lines to you through the Crisis, believing that we are very near the great day of God. How shall we appear before him? Have we the wedding garment? is it unspotted? does the light shine upon our pathway? do we know where we are? shall we be glad to see Jesus? can we say from the heart, Lo, this is our God, we have waited for him? If so, we may be glad and rejoice in his salvation.

Paul says to the Hebrews, Let us hold fast the profession of our faith, without wavering; for he is faithful that promised. And let us consider one another to provoke unto love and to good works. Not forsaking the assembling of ourselves together as the manner of some is, but exhorting one another; and so much the more, as ye see the day approaching. Thus we are trying to do in Brimfield. There are but a few of us, yet we get together every Lord's day. We claim the promise, and get the blessing; therefore we have confidence in the promises of God, that whatsoever we ask in faith, believing, we shall have.

Perhaps some of the readers of the Crisis will remember a short letter that was published in the Crisis about a year ago, in reference to scouring up the jewels; that the writer believed there were some in Brimfield yet that might be scoured, and that his house would be a good scouring place, and inquired if there were not some of God's ministers who would come this way and help us? yet none of those whose names were mentioned have been near us. Nevertheless, from that time we commenced meeting together, once in two weeks, and experienced such a blessing by so doing, that we felt that every week would not be too often.

Thus far the goodness and mercy of God have led us along. We feel that we can testify to the truth, that when God's people walk in accordance with his word, that word will be a light to them in all the ways of righteousness.

Dear brethren, is this all that is required of us, to meet together to exhort and pray? Are there not other duties taught us in the word of God, to which we are to take heed? How shall we perform the sacrament if there be no head to the body? As we receive the light, so should we walk in it.

Yours, looking for Jesus soon to come,
John E. Ainsworth.

Brethren and Sisters:—Through the providence of God, and the kindness of Bro. Grant, I am permitted once more to address you. Six months ago I expected never to see another new year dawn. For five long months I have been confined to the house, three, mostly to my bed. I had marked out a very different path in which to walk, but my Father has been testing me, whether my faith stood in the power of God, giving me lessons in trust, patience, and submission to his will.

In the early part of my sickness I was brought to the entrance of the "dark valley," but without a fear, "leaning my head on Jesus' breast," I implored the everlasting arms to be underneath me, when O, what peace filled my heart. Sweetly came these words of Jesus, "I say unto you that I will pray the Father for you, for the Father himself loveth you, because ye have loved me." O! what precious views of the character and love of my dear Savior I enjoyed, while struggling against the evidences that I was a mortal, dying worm. Never before had the relation to him seemed so near and dear. The dearest earthly friend was powerless now, but my Savior had the keys of death, and had "numbered all my dust till he should bid it rise," and I was satisfied if I could "awake in his likeness."

Pleasant was the thought that the last conflict was nearly over, battling against sin, and that never more should I grieve my heavenly Father by my imperfect endeavors to serve him, but rest, and home, and glory, were mine. I did not forget I was to leave my children amid the perils of these last days, but I knew the care my God could take of them would be such as his love and wisdom could bestow, and even a mother's love and care could not compare with this. Committing them to him, I felt he could use such instruments as his wisdom saw fit to bring them home, knowing if he saw they needed me, he could have kept me from the "tyrant's" power. All I asked was that he would bring them to his kingdom with me when I awoke.

Contrary to the expectation of all, I revived, and slowly recovered. I supposed my life work done, but again I am called to duty and labor, and will you, who know the worth of prayer, raise one fervent petition that God will help me to "live unto the Lord"? If it is only in my own home circle, I pray God to help me do it faithfully there, remembering it is not doing good alone, but being good that must be my aim. May God help us to be every day christians, as well as meeting christians.

Do you suppose the world charms me now? That its fashions and follies absorb my mind? Standing, as it were, upon the "Delectable Mountains," my soul is filled with rapture as I look forward to the promised land, and I watch each omen of my coming Lord "more than they that watch for the morning." I long to behold the face of my Redeemer, and hear that swelling chorus vibrate through the vault of heaven, "Worthy is the Lamb that was slain to receive power, and riches, and wisdom, and strength, and honor, and glory, and blessing. Alleluia:—for the marriage of the Lamb is come, and his wife hath made herself ready." Will not the marriage of a bride to a bridegroom receiving such an estate transcend any thing of earth?

O, my God, wilt thou permit such a worm as I to sit down to that marriage supper? How can I love thee as I ought, who hast such riches of grace in store for me! and so soon to receive it. Blissful thought. How my soul is moved while I see men grasping after bubbles instead of this glorious crown, shadows instead of this enduring substance. How I long to tell them how much more blessed and sweet it is to be a child of God, a joint heir with Christ.

Yours waiting for the morning,
Sarah A. Gilman.
South Windsor, Ct.

From Bro. R. S. Jackson.

Bro. Grant:—I would like to say to our brethren who are called of God to stand upon the walls of Zion, how gladly would I (had I the means) defray the expenses of some one or more of them, and bid them welcome to a pilgrim's home while here, could they come and preach the truth to the people. How willingly would I support a preacher, and his family, too, for the unspeakable pleasure of hearing the gospel, and giving the people the privilege of hearing on the Lord's coming. But, alas! I have but very little means; yet, if some of our efficient laborers could come, I would rejoice to welcome them to my humble home as long as they wish to stay, and try and do a little besides.

I have not heard an Advent sermon since I left Poultney, Vt., two years ago. I am trying to live a christian, and let my little light shine. I am circulating those tracts which you sent me, and some are interested. Some express a wish to hear the living preacher. How often I have seen in the Crisis a string of appointments from some good brother, and end with—"If these conflict with others," etc. I have thought if that brother knew the moral destitution of the West, he would go out in the strength of the Lord, and sound the cry in this region.

O that the Lord would open the hearts of his children to sustain the heralds of the cross in their arduous labors. Pray for me.

From Bro. H. N. Chamberlin.

Dear Pilgrims:—How glad I am Jesus is coming so soon to redeem his people, to gather his saints to the marriage supper of the Lamb, to give them eternal life in the kingdom of God. We are living in a cold, selfish world, surrounded with wicked influences, and our pathway is beset with snares and temptations, foes within and foes without; then what could we do without our blessed hope—the hope of soon seeing Jesus, and being made like him? Truly ours is a blessed hope, sure and steadfast. How it gladdens our hearts as we toil on to know that redemption is so near, that we shall soon rest in the kingdom. How important that we gird up the loins of our minds, and press onward, having our thoughts brought into captivity to the obedience of Christ, and all our words seasoned with grace, and all we do done with an eye single to the glory of God.

May the Lord help us to purify our hearts by obeying the truth, live by every word that proceedeth out of his mouth, run the race set before us with patience, then we are sure of the prize—a home in the kingdom, free from sorrow; no ills to bear, no tears to wet our cheeks or damp our joys; but crowns of glory, palms of victory, the society of angels, and all the good and great of earth. The good are only great.

Press onward, weary pilgrims,
O, faint not by the way;
Jesus soon is coming,
All hail the glorious day!

Press onward, never falter,
The crown of life's before;
A few more days at longest
We'll reach that happy shore.

Press onward, lonely pilgrim,
O, keep the narrow way;
It leadeth to the City,
Which shines with brightest ray.

Press onward,—Jesus' coming,
O, don't you see the light?
The city of gold, with joys untold,
Is heaving now in sight.

Press onward! see! the angels
Are waiting on the shore,
To give us shouts of welcome
Where we shall part no more.

Press onward; there is Jesus;
We'll walk with him in white,
With all the saints and angels,
In that bright world of light.

Alton, N. H. H. N. Chamberlin.

From Bro. W. H. Clark.

Dear Brethren:—Through the Crisis I wish to confess my ever blessed Lord, and what he has done for me. One year ago I took a violent cold, which settled in my throat, which was very painful for five days, and much swollen, so much so that I could not eat, or scarcely breathe. I did what I could for it, but to no purpose. The neighbors said, Get a doctor. I thought they could do nothing.

On the fifth day, at evening, it was at the worst, and I thought I could not live long, yet I felt firm and resigned. I wanted to live if it was God's will, and I looked up and said, Lord, help me, for vain is the help of man. I thought if I could eat, I would like to take the last supper of our Lord, in remembrance of him. All of a sudden, the walls of the west side of the house were gone, the rest stood firm, and to the west I saw a company of men coming, and as they drew near, I saw it was the Lord, and some half dozen of his disciples. They looked tired and travel worn, and were all dressed in plain linen garments, and the disciples passed on without compassion, and were hidden from my sight; but the Lord stopped in front of me, and looked very weary; and I spake and said, Lord, if thou wilt, thou canst heal me, as thou didst in the days of old. And the Lord smiled on me, and passed on behind the wall yet standing, and in an instant I felt my throat open, and the pain was gone, and the swelling also. Then I rejoiced and praised the Lord, for I saw the blood of the covenant, and could see through the floor to the grave, which I had escaped, and like Jacob of old I camped alone that night long to be remembered, and praised the Lord on towards the break of day. It was a plain vision, for I saw the country, and the great halls of a great building, like the country and temple of the days of the Lord's travels in doing good. Some ten years before, I saw him in Pilate's hall, arrayed for crucifixion, and the soldier's mocking him, which overcame me. This, also, I saw with my eyes open, in the day time.

Dear brethren, twice I have seen Him in his humiliation, and with you I hope to see Him in all his glory soon. Come, Lord Jesus.

Piqua, Jan. Wm. H. Clark.

From Bro. B. Perham.

Bro. Grant:—I am very much pleased to find so many letters in the Crisis on the life and death question, and on the evidence of the near coming of our Redeemer. How much I admired Bro. O. R. Fassett's concluding article in a late Crisis. It was excellent indeed. I feel heartily thankful that so many are engaged in the noble work of spreading the truth on those two important subjects. I wish I was able to do more.

I am sorry to think that our brethren do not manifest a greater anxiety to assist in every possible way to spread the most important truths that are brought to view in God's holy word; for I would in kindness ask any candid person how those thousands and millions of professors of religion can be saved at the coming of Christ, when, in fact, they have fought and braced themselves with all their might against the most important truths that can be found in the Bible, and predicate their salvation on the heathen dogma of immortal-soulism, which does away with the necessity of a resurrection, and virtually robs Christ of the credit of his great mission from heaven to earth, which was to save us from the second death, and give us eternal life.

Vernon, Vt. B. Perham.

From S. D. Deyo.

Bro. Grant:—Having been a reader of your paper for a number of years, and with great pleasure, I wish to converse a while with my brethren in Christ. I am a lover of truth, and have sought to know it and preach it to dying men and women. But I am old and broken down; yet I want the cause of Christ to prosper, truth to prevail, and error to fall to the ground. Some inquire, What is truth? Jesus says, "Thy word is truth." John 17: 19. "Sanctify them through thy truth; thy word is truth." So let us dig deep, and apply it in its proper place. When God says, "Be ye holy," is it not to be sinless? and what is it that defileth a man? It is sin. That which cometh out of the mouth, not what he eats or drinks, if it is with thanksgiving. Happy the man who sins not in word or deed. So let us be careful not to unchristianize a brother because he eats or drinks what you and I cannot. Do not live by bread alone, but by every word of God, for it is yea and amen.

I am a frail mortal. I go stumbling along, laboring to keep my eye on the mark, wading through this world of sin and drunkenness, with the spirit of the day, strife, hatred, malice, selfishness, fighting, killing one another, pride. Some of our brethren and sisters wear gold, and think it no harm. To some it would be sin, so it would be to me; but shall I say to my brother or sister, you cannot see the kingdom, nor enter in, because you wear it? It is not for me to say. God looks not at the outward appearance, but on the heart. Son, or daughter, give me thy heart. If so, all is well. If not, all is lost. No life eternal, no crown of glory, no seat in his kingdom. The Lord help you and me to lay aside the sin that doth so easily beset us, and run with patience the race set before us, and so run that we may obtain. Look ahead, that we may foresee the evil, and flee to the Rock (Christ) for shelter; he will hide us, and save us in his kingdom. S. D. Deyo.

From Bro. T. H. Walker.

Bro. Grant:—Sister Anna E. Smith, Sister Boide, and Brn. Wilkerson and Campbell from New York, were here according to appointment, the 18th of January, to hold a protracted meeting in this place. At the first meeting two went forward for prayers, and the next evening there were six. The meeting continued eighteen days. It was a blessed meeting from beginning to end. To God be all the glory. There were twenty-eight reclaimed and converted. After the first two or three days the house was filled daily until the close of the meeting. The people came from east and west, three or four miles, and were very anxious to hear the truth. We think that prejudice is on the decrease.

Dixon. Fell asleep, Sept. 10th, 1865, Hattie Hastings, youngest child of Charles F. and Sarah E. Dixon, aged four months and nineteen days.

Rest, little sufferer, rest!
Naught shall disturb thee now,
Earth, now receive thy guest,
Hold her to thy breast,
With grief we bow.

'Tis thus the loved and fair
Are torn from our embrace;
Birdling of sunny hair,
Gift beautiful and rare,
Go to the place—

The place where all do go,
The young, the gay, the proud,
Each in their snow-white shroud,
Wail! wail! ye weepers loud,
For great your woe.

This shall not always be,
Death shall not thus invade
Our homes, and cast a shade;
By faith the day we see,
That makes us free.

Then peace, my troubled soul,
Though waves of sorrow roll
Around thee now. That peace
Shall come, that will release
Thy burdened soul.

Munson. Died in Whateley, Mass., Feb. 19th, 1866, Bro. Osee Munson, aged seventy-two years.

He had been for many years a devoted follower of Christ, and had not ceased day nor night to warn his neighbors to flee from the wrath to come. He died, as he lived, a good man.

Words of comfort by the writer, from Psalm 37: 37,—"Mark the perfect man, and behold the upright; for the end of that man is peace."

Queenstown 11th.

Political news unimportant.

The cattle plague was the leading topic in both Houses. The Morning Herald believes that the existence of the Ministry depends upon the way it deals with the subject.

The Dublin police had discovered a second extensive Fenian manufactory of ammunition in that city. Some soldiers charged with Fenianism were being court martialed.

It was stated that Austria was about to send a note to Prussia, firmly refusing the demand of the latter in regard to the Duchies.

Queen Isabella's baby has been christened. The godparents were the King and Queen of the Belgians, represented for the occasion by the Belgian Minister and the Princess Royal, Maria Isabel of Spain. The Papal Nuncio officiated, and the water sprinkled on the child's head was carried for the purpose from the Jordan. All the dignitaries of the State and the foreign diplomacy attended the ceremony. The Infante has received at the font one hundred twelve names, "comprehending," as the official papers inform us, "all the invocations of the Most Holy Virgin." The first and real name, however, is that of the blessed Francisco de Asis.

The benediction of the waters of the Neva by the Metropolitan of Novgorod and St. Petersburg was lately celebrated with great pomp in the presence of the Imperial family.

Notwithstanding the assertions of the Journal de St. Petersburg that Russia is making no military preparations, a very unusual activity has been observed of late in her fortresses and arsenals. There have been special inspections of troops at Warsaw, Kijow, Riga, and many other towns. In the fortresses very costly experiments in mining are frequently made, and the soldiers who were employed as laborers have been ordered to rejoin their regiments.

Valparaiso dates of Jan. 17, and Callao of 28th, confirm the declaration of war by Peru against Spain, but hostilities had not yet commenced. The blockade of Caldera had been raised, and the Spanish squadron was concentrating at Valparaiso. Five or six sailing vessels had been burned by the Spaniards. The Chilian coast is now open to trade. Several vessels from Europe had been warned away from Valparaiso and had gone to other ports. The Peruvian squadron had been sent to join the Chilian squadron. All Spaniards in Peru are given a certain time to register their names, failing in which they are treated as spies.

Revivals among the Methodists.—Our New York correspondent "Observer" sends the following account of revivals in Methodist churches in different sections of the country:—Journal.

"A remarkable revival interest is experienced in the Methodist church in this section and throughout the West. Nothing like it has been experienced before since 1857, and even then it was not so powerful in many places as at present. The editor of the Christian Advocate of this city says, 'for the last three weeks we could have nearly filled the Advocate with revival communications, but have been compelled for lack of space to give them in the briefest possible form.' A correspondent of the same paper says that within the bounds of the Holston Conference in East Tennessee, recently organized by the Methodist Episcopal Church, of members that belonged to the Southern Methodist Church, eight thousand at least, have professed conversion and united with the church, and the work is still progressing. In Towanda, Pa., the revival is so powerful that the places of business are nearly all closed, and lawyers, doctors, merchants, mechanics, the rich and the poor, are equally interested and laboring to promote the work. In Indiana and Ohio the revival is very powerful and extensive. In the small town of Delaware, in the latter State, no less than three hundred have professed conversion, most of whom have united with the church. In the city of Philadelphia the revival is quite general. The pastor of the Emory Church writes that over four hundred have been converted and there is no abatement to the work.

The Methodists regard this general revival interest as being in answer to prayer, which was offered in all their churches on the first Sabbath in January for the blessing of God upon the Centennary year."

A Moonless Month.—This month of February, 1866, which is now almost gone, will be marked in the astronomical calendar as the month which had no full moon! January had two full moons, and March will have two, but February has none. Of course this peculiar conjuncture of periods that makes the full moon show her face but a few hours before the month comes in, and again a few hours after the month goes out, is a rare thing in nature—but how rare, do you suppose, gentle reader? It has not occurred before in your lifetime, nor ours—not since the time of Washington; not since the discovery of America by Columbus; no, nor since the Christian era, nor since the fall of Adam, nor since the creation of the world, unless that be placed back myriads of years, and it will not occur again, according to the computation of astronomers, for two millions and a half of years.—N. Y. Evangelist.

A Trait of Louis Napoleon.—A Paris letter says that whenever the Emperor wishes to retain the memory of anything he hears in conversation he makes a note of it on a blank book, which is always on his writing desk; he tears out the leaf on which he has written the note, reads it attentively, and then tears it up. This habit one day greatly puzzled the Prince de Metternich, the Austrian Ambassador, to whom his Majesty was giving audience. The Ambassador expressed his astonishment and curiosity. His Majesty at once gratified it by saying that whenever he once wrote and afterwards read attentively the written note he never forgot it.

Curious Prophecy.—The following prediction is a great deal talked about: It is said that at the death of the present Pope, a darkness so intense that it may, as it were, be felt, will overspread the whole world for three days. During that time, no fire or light of any kind will burn except blessed candles.

President Johnson will soon issue a proclamation declaring that the republic is at peace, and that the war for the suppression of the rebellion is ended.

He has notified Gen. Howard, Superintendent of the Freedmen's Bureau, that the expiration of the operations of that bureau, limited by the law establishing it to one year after the close of the war, will be closed one year after the date of this proclamation.

ITEMS.

☞ New Orleans is to be lighted by three thousand petroleum lamps.

☞ In Southern Italy the clergy are doing their utmost to prevent the introduction of civil marriages among the people. Not only is civil marriage denounced from the pulpit as unlawful, as in Genoa, but absolution and extreme unction are denied to those who are not married in a church.

☞ One of Maximilian's recent extravagances was sending to Europe for one thousand trees to adorn a new highway.

☞ Discoveries of inexhaustible gold deposits, richer than California, are reported in the state of Michoacan.

☞ A contagion has broken out in the bee-hives of certain districts in France. A distinct sort of infusoria fastens on the bee, and multiplies on his body with such rapidity that death ensues in a few hours.

☞ A letter from San Francisco says that city has become a rendezvous for rogues and cut throats from all parts of the South. Such a thing as respect for law is not known. Murders are of almost daily occurrence.

☞ Rev. Alexander Campbell, the leader in the reform in the Baptist church popularly known as "Campbellism," died in Kentucky lately.

☞ There are reports of the appearance of a disease among cattle, resembling the rinderpest, in Montgomery county, Pennsylvania. The State Senate has appointed a special committee to make an investigation.

☞ The excavations now making at Pompeii have brought to light several vestiges of the ancient Christians. In the palace of the Edile Pansa, in the Via Fortuna, an unfinished sculptured cross has been found on one of the wells, as well as abusive inscriptions and caricatures ridiculing a crucified God.

☞ The committee appointed to inquire into the origin of the fires which have been lately so frequent in the forests of Algeria, has concluded its report. It attributes the fires to Mahometan fanaticism, and says they are connected with the projects of a holy war, which are entertained at Mecca. The committee proposes to compensate the proprietors of the forests, and re-establish the principle of collective responsibility in regard to the Algerian tribes.

Notices.

Northern New York Conference.

This conference will be held at the Red School-House in Lorraine, Jefferson County, commencing Tuesday evening, March 6th, and continue as long as it seems duty. We hope to have a good meeting. Let there be a general rally. Come, brethren and sisters, praying for God's blessing.

C. F. Sweet.
C. H. Williams.

Minnesota Quarterly Meeting.

The third quarterly meeting of the Minnesota conference will be held (Providence not preventing) in the Dudley school-house, near Utica station, commencing on Saturday afternoon, at 2 o'clock, March 31st, and continue over the following Sunday. As it is the last general meeting prior to the annual conference, we hope to see a general attendance of ministers and people throughout the state.

Thos. K. Allen, Sec.

Maine Eastern Conference.

The Eastern Maine Conference will be held at Corinna Mills, to commence March 1st, at 2 P. M., and continue over Lord's day. We want the preaching brethren to be faithful in attendance, and if any from other States, or from the west part of this State, should read this notice, and feel that the Lord says "Go," we hope and pray they may come, filled with the Spirit.

In behalf of the brethren, J. Damman.

Notice.

The third quarterly meeting of the N. Y. Christian Association will be held at Brockport, Monroe Co., N. Y., commencing Friday, March 2d, and continue over the following Sunday. Come brethren and sisters, let there be a general gathering to this meeting, and come praying for the Lord's blessing.

C. B. Turner, for the Board.

Maine Second Advent Tract Society.

Wm. H. Mitchell, R. R. York, S. K. Partridge, } Executive Board.

I. C. Wellcome, Treasurer and Business Agent.

It is desired that all orders for tracts and books for distribution by this Society be addressed to the Agent, I. C. Wellcome, Yarmouth, Me., who will supply them as fast as the means are furnished.

All our ministers will receive subscriptions for the Tract Fund, and they purpose to raise $200, or more, for free distribution in Maine for 1866.

I. C. Wellcome, Agent.

"The Christian."

The number for January contains "Fishers of Men," "Prayer for the Sailor," "Introductory," "Notes of Discourses No. 1," "Blind Bartimeous" (poetry), "Marks Good and Bad," "The Double Freedom," "I shall rest" (poetry and music), "Come to Christ" (poetry), "Sold Cheap," "The Good Master," Notices, etc., all by H. L. Hastings. Also, "De Gruchy and De Carterette," "William Tennent, or Deliverance through a Dream," "Infidelity testifying to the Truth of Prophecy," "Andrew Duncan," etc. Each of these articles are soon to be published as tracts, if the Lord will.

The second number will contain articles of similar character, and will be prepared as early as practicable. Persons wishing to distribute these papers can have any quantity by ordering them in advance, at $3.00 per 100, at the repository, or by express or mail at $4.00 per 100. No. 1 was offered at $3.00 per 100 by mail, but the postage being larger than was anticipated, this advance in price becomes necessary. These rates are intended to be permanent.

The subscription price is 60 cents per year, 10 copies for $5.00. Ten copies for free distribution in Sunday schools, or elsewhere, $4.00. To the poor, and to preachers who will act as agents for it, free. Address all orders to

H. L. Hastings, Scriptural Tract Repository, 19 Lindall St., Boston.

THE SYMPATHY OF JESUS.

The sympathy of Jesus—who
That ever sobbed one sorrowing moan
On some kind bosom, fondly true—
Some human bosom, like our own,
And felt how much those lips close pressed,
That hand close clasped, could calm our fears,
Can turn to this far tenderer breast,
Without a gush of thankful tears!

The earthly heart on which we lean,
May have its separate griefs to bear—
Griefs, though unspoken and unseen,
Yet rankling all the deeper there.
Its faltering strength may scarce sustain
The torture of its own distress;
And still we add our burdening pain,
Unconscious how the weight may press.

But He whose human feet have trod
Earth's hills and valleys—He who knew
No sympathy but that of God,
Though linked with all that craved it too—
Knows all our yearning, all our need,
Yet strong to bear our utmost smart—
He loves to feel the throbbing head
Close laid against his pitying heart.

To think that on the throne of thrones
He wears our lowly nature still!
To think that 'midst the loftiest tones
That through the eternal mansions thrill,
Earth's humblest pleader He will hear,
That only tears His anguish tell;
That sobbing voice falls on his ear
More sweet than Gabriel's ever fell.

Then, sorrowing spirit, take the grief
Thou ne'er to mortal couldst disclose,
And He will give thee sure relief,
Touched with the feeling of thy woes;
And thou shalt understand how sweet,
How filled with more than human bliss,
How dear, how tender, how complete
The sympathy of Jesus is!

PRAYING AND FASTING.

Dear Brethren and Friends:—We profess to believe we are very near the appointed time of the return of our long absent Lord; and, furthermore, that it is all important we have that gospel preparation by which we may be presented to Christ when he comes as a glorious church, "without spot, or wrinkle, or any such thing, being holy and without blemish." Now with some, perhaps with many of us, the great question is, how shall I attain to that full and complete preparation required, by which I may know, or have the assurance, that I shall be accepted of him? Many of us may feel conscious that we have entered in at the strait gate, and are now in the narrow way, temperate in all things, denying ungodliness and worldly lusts, living soberly, righteously and godly, avoiding every appearance of evil, and yet do not feel fully satisfied that we are now in just the position in which we wish the Lord to find us in.

Dear friends, let us test ourselves according to the gospel rules, even by fasting with prayer. Not for forty days, which is not required of us,—but are we not willing to fast occasionally, as much as one day, or, at least, with but one meal a day, and with earnest prayer and a calm and abiding trust and confidence, thus wait upon Him until we feel we have our petitions granted. If we are not willing to deny ourselves, and do as little as this, then it is time to be alarmed. It is easy to excuse ourselves, but the willing and obedient only are blessed.

When Jesus was led up into the wilderness to be tempted of the devil, he fasted, and said, "Man shall not live by bread alone, but by every word that proceedeth out of the mouth of God." Fastings are evidently and plainly enjoined upon the true children during the absence of their Lord, as stated, "But the days will come (mark, not day, but days) when the bridegroom shall be taken away from them, and then shall they fast in those days.' Luke 5; 35.

Now let us take heed to the method pointed out by our Savior in the sixth chapter of Matthew, with all the connection. "Moreover, when ye fast, be not, as the hypocrites, of a sad countenance; for they disfigure their faces that they may appear unto men to fast. Verily I say unto you, they have their reward. But thou, when thou fastest, anoint thy head and wash thy face; that thou appear not unto men to fast, but unto thy Father which is in secret; and thy Father which is in secret shall reward thee openly." Is this a heavy burden, a hard yoke to bear? It is not the popular mode of these last days, yet it is the gospel way.

Furthermore, we see that fasting and prayer are enjoined for special blessings, as in a certain case Christ's disciples failed by not attending upon the same. "Then came the disciples to Jesus apart, and said, Why could not we cast him out? And Jesus said unto them, . . . This kind goeth not out but by prayer and fasting." Now special blessings may be withheld from us until we shall sufficiently see and feel our need of them as to thus deny ourselves.

Is not the following sufficient encouragement for us to try for ourselves? "And Cornelius said, Four days ago I was fasting until this hour; and at the ninth hour I prayed in my house, and behold a man stood before me in bright clothing, and said, Cornelius, thy prayer is heard, and thine alms are held in remembrance in the sight of God." Have we all tried this? If not, then neglect this duty no longer.

Even in the ordination of elders, in Paul's day, these duties were not neglected, as stated. "And when they had ordained them elders in every church, and had prayed with fasting, they commended them to the Lord, on whom they believed." Another place also states, "As they ministered to the Lord, and fasted, the Holy Ghost said, Separate me Barnabas and Saul for the work whereunto I have called them. And when they had fasted and prayed, and laid hands on them, they sent them away."

It is quite plain that Paul was not a stranger to these things, or chose to be carried "on flowery beds of ease," "But (rather, as he says) in all things approving ourselves as the ministers of God, in much patience, in afflictions, in necessities, in distresses, in stripes, in imprisonments, in tumults, in labors, in watchings, in fastings, . . . as having nothing, and yet possessing all things." Did Paul seldom fast? Let him answer. "In weariness and painfulness, in watchings often, in hunger and thirst, in fastings often, in cold and nakedness." Now was Paul thereby rendered incompetent for daily christian duties? He adds, "Besides these things that are without, that which cometh upon me daily, the care of all the churches."

Dear brethren and sisters, perhaps to some of you these duties may appear unnecessary, or uncalled for, and you may think it will be all just as well to glide along

"On flowery beds of ease,
While others fought to win the prize,
And sailed through bloody seas;"

but the only way for the followers of Christ to travel in is the self-denying way,—the royal way of the cross. No other is pointed out in the inspired word. They that wait upon themselves? No; but "they that wait upon the Lord shall renew their strength; they shall mount up with wings as eagles; they shall run and not be weary, and they shall walk and not faint." Says the apostle, "So run that ye may obtain. And every man that striveth for the mastery is temperate in all things. Now they do it to obtain a corruptible crown; but we an incorruptible. I therefore so run." "But I keep under my body, and bring it into subjection." In another place he says, "For ye are the temple of the living God. If any man defile the temple of God, him shall God destroy; for the temple of God is holy, which temple ye are."

Brother, sister, will you improve the first opportunity to wait upon the Lord by fasting and prayer? By so doing, and continuing occasionally thus to do, you may not only renew your spiritual strength, and become a burning and shining light, but, like Paul, who said, "Even unto this present hour we both hunger, and thirst, and are naked, and are buffeted, and have no certain dwelling place," you may be able to adopt the language,—"I press toward the mark for the prize of the high calling of God in Christ Jesus," and also be enabled to say, "I can do all things through Christ which strengtheneth me." Is not this scriptural, therefore commendable, expedient for the waiting church, who soon expect their Lord's return, and more especially now, while the great mass willingly say, "My Lord delayeth his coming," and are now eating, drinking and feasting with the world, but as Peter says, "They think it strange that ye run not with them to the same excess of riot, speaking evil of you."

Is it not time to pray and fast, not only for ourselves, but for our brethren and friends, and all within our reach? "And of some have compassion, making a difference; and others save with fear, pulling them out of the fire." Will our Savior, judge and friend say (when He comes), to idlers in his vineyard, "Well done"? Let us fear if we are thus inclined. "For he that soweth to the flesh shall of the flesh reap corruption; but he that soweth to the Spirit shall of the Spirit reap life everlasting." And let us not be "weary in well doing; for in due season we shall reap, if we faint not." S. L. MANLEY.

A SUGGESTION.

That we read our Bibles in reference to the Character and Offices of Angels as there presented. We need not fear anything we find in the Bible. It may be we need to have our eyes opened to see this subject as the servant of Elisha to see the truth of his master's words, "Fear not: for they that be with us are more than they that be with him."

One day as I went to my flour barrel, that had stood entirely unprotected and yet never a pound of flour missed from it, I could but exclaim, "I do believe the angel of the Lord protects this flour!" and how happy the thought made me. Often do I love to repeat in prayer these words of the Psalmist, as we commit ourselves to the Lord for the night: "The angel of the Lord encampeth round about them that fear him, and delivereth them."

A beloved sister told us of a wonderful deliverance from having her feet crushed by an accident on the cars, by—she most firmly believes—her guardian angel. Something kept whispering to her—"Put up your feet." But she saw no danger and resisted. By and by came a crash, and as if by instinct she gathered her feet upon the seat, and in so doing saved them as an iron bar tore up the floor beneath her.

We have been much interested in reading Bro. Wm. Shepherd's tract, "On the Existence of Holy Angels," etc. Send for it, brothers and sisters; it will do you good. It is only 20 cents single. Also send for "Rahab the Harlot." Hoping to be made like unto the angels, your sister in patient waiting,

Hammonton, N. J. E. S. WILLARD.

P. S.—We have given ourselves the pleasure of several evenings' entertainment in the family circle in having our dear Sister Mussey's book read. It pays well for all it costs. Send for it. In so doing you will be blessed in your own soul, and confer a favor upon our worthy sister in Christ.

I think when this book is read it will have the effect to break down prejudice against female labor in the vineyard of the Lord, as Peter's visit to Cornelius had to break down prejudice in favor of the Gentiles. On that occasion it was said, "When they heard these things, they held their peace and glorified God."

Thus we felt, in reference to Sr. Mussey, to glorify God on her behalf and say, Then hath God also to his handmaids granted his Holy Spirit, and sent them into his vineyard; and blessed will those be who hear and help such women who labor in the gospel. As a family our whole hearts say, Sister Abigail Mussey, "the Lord hear thee in the day of trouble; the name of the God of Jacob defend thee." Amen. E. S. W.

THE SABBATH.

Some good people seem to think it of great, if not the greatest, importance to keep Saturday as the Sabbath. Many think, and some say, It is strange we can't see the truth (?) as they do in this matter. Some say, It is strange that Bro. G. (or whoever it may be), who is so sensible in other respects, should be so ignorant, so blind, in this. Some few, perhaps, almost if not quite condemn us, because we do not see it duty to observe Saturday in the same manner they do. Some, too many, pay more attention to keeping Saturday holy—as the Sabbath, than they do to christian duties in general.

Friends, please do not call us heathen, or infidels; do not think we are, or ever mean to be, because we can not see it our duty to observe Saturday as the Sabbath. We think we do not find any requirement for us to do it in the Savior's words, anywhere, as you think you do. If he never has required his people to do it, you must not censure us any for not doing it. Please think of this. Please be as willing for good brothers to point out errors to you, in your theory, as you are to do the same of what you think error. Jesus (Matt. 22: 37–40) said, "Thou shalt love the Lord thy God with all thy heart, and with all thy soul, and with all thy mind. . . . And the second is like unto it, Thou shalt love thy neighbor as thyself. On these two commandments hang all the law and the prophets."

Probably Jesus knew as much about the commandments as any body now-a-days dares claim. Had it been his pleasure for his people to observe the seventh day as Sabbath, down through time, to eternity's morning, probably he would have said something here on the subject which our seventh-day brethren claim to be so highly important.

I have not found any requirement from the Savior, or the apostles, to observe Saturday as the Sabbath. If anybody can find a plain, simple statement to this effect, please tell where it is.

Do not call us "Sabbath breakers." Do not insinuate that we are "liars," or "deceivers." We do not mean to be or wish to be of this sort of persons. Please be kind in words; we will try to be. Let us be willing to receive the truth, even if it crushes our theory to dust. J. N. BERRY.

THE UNCTION.

You need it! Your words are good, but they lack the unction. A farmer planted his field with corn; the ground was in excellent condition; the weather all that could be desired; the seed was sound, and of the first quality, to all appearance; but it did not come up. He waited, and waited, but no young blades of corn made their appearance. The crop was an utter failure. What was the matter? The seed had been, the previous winter, exposed to the cold so long that the frost had destroyed the germinating principle. The warm sun, the genial shower, the fertile soil, failed to restore the vitality that had been lost. Thus it is with a great many testimonies, exhortations and sermons. They are orthodox in doctrine—the kernel is sound—they are full of truth—contain a certain amount of nutriment—but vitality is wanting. They are absolutely good for nothing to make converts. If you would impart light to others, you must have light in yourself. For the anointing of the Spirit, there is, and can be, no substitute. No amount of truth, however plain and pointed; no eloquence of style or vehemence of manner, can supply the lack of the Spirit in those who labor for the salvation of souls. To succeed in saving men, you must have the anointing that abideth. Then why will you not meet the conditions of success? Wherefore do you spend your strength for naught? The same activity you now exhibit would give you many "stars in the crown of your rejoicing" if you would only seek and obtain aid of the Holy Spirit.

If "every one that asketh, receiveth," then are you not guilty if you preach a single sermon, or deliver a single exhortation, without the Spirit? But you must not ask that you may consume it upon your lusts. Unless your consecration to God is entire—more complete than is generally made—you will be receiving honor for your success. And no person can at the same time "believe" for the Holy Ghost and receive honor from his fellow-man. Then make haste and give youself anew to God. Let him have you to use you for his glory. Keep the judgment in view; look to be despised of men, but seek the honor that comes from God alone.—Earnest Christian.

SOLD CHEAP.

One evening, as I stood in the Post Office in L——, two young men came from the window where stamps were sold, and passed by me on their way out.

"See here," said one to his fellow; and glancing towards him I saw in his open palm two new two-cent pieces, and my ear caught what sounded thus: "I gave him five cents for a stamp, and he ought to have given me back one, but he gave me two."

"All right," said his companion, as they passed on, evidently pleased with the speculation, while I stood musing to myself, "Sold cheap:—two cents for the honor, honesty, fairness, and manly principles of two young men."

I know that this kind of business is by no means uncommon, among young men and old men, and even among men who profess to be devout men, and who sometimes make long prayers; but it is none the better for all that. Nor am I yet convinced that, while godliness is profitable, ungodliness is still more profitable, or that while godliness with contentment is great gain, ungodliness without it is greater still. But I have a strong suspicion that in a pecuniary way this kind of petty meanness will never pay. Honesty, even in this crooked world, has its market value, and a habit of dishonesty, even in little things, cannot long be cherished without being found out. And when once a man has been caught in some mean, pitiful trick, he is marked and watched. Who would like to entrust such young men as those, with uncounted gold, or with business where honesty and fidelity are required? Who would pay such a man as much for his services, where integrity was needful, as they would if he had returned the extra penny, and rectified the mistake? Who would not feel that a man who could be bought so cheap was hardly worth a purchase?

And besides, these petty dishonesties grow so fast and large, that of them come swindles, robberies, forgeries, defalcations, embezzlememts, frauds, and "pickings and stealings" of every grade and kind. Hence covetousness overleaps its mark, it vaults skyward, and falls as Satan fell, "like lightning," down to infamy and shame.

The man who will deceive in trade for a dollar; equivocate for a dime, or lie for three cents, may think he is shrewd; but I doubt it. He who will do this to lower the price of what he buys, or raise the price of what he sells, either puts small value on himself and his manhood, or else he is sold cheap!

A man may know how to pile cord-wood with the big ends in the front, and "crow's nests" in the middle; he may be able to pack his apples with the best ones near the barrel heads, or his strawberries with the big ones on top of the box, or his cloth with the longest cuts on top of the case; he may make bread from alum and gypsum, butter from tallow and ochre, milk from chalk and water, tea from sloe leaves and Prussian blue, ginger from Indian meal and capsicum, and piety from scowls and crustiness; he may make paper from clay, leather from pasteboard, clothing from shoddy, wine from cider, and reputation from hypocrisy; he may furnish molasses from the pump, milk from the clouds, sugar from the sand bank, and religion from the devil; he may learn all those "black arts" of transmutation taught by Satan to so many apt disciples in these days of rottenness and rascality, and may think he has already found that philosopher's stone which supercedes the command to love thy neighbor as thyself, and turns everything he touches into gold,—but at last he may find that the old tales of leagues with Satan have come true again, and that in every tricky bargain over which he chuckled, he was sold himself, and sold cheap. Using false balances here, he at last may himself be weighed in the balances, and found wanting. The homely German proverb, "He that takes soup with the devil needs a long spoon," is well worth remembering, for the spoons that are often used for the purpose prove far too short for safety. Many a poor wretch has sold his birthright for a morsel of meat, and has sold it cheap. He that sells himself to Satan a dozen times a day, in petty meannesses, in three cent lies, in traders' tricks, in small deceptions, may become rich, and seem honorable, but he has rooted out his manhood, his integrity, his nobility of soul; he does not own himself, nor does he belong to Him who hath bought his people with his blood; he is a slave of the devil, sold under sin, sold to work iniquity, yes, sold, and sold very cheap!

Will these things profit in the end? Will they pay? Though mere honesty does not save a man, will not dishonesty damn him? Will it not unfit him for the presence of Christ, in whose lips no guile was found? Are not lying lips an abomination to the Lord? What shall it profit a man if he gain the whole world and lose his own soul? What shall a man give in exchange for his soul? What is a man worth? God has said, "I will make a man more precious than fine gold; even a man than the golden wedge of Ophir." God help us to be men indeed, men bought by Christ, men whom no one else is rich enough to buy.

The great want of this age is men. Men who are not for sale. Men who are honest to the bottom, sound from centre to circumference, true to the heart's core. Men that fear the Lord and hate covetousness. Men who will condemn wrong in friend or foe, in themselves as well as in others. Men whose consciences are steady as the needle to the pole. Men who will stand for the right if the heavens totter and the earth reels. Men who can tell the truth and look the world and the devil right in the eye. Men that neither brag nor run. Men that neither swagger nor flinch. Men who can have courage without whistling for it, and joy without shouting to bring it. Men in whom the current of everlasting life runs still, and deep, and strong. Men careful of God's honor and careless of men's applause. Men too large for sectarian limits, and too strong for sectarian bands. Men who do not strive, nor cry, nor cause their voices to be heard in the streets, but who will not fail, nor be discouraged, till judgment be set in the earth. Men who know their message and tell it. Men who know their duty and do it. Men who know their place and fill it. Men who mind their own business. Men who will not lie. Men who are not too lazy to work, nor too proud to be poor. Men who are willing to eat what they have earned, and wear what they have paid for. Men who know in whom they have believed. Men whose feet are on the everlasting Rock. Men who are not ashamed of their hope. Men who are strong with divine strength, wise with the wisdom that cometh from above, and loving with the love of Christ. Men of God!

"God give us Men! A time like this demands
Strong minds, great hearts, true faith, and ready hands.
Men whom the lusts of office do not kill;
Men whom the spoils of office cannot buy;
Men who possess opinions and a will;
Men who have honor—men who will not lie;
Men who can stand before a demagogue,
And face his treacherous flatteries without winking;
Tall men, sun-crowned, who live above the fog
In public duty and in private thinking;
For while the rabble, with their thumb-worn creeds,
Their large professions and their little deeds,
Mingle in selfish strife, lo! Goodness weeps,
Wrong rules the land, and waiting JUSTICE sleeps."

GOSPEL HOLINESS.

I noticed an article in the Crisis of Jan. 17th, on a subject of the most vital importance,—that of holiness. It was written by a brother whom I highly esteem and love, and naught else but a sacred regard to truth, and the love which I feel towards its Divine Author, our common Master, could compel me to advance ideas differing in some respects from those of our beloved brother.

Sanctification, or holiness, as the terms are commonly used in the New Testament, I understand to be a work performed in the hearts of men by the Spirit of God, through the medium of the truth, as they believe and obey the same—not one truth merely, or a part of the truth, but the great truths of God, as one stupendous whole, embodied in his Word. This I believe to be a gradual work; begun at conversion, carried on as one truth after another is believed and obeyed, until at length sanctification is complete—the soul is ripe for the Kingdom of God. Thus (to use a homely figure), the tree of sin and wickedness is cut down at conversion; but it may be a long time before the stump and roots are all cleared away.

Paul teaches us that it is only partial, at first: and urges the paramount importance of its completion. He prays for his Thessalonian brethren, that God would sanctify them wholly, plainly teaching, by implication, that though they were brethren—christians—yet they had before been "sanctified but in part." Please read the whole of his memorable prayer,—"And the very God of peace sanctify you WHOLLY; and I pray God your whole spirit, and soul, and body, be preserved blameless unto the coming of our Lord Jesus Christ." He then annexes, for our encouragement, the promise, "Faithful is he that calleth you, who also will do it." 1 Thess. 5: 23, 24.

In the first part of the third chapter of 1 Corinthians, the same apostle complains of his brethren as being but "babes in Christ," as being "carnal," and mentions the divisions that existed among them, as showing that they were still fleshly, "walking as men." Of course, then, though they were "brethren," and "in Christ," they were far from being entirely sanctified to God.

Also, in Heb. 5: 12–14, he complains that his Hebrew brethren had not made that progress in the school of Christ which they ought to have made; that they had not attained to a sanctified state, or "full age," as he calls it in the fourteenth verse, but were yet mere dwarfs.

But some one may ask, how much sin, or how many sins, may one commit and still be a christian? I answer, not any; that is, not anything which he knows to be sin. The moment he sees that any course which has hertofore been practised is contrary to the law of God, he immediately breaks off from it—puts it away. To remain in it any longer would then become sin. Hence, the growth in grace. Now, it will be remembered, "Sin is the transgression of the law;" and how can one wilfully transgress the law of God, while he does not know what that law is? True, he may be willing to remain ignorant of its requirements, but, if so, he sins in not seeking to inform himself.

Some think the work of sanctification to be instantaneous; but it is probably only its completion that is so. In all, or nearly all true christians, the work is progressing a long time. But, at length, on believing and appropriating certain great and precious promises of the Word of the Lord, a very great blessing is experienced, and the believer then becomes fully sanctified to him. The roots of the tree of depravity and corruption have all been dug out and cleared away; and the individual is a "partaker of the divine nature, having escaped the corruption that is in the world through lust."

Not that it is impossible that one should sin, and fall, after this; but it still remains true as ever, "If any man sin, we have an Advocate with the Father, Jesus Christ the Righteous." Neither has a point been gained in one's experience beyond which any further attainment is impossible; but the injunction, "Grow in grace," etc., is still as binding as ever, and to do so is not only the duty, but the highest privilege, of the sanctified soul. OUR LIFE.

How swiftly do the moments pass,
They flit by one by one;
Ere we're aware we've reached the last,
And see life's setting sun.

And when we retrospect our life,
What good can we discern?
'Tis interspersed with toil and strife,
And still our taper burns.

'Tis all a dream; yet not a dream
So easily forgot; for
O'er life's wreck we've yet to stand,
To fill our vacant lot.

Our life, poor life, how soon 'tis done;
We're born, we live, and then we run
Into the silent grave: O think,
My soul, how soon thy web is spun.

Portland, Me. W. C. CLARK.

OPEN YOUR EYES.

Open your eyes when addressing others, and when others are addressing you. "The light of the eyes rejoiceth the heart." The eyes have a significant meaning, a voice eloquent, soul-cheering! The eye preaches.—God made it for this purpose. But how can it preach when shut or closed? This closing the eyes (as the manner of some is) when speaking or listening, is not gospel; there is no gospel in it. And the Lord enjoins gospel in all we think, say, look, or do. God made eyes for his glory, and we are bound to glorify him in using them in every possible way, and we are to glorify him with our mouths, our ears, our hands, our feet, and our heart and mind. When the command is made to "present our bodies a living sacrifice, holy and acceptable to God, which is our reasonable service," all our senses, all the faculties of our being are included. Christ has purchased these faculties at an infinite price! But how is it possible for us to glorify God to the utmost with our eyes closed in religious worship? We exhibit the appearance of being dead or asleep.

The eye is the most beautiful and expressive of all our organs of sense. All the passions of the human soul, as well as the christian graces, are vividly portrayed in the eye. Let the eye speak for God—for salvation. We have known a mere gleam of the eye, lighted up from a sanctified heart, to pierce to the dividing asunder of soul and spirit, the joints and marrow. Sinners have been awakened, convicted, and converted, through the instrumentality of the eye beaming on fire with the gospel. God is either honored or dishonored with the eye. "If thine eye be single, the whole body shall be full of light. But if thine eye be evil, thy whole body shall be full of darkness. If, therefore, the light which is within thee be darkness, how great is that darkness!"

Aside from this holy, kindling, convicting power of the eye, united with a soul filled with all the fullness of God, it greatly assists the speaker when opened wide, beholding the countenances of others, lighted up with heavenly radiance. This coming in contact with others' eyes, while addressing an audience, the speaker's own heart is fired afresh. "As in water face answereth to face, so the heart of man to man." Prov. 18: 27. Closing the eyes in testifying for Jesus, or while exhorting the people, is unseemly, unnatural, indicative of death! It greatly detracts from the interest and force of the speaker, and is, no doubt, the policy of Satan to curtail usefulness. The devil would gladly, if he could, close our eyes, ears, and mouths, if employed in the service of the blessed Lord. Nothing could please the old serpent better, than to see every faithful servant of God, blind, deaf, dumb, halt, and maimed. But Jesus came to destroy the works of the devil. Blessed be his name!

Beloved reader, open your eyes when you speak of God in the assembly of the saints. Preach with your eyes, with every look, and every moving muscle. Preach with your eyes, ears, soul, life—all the powers of your being. Let your eyes flash conviction into the very heart of sinners, and holiness into holy hearts. Let your eyes penetrate the inmost soul of your hearers. Let eye meet eye, soul, soul, till soul is fired with holy fire! When listening to the truth from the lips of others, be sure your eye is fixed on the speaker intensely; let him feel and know you are interested in what he says. His eye will help your eye, tend to fix attention on the subject discussed. And your eye, likewise, will stimulate the heart of the speaker. Preach with your eyes, live nearer to Jesus, follow him closely, walk holily. Keep a conscience void of offence toward God and man, and your heart will be unison with your eyes, and your eyes with your heart and life.

"The hearing ear, and the seeing eye, the Lord made, even both of them." Ps. 20: 12. No one can glorify God as he ought to with closed eyes, if so be God has favored him with this unspeakable gift. There is more natural warmth in the declamation, more earnestness in the address, greater animation in the manner, more of the lighting up of the soul in the countenance, and more freedom and meaning in the gesture; the eye speaks, and the fingers speak, and when the orator is so excited as to forget every thing but the matter on which his mind and feelings are acting, the whole body is affected, and helps propagate his emotions to the hearers. There is an indescribable something in the natural tones of him who is expressing earnestly his present thoughts, altogether foreign from the drowsy uniformity of the man who reads. For this reason, and various others, we object, to reading sermons instead of preaching them, as the Lord requires. In reading, the eyes are confined to the manuscript, and when preaching the eye is at liberty to speak, and will speak powerfully, and add vividness to the word of God, if the soul is on fire, as it should be.—Earnest Christian.

For the World's Crisis.

WHAT I WOULD HAVE SAID TO YOU.

Why did I not say it before? Several apparent obstacles have prevented. Sometimes when we met, I saw no opportunity; and I confess that at other times I was not myself in the right state to present the truth as it is in Jesus.

There has been something that may be compared to a "fire shut up in my bones"; a feeling that I ought to speak; but something has held it back till now. Now I would warn you to prepare for that great day, which you acknowledge will come some time, and for which you also feel a need of preparation.

You are not yet quite ready for that day. There is a burden on your conscience, which you desire to have removed. Do not try to hide this fact from yourself; and certainly you cannot hide it from Him whose "eyes are like a flame of fire."

Was there no living witness present when you committed that sin, for which you now feel condemned? Did no one but yourself know anything about it? And have you succeeded thus far in keeping it secret, and have you a fair standing and a good reputation, when you know you do not deserve it? Ah! be sure "your sin will find you out." There is at least one witness now living who saw what you did, and if you do not repent, that witness will appear against you at the day of trial. And is there not more than one sin which you are guilty of?

I entreat you not to go on longer in this way. These sins will be like millstones around your neck, to sink you in perdition. There is only one way for you to escape the vengeance "which shall devour the adversaries." Your reputation can not save you. Your "regular standing" in the church can not save you. All your good deeds and your amiable disposition will avail you nothing.

You must confess and forsake your sins, or you must perish. Do not delay. The time is short. Fly to Jesus, and in him you shall find life and peace. F. H. CHAMBERLAIN.

EXPERIENCE OF A SMOKING CLERGYMAN.

Among a lot of Temperance Tracts sent me by a friend, one was headed, "Dost thou smoke, Bill?" I read it, and it made me feel uncomfortable. Some copies of it had got into circulation among my people before I was aware.

A fine young black man came to me one day, and, after bowing and scraping and bidding me "good morning," asked, "Will massa please give me one little tract?"

"Yes, Quamina, and welcome; which will you have?"

"Dat one called 'Does You Smoke, William?'"

He thought it would be too vulgar in my presence to say "Bill"; politeness led him to say "William." I gave him the tract, but I felt I had rather he had asked for any other than that, and my uneasiness was increased. The tract was evidently exciting some attention. It condemned among the people their pastor's habit.

One night, soon after Quamina's visit, having knocked out the ashes of my last pipe before retiring to rest, a colloquy took place between my conscience and myself, which is faithfully reported. I scarcely ever felt more despicable in my own eyes than I did at that moment. From this night forth I vowed that I would never spend another penny for tobacco! So ended the colloquy. Having asked God to forgive me the great sin of which I had been guilty, and to grant me grace and strength to carry out the resolve I had just made, I went to bed.

The next day was the commencement of the struggle. At the usual time for taking the pipe, the craving for it was very strong. I managed to resist it, however, by putting to myself a few plain questions, such as, "What is the matter with you? Why are you restless and unhappy? Have you a headache?" "No." "A toothache?" "No." "Have you pain in any part of your body?" "No." "Are you cold?" "No." "Hot?" "No." "Are you hungry?" "No." "Thirsty?" "No." "Then why, in the name of all that is rational, are you not contented, and even thankful to God for the exemption from pain which you enjoy?"

In this manner I lectured myself against the unnatural craving. Every time I resisted the appetite, I felt that I had achieved a victory; that I was rising higher in the scale of being; that my moral strength was augmented; that I was getting more into harmony with God's laws and my own conscience; and that my example, with regard to the youth of my congregation, was becoming more worthy of me as a christian missionary and pastor. Ere long the craving ceased; the appetite died away; I was emancipated! And now I would not be again enslaved for "all the world calls good or great." Most devoutly do I thank God for my deliverance!—National Baptist.

THE HONEST RUMSELLER.

Friends and neighbors! having replenished my shop with liquid fire, I would inform you that I am engaged in the business of making drunkards, paupers, etc., for the industrious and sober to maintain,—all of which is done according to law, by which, as an honest man, I shall always abide.

Through the influence of kind political friends, I have the requisite license, and my character I have well endorsed; and all of these are equally responsible with myself for the results of the traffic.

I can sell to any man until he is drunk, and to any one until he becomes an habitual drunkard.

I will undertake, for a small sum, and with great expedition, to prepare inmates for the poor-house, the prison and the gallows.

I will furnish a drug which shall deprive some of life, some of property, and all of peace; which shall cause fathers to be fiends, wives widows, children orphans, and all mendicants.

I will cause many of the rising generation to grow up in ignorance, and prove a burden and a nuisance.

I will corrupt the ministers of justice, obstruct the progress of the gospel, hinder the prosperity of the church. If any inquire why I have the audacity to produce such accumulated misery, my honest reply is, MONEY!

I have license from the authorities, and if I do not bring these evils upon you, somebody else will.

I live in a land of liberty, and I have purchased the right to destroy the health and ruin the souls of my customers.—Geo. Trask.

OUT OF BONDAGE.

BRO. GRANT:—I would like to say a word to those who are trying or may try to break off the use of tobacco for their encouragement. I was a slave to the filthy habit for thirty-five years or more. The 5th of last February I asserted my freedom. I have used none of it since, and by the help of the Lord I do not intend to ever again indulge in the filthy habit. I think none need despair of overcoming this habit, for probably none were ever more attached to it than myself. I have tried many times, and never had quite decision enough till now. It is all by the help of the Lord. To him be all the praise.

Dodge's Cor., Wis. B. S. JACKSON.

ANTI-TOBACCO PETITION.

To the Honorable, the Legislature of the State of ——: The undersigned inhabitants of ——, believing the use of tobacco predisposes strongly to the use of intoxicating drinks, besides the destruction of health and morals, and that in almost every case the habit is acquired during the years of minority, we therefore would respectfully ask of your Honorable Body the passage of a law prohibiting the sale or giving away of tobacco to minors, and that provision be made therein for arresting and detaining minors (when found using it) till such times as they will divulge the names of the persons from whom it may have been obtained.

Should your Honorable Body have doubts of the evils flowing from the use of tobacco, we ask that you will appoint a competent committee to make a full and searching investigation of the subject, and report thereon. And your petitioners will ever pray, etc.—Phrenological Journal.

The use of tobacco is increasing. Some of you have children who are growing up exposed to its baneful influence. Think and see if you cannot do something in this way to save them, or some other person's children even, from so bad a habit.

ALCOHOLIC MEDICATION.

Let me here, in few words, solve the mystery of these nervine, narcotic and stimulant "properties." The mistake of the medical profession consists in mislocating these properties. They do not exist in the alcohol, but in the living organism.

When a small quantity of any kind of alcoholic liquor is taken, it is expelled by a general and nearly uniform and equal determination to all of the outlets of the body. This occasions a gentle commotion of the nervous forces, and does not unbalance the circulation. The patient experiences a feeling of exhilaration, as often happens in the forming stage of many diseases. The commotion of the organism, which is rather a pleasurable sensation of all the bodily and mental powers, is frequently the premonition of some of the most fatal diseases—yellow fever, cholera, hemorrhages, for examples.

This is the nervine effect; an effect depending, not on any specific property of the alcohol, but on the manner in which the system expels it.

When a larger quantity is taken, it is expelled mainly by a determination to the surface. This is stimulation. It is analogous to the hot stage of fever. It is fever. The "stimulus," therefore, does not depend on any peculiar property of the liquor, but on the manner in which the system undertakes to get rid of it.

Then, as to its narcotic property or effect. This is occasioned by very large doses. Then, the quantity being immediately dangerous to life, the vital powers resist it by a powerful determination to the first passages. This rush of blood and nerve power to the centre to meet the enemy so unbalances the circulation as to stupefy the patient, rendering him comatose or apoplectic.

Now, whether the patient is exhilarated, stimulated or narcotized, is a mere question of quantity. And as all the action is on the part of the living system, what becomes of these time-honored puzzles of the learned about the "action" of alcohol; its "modus operadi; its "special affinities," etc.?

They have no existence except in our medical text books and in the imaginations of medical men.—Dr. R. T. Trall.

CLEANLINESS.—When one neglects the natural law of cleanliness, cutaneous diseases, malignant fevers and contagious influences generally are engendered, but it is not all of cleanliness to keep the outside of the body clean. To do this, the blood must be pure, and this is kept so by eating and drinking only pure food and drink, and keeping up a natural action of the organs of depuration, the skin, lungs, kidneys and bowels, through proper exercise, sleep, etc.

SLEEP.—Americans who drive business from morning till night need a good deal of sleep to repair the waste of the day; for during sleep all the tissues are at work preparing for the coming struggle. They should go to bed early, and get up when Nature says enough.

THE EDEN LAND.

We seek a land all summer bright,
With fadeless beauty glowing,
Where earth is robed with endless light,
And crystal streams are flowing;
Where perfumed zephyrs fan the hills,
And wave the star-eyed flowers,
Whose ever breathing fragrance fills
Fair Eden's sunny bowers.

CHORUS.

Then on, press on till the morning dawn,
Our glorious home is nearing;
We'll shout the crown and kingdom won
At Jesus' bright appearing.

The heaven-built city there unbars
Her massive gem-set portals,
And, brighter than ten thousand stars,
Shine God's white-robed immortals.
With palms of vict'ry waving high,
They sing Love's wondrous story;
They wake the harp of sounding joy,
And reign in endless glory.

We're journeying to that Eden land,
Through Sorrow's swelling ocean,
But soon we'll gain the shining strand
Beyond the waves' commotion.
Soon morn will flush the orient skies,
With golden radiance streaming;
The Sun of Righteousness arise,
O'er earth and heaven beaming.

THE DOCTRINE OF THE PHARISEES AND OF THE SADDUCEES DEFINED.

And an Explanation of the Parable of the Rich Man and Lazarus.

"E'en adders hear,
But turn, and dart into the dark again."
"He is a slave who fears to be
In the right with two or three."

THE DOCTRINE OF THE PHARISEES AND OF THE SADDUCEES.

"Then said Jesus unto them, Take heed and beware of the leaven of the Pharisees and of the Sadducees.... Then understood they how that He bade them not beware of the leaven of bread, but of the doctrine of the Pharisees and of the Sadducees."—MATT. 16: 6-12.

FALSE CHARGE.

We have been charged with being Sadducees, because we do not believe in the immortality of the soul, or that man has a life element in himself that survives death and exists in a state of rewards immediately after death. The injustice of this charge is at once apparent from the fact that this was not the doctrine for which the Sadducees were condemned, according to the Scriptures. It was for this: "They say there is no resurrection."—Matt. 22: 23. This we have never denied; but have contended most earnestly and persistently for the doctrine. And in the coming of the Lord and the resurrection from the dead is our only hope of future life. 1 Cor. 15: 18, 19. This is a most unchristian accusation, but will not alarm or hurt us; underneath are the everlasting arms, and above us are the overshadowing wings of the Almighty.

Let us notice, 2d, The Doctrine of the Pharisees. Our Lord warns the church to "beware of the leaven of the Pharisees" also. This "leaven," he informs us, is "hypocrisy." "Beware ye of the leaven of the Pharisees, which is hypocrisy."—Luke 12: 1. The Pharisees were hypocritical in heart and life, and hypocritical in professions of faith and hope. Jesus thus describes their character: "Woe unto you, Scribes and Pharisees, hypocrites! for ye pay tithe of mint and anise and cummin, and have omitted the weightier matters of the law, judgment, mercy, and FAITH: these ought ye to have done, and not to leave the other undone. Ye blind guides, which strain at a gnat, and swallow a camel! Woe unto you, Scribes and Pharisees, hypocrites! for ye make clean the outside of the cup and of the platter, but within they are full of extortion and excess. Thou blind Pharisee, cleanse first that which is within the cup and platter, that the outside of them be clean also. Woe unto you, Scribes and Pharisees, hypocrites! for ye are like unto whited sepulchres, which indeed appear beautiful outward, but within are full of dead men's bones and of all uncleanness. Even so ye also outwardly appear righteous unto men, but within ye are full of hypocrisy and iniquity. Fill ye up the measure of your fathers. Ye serpents, ye generation of vipers, how can ye escape the damnation of hell."—Matt. 23: 23-33.

What a revolting picture is here given by our Lord, who knoweth the hearts of all men, of this chief sect of the Jews. And how is it possible for these "blind guides," these "hypocrites" in all "matters of the law, judgment, mercy, and faith," to have a correct doctrinal faith or hope? or, if they held the truth, not to hold it "in unrighteousness"? And how could it be otherwise than that they should "corrupt the word of God," making it null and void by their "tradition"? They were professedly the orthodox portion of the Jewish church. They professed faith in the doctrine of a future life and of the resurrection of the dead, which was denied by the sect of the Sadducees; but they held the doctrine of the resurrection in hypocrisy. Professedly they believed it, yet did not earnestly contend for it, and obscured and nullified its importance by embracing the doctrine of heathen philosophy, and contending for a future existence of the soul, which they regarded immortal, and rewards and punishments immediate on death, in hades.

That they professed faith in the doctrine of the resurrection is evident from St. Paul's taking advantage of the fact when an infuriated populace, made up of Pharisees and Sadducees, fell upon him for his departure, as they conceived, from Moses' law and Jewish rites. "When Paul perceived that the one part were Sadducees, and the other Pharisees, he cried out, in the council, Men and brethren, I am a Pharisee, the son of a Pharisee; of the hope and resurrection of the dead I am called in question."—Acts 23. The effect of this announcement was electrical, setting the two sects at variance, and diverting rage for the time being from the apostle. "There arose a dissension between the Pharisees and Sadducees; and the multitude was divided." In the midst of this "great dissension, the chief captain, fearing lest Paul should be pulled in pieces of them, commanded the soldiers to go down and take him by force from among them, and bring him into the castle."—Acts 23: 6-10. Each party of the Jews were equally embittered against Paul, and yet his averment that he was a Pharisee, and that he held to the doctrine of the resurrection, set these sects against each other; and in the midst of the confusion and contention Paul was rescued. Now, that the Pharisees held the doctrine of the resurrection in hypocrisy is evident from what St. Paul says before Felix afterward. "But this I confess unto thee, that after the way which they call heresy, so worship I the God of my fathers; believing all things which are written in the law and in the prophets; and have hope toward God, which they themselves also allow, that there shall be a resurrection of the dead, both of the just and unjust."—Acts 24: 14, 15. From which we see, that while Paul was a Pharisee in faith, and contended earnestly for the doctrine among Jews and Gentiles, at the peril of his life; these Pharisees, who professedly believed in the resurrection, regarded and treated him as a heretic! This is not the only instance in the history of the church when men have been regarded as heretics, for boldly defending orthodox doctrine, by those who lay claim to be the most orthodox men in the world.

The language of St. Paul,—"Which they themselves also allow," shows that the Pharisees held to the doctrine of the resurrection, as a part of their faith and creed; but the language also, with their conduct toward Christ and his apostles, and the doctrines they taught, betrays the sad fact that they merely gave to the doctrine of the resurrection an indifferent assent, and by no means an earnest and hearty support.

JOSEPHUS ON THE RESURRECTION.

The following extract from Josephus will give us the Pharisees' faith, relative to the resurrection:—

"We have therefore believed that the body will be raised again; for although it be dissolved, it is not perished; for the earth receives its remains, and preserves them; and while they are like seed, and are mixed among the more fruitful soil, they flourish, and what is sown is indeed sown bare grain; but at the mighty sound of God, the Creator, it will sprout up, and be raised in a clothed and glorious condition, though not before it has been dissolved and mixed with the earth. So that we have not rashly believed in the resurrection of the body."—Josephus' Comp. Works, p. 825.

THE LEAVEN.

Jesus charges the Pharisees with "teaching for doctrines the commandments of men,"—making "the commandments of God of none effect by your tradition."—Matt. 15: 6, 9. "Full well ye reject (frustrate) the commandment of God, that ye may keep your tradition."—Mark 7: 9. It was in this way also that they corrupted and made of none effect the doctrine of the resurrection. The "leaven" in the Pharisees' faith and doctrine, concerning a future life, and which destroyed the power of the truth of a resurrection to life and rewards, was the heathen doctrine of the immortality of the soul, taught by heathen philosophers, without the light of revelation; and that souls were rewarded at death. These doctrines are not found in the Bible.

"The doctrine of the immortality of the soul, and the name, are alike unknown to the entire Bible."—Olshausen.

"The immortality of the soul is rather supposed, or taken for granted, than expressly revealed in the Bible."—Tillotson.

Where, then, did the Pharisees obtain their faith of the immortality of the soul, and its consignment to hades in conscious existence after death? And how came this to be incorporated in their faith of a future life after death? I reply in the language of another:—

"In the days of the Ptolemys, of Egypt, thousands of Jews settled in Alexandria, and other of the chief cities in Egypt, where was taught the doctrine of the soul's immortality, as held by Plato. Certain Jewish elders, indoctrinated in the philosophy of the heathen school, wrote apocryphal books, in which they mixed up this philosophy with divine revelation, concerning the future state, and these views and traditions became the faith of the Pharisees, or Jewish church."

This fact is made evident also from the following extract from Josephus:—"God hath determined . . . the rising again of these very bodies, which you Greeks, seeing to be dissolved, do not believe (their resurrection): for while you believe the soul is created and yet is made immortal by God, according to the doctrine of Plato, and this in time, be not incredulous; but believe that God is able, when he hath raised to life that body which was made as a compound of the same elements, to make it immortal. . . . And to every body shall its own soul be restored; and when it hath clothed itself with that body, it will not be subject to misery."—Josephus' Comp. Works, p. 825.

The Pharisees' faith in future life, therefore, was a compound of heathen philosophy and divine revelation, Plato and the prophets, the Greek doctrine of the soul's immortality, and God's inspired declarations of the doctrine of the resurrection of the dead. And what is most remarkable, and here to be noticed, is the singular fact that the heathen writers have converted both the Jews and christians to their doctrine of the immortality of the soul; while both have failed in convincing the heathen world of the scriptural doctrine of the resurrection of the dead. And why are we admonished to beware of this doctrine of the Pharisees? Because, the soul's immortality being admitted, and a conscious state of rewards at death, it completely nullifies the force of the doctrine of the resurrection, as most clearly set forth in the language of Wm. Tyndall, the translator of the English version of the Scriptures:—

"In putting departed souls in heaven, hell, and purgatory, you destroy the arguments wherewith Christ and Paul prove the resurrection. The heathen philosophers, denying the resurrection, did put that the souls did ever live. And the Pope joineth the spiritual doctrine of Christ and the fleshly doctrine of philosophers together, things so contrary they cannot agree. If the souls be in heaven, tell me why they be not in as good case as the angels be? And then what cause is there of a resurrection?"

What Mr. Tyndall here calls "the fleshly doctrine of philosophers," constitutes the "leaven," or "doctrine of the Pharisees," which they "joined" with "the spiritual doctrine of Christ"; namely, the resurrection; thus making "void" the doctrine of the resurrection; and by which they "destroy the arguments wherewith Christ and Paul prove the resurrection."

According to the Pharisees' faith, Plato must be joined with Jesus, to give us all the light and a complete gospel respecting man's future hopes after this life. Nay, Satan, not content with this, Plato must take the precedence,—for the immortality of the soul must be surely believed, or the life element of the spirit in man exists in death, in order to the resurrection. But, with Mr. Tyndall, we inquire, "If the souls be in heaven, hell, or purgatory, what cause is there of a resurrection?" "Beware of the doctrine of the Pharisees."

O. R. FASSETT.

For the World's Crisis.

THE IMPENDING CRISIS.

EDITOR OF THE WORLD'S CRISIS.

Dear Brother:—In a former article, I referred briefly to the perilous position of our own America, in the period of the convergeance and culmination of prophetic epochs. It is sad to observe the pertinacious and often egotistical disposition to magnify the grandeur and protest the perpetuity of our republic; whereas all the burden of prophecy, and the most glowing pre-vision of inspired men for ages, have plainly denoted a kingdom and not a republic, the grand desideratum of earth, and the gracious and unalterable determination of Jehovah.

Jesus Christ shall certainly rule the world, personally, gloriously, universally. There will be a grand unity and uniformity of people and policy, of sympathy, activity, and moral life and enjoyments through all the world, under one head—even Immanuel. We shall have an Executive combining power and goodness, resources and affection, majesty and loveliness, and the consequence will be a government of incomparable excellence, of liberty, equality, with devoted loyalty among the subjects, of perpetuity and security, with every incentive to duty, to progress, and with every guaranty of matchless prosperity. Why? Because the King is perfect in benevolence and power, infinitely good, and infinitely able; fruitful in thoughts, and exuberant in the disposition of kindness, and competent to assure and achieve every blessing and benefit to every creature in all the world.

But let us beware how we glorify our confederation of States, which is a mere temporary arrangement in the providence of God, preliminary and in some sense auxiliary to another. Among the dangers which menace America may probably be mentioned Fenianism. It is true that it is not so now generally regarded, but the rise of such a singular organization in our midst, in spite of all avowed or announced other and foreign destination, is at least somewhat suspicious. It is true that the liberation of Ireland may be an object honestly sought and contemplated by the mass of the membership; but is it really a design of the leaders? It is also true that Baxter, in his work on Napoleon, insists that in the re-constitution of ten kingdoms under antichrist, or the ancient territory of the Roman empire, Ireland must be included, and will therefore be disjoined from England; and it is possible that the Fenian enterprise is destined in some way to accomplish the disjunction.

But the question arises, How is it to be done? How can it be done? So far as we can now see, it is simply impossible, and the project is chimerical and absurd, yet if it is a prophetic necessity, nothing can prevent it. England must be paralyzed by a now apparently impossible revolution, financially and politically and militarily helpless, or else, in some grand re-constitution of territorial possessions and geographical lines, consents as a matter of policy to surrender the Green Isle, if Fenianism is to achieve Irish independence. The conquest of Canada appears likewise an undertaking exceedingly hazardous, unless it be by the help of revolutionary elements potent in that province, or with the connivance and authorization of our own government in the event of war between England and the United States.

But such an organized power in America seems perilous to our safety. Who knows whether the real object of this organized body of Irish be not disguised? Who knows that even if its object be actually as announced, it may not in some critical or tempting contingency be changed and perverted to an end far other than the republicanization of Ireland? Who knows or can solve the mystery of this extraordinary formation? And yet scarcely in any quarter is the slightest intimation broached of a possible sinister motive and element in this warlike association hostile to our own safety.

Truly it may be asked, Who can explain this mystery? Time may very shortly and very surprisingly develope the aim and destination of it. Is it connected with the present embarrassments of the Papacy? Is it, like Spiritualism, one of the three frogs, from the dragon, beast, and false prophet, to gather the kings of earth to war? Who knows, or dare affirm, that it is not an ally of that organized and seductive system of folly and infidelity which now threatens to encompass and engulph the world?

Significant, indeed, in this connection appears the testimony of Hon. D'Arcy McGee, Canadian minister of Agriculture, who says of O'Mahony, Fenian Head Centre, that he was "known to be a zealous Spiritualist, and inveigled one or two of his friends into a circle he had formed. I should not wonder if it was from the Spiritualists he derived his idea of circles, and centres; and indeed it is quite likely that, at this very moment, he is conducting his whole system independent of mundane control, by the advice of the spirits." However sharply or lightly such a suggestion might be derided, the subtle relationship of Fenianism to Spiritualism may soon become evident with a strength and positiveness little suspected in the past. And there may be many serious conjectures far more chimerical than the co-operation of these agencies to promote the political supremacy of Napoleon.

Another well-known and admitted evil, and element of imminent peril, is Spiritualism. Diabolical in its origin, seductive in its influence, evil in its tendency, rapid in its growth, subtle in its devices, and rampant in its ambition, it ranks among the most perilous developments of modern times. It is well to notice the particular commendation which the word of God pronounces on those ministers of the gospel who faithfully admonish the church of the Satanic features and inevitable evolution of this pernicious system. "If thou put the brethren in remembrance of these things, thou shalt be a good minister of Jesus Christ." This encomium follows a delineation of the coming fabric of iniquity, prophetically certified by the Spirit of God.

Who should not pray that God would give strength and opportunity, with boldness and wisdom to utter the cry of alarm? How energetically and solemnly should every minister protest against this infidel and blasphemous emanation from the world of demons! Is this obligation realized? Is the duty performed? Hath not prophecy furnished the delineation? Is not the image plainly pictured and predicted? How pertinent to our times the language in Amos, "The lion hath roared; who will not fear? The Lord God hath spoken; who can but prophesy?" Inspiration is explicit; but how rare, and timid, and reticent are those pulpit-voices that should put on their guard families and communities which Satan is eager to victimize and devour. Well may a few faithful prophetic publications do a work of faithful expostulation; for far too mute, I apprehend, is the common and popular religious journalism of the day.

I shall not dwell on this subject here, as its magnitude might warrant. But a few features of the policy of Spiritualism may be intimated.

1. It boldly proposes to achieve the conquest of the moral world, transmuting and subordinating all systems of religion to its own pestilent sway and standard. Its aim and animus are hostile to christianity. It is both impudent and persistent. It hates the restrictions of Bible religion. It is angry at the sentiment and necessity of repentance and renovations. It covets supremacy, while it seeks to change and abolish laws. A sister in Cattaraugus Co., N. Y., recently referred in conversation to the case of a woman apostatized from the christian faith, who stamped on the Bible, in expression of her detestation of the book of God.

2. It aspires after political power, by the two expedients of engaging the utmost learning, ability and influence in the espousal of its tenets, authors, artists, statesmen, orators, politicians and princes; and the designation of some potentate who shall become an acknowledged human god. Such is its yearning, and such its purpose. It unblushingly aspires to deify a man, and may succeed in allying together the most plausible and yet the most formidable forces in the accomplishment of this impious and infernal device.

If we might specify some of the parties in such a compact, we might enumerate Spiritualism, Fenianism, and Judaism revived. And it is a question of the gravest import if Romanism be not very extensively subsidized to the support of this iniquity. Is it not at this critical point of the prepared transformation that an alarm-cry is sounded from heaven, to such true christians as may be numbered among Catholics, to come out of Babylon and escape the storm of intense indignation and terrible judgments destined to that antichristian system which attains the utmost depth of odious and perverse vileness in the sloughs of Spiritualism? As the dragon with distended jaws would devour the man-child; so perchance Spiritualism, dragon-born, would devour that part of the church on earth that, looking for Jesus, and witnessing against the errors going before the judgment, shall be suddenly caught into glory.

Spiritualism is a peril, growing, pressing, and inevitable. Paint it, watch it, and cry out against it! It may rise much more swiftly in some near exigency than ever before. In some crisis, or in anticipation of it, it may seize some Cæsar and crown him king of kings, while it performs a grand genuflection, in token of imperialism dignified to deity! And the Cæsar haply awaits the apotheosis! Snare of Satan, to trap the stumbling and slumbering world! Beware, oh simple soul, whoever thou art! Beware! The crisis of earth urges on! and the lightning sleeps not whose sun-white flame shall leap out of the east, courier and chariot of the coming Son of God!

For the World's Crisis.

A SERMON ON EXODUS 25: 40.

"And look that thou make them after their pattern, which was shewed thee in the mount."

God had been instructing Moses on the mount how the ark, the table, candlestick, and all things appertaining to the same should be made. God also gave Moses the pattern of the mitre, breast-plate, and the dress of the priest, how they should offer sacrifice for their sins; and the sins of the people. "Now the man Moses was very meek, above all the men which were upon the face of the earth."—Numbers 12: 3.

Under the law of types and shadows of things to come, the law knew no mercy. The priest and people were to keep the law in all its precepts, and to follow Moses as their leader, he being the type of Christ, who was to come. All those who transgressed the law, under the Jewish dispensation, were cut off from the people. Now it is evident there was a pattern for every object throughout the camp of Israel; not many for the same thing. "For see," saith he, "that thou make all things according to the pattern shewed to thee in the mount." Heb. 8: 5. Then it is evident that the pattern was given by God, the Father of us all, that his ancient people should follow the types and shadows, until the bringing in of a better covenant. "For the law made nothing perfect; but the bringing in of a better hope did; by the which we draw nigh unto God." Heb. 7: 19.

Out of the twelve tribes of the children of Israel, whom God commanded Moses to lead out of bondage into their inheritance promised to Abraham and his seed for a possession,—out of more than six hundred thousand that started for the land of promise, only Caleb and Joshua received the inheritance; for they had followed God wholly. Notwithstanding God brought his chosen people from bondage with a mighty arm, signs and wonders, even the destruction of their enemies,—fed his people with manna from heaven for bread, quails for meat, a cloud by day, a pillar of fire by night, to guide them through the wilderness, and Moses to lead them to their promised inheritance, yet they went into idolatry, murmured against God and Moses, kept not the pattern given them, but rebelled against God and their leader, until God consumed them in the wilderness. He sent flying fiery serpents to destroy them; plagues broke out among them; the earth opened and swallowed the rebellious, and even Moses spoke unadvisedly with his lips. Thus the great multitude were cut off from the earth by transgression, save Caleb and Joshua.

Thus Caleb and Joshua, and the children of those parents whom God destroyed in their journey for the space of forty years, were permitted to enter and receive their inheritance. They drove out the heathen before them, God working signs and wonders. God gave them judges and prophets, yet they desired a king, that they might be like other nations around them. God gave them one, yet it displeased him, for their hearts were not right before their Maker. The Lord was a covenant keeping God, that they were not consumed from the earth. For God had a righteous seed among them, through the reins of many kings, down to the time of bringing in a better covenant; which was promised to Abraham, that in him and his seed should all the natians of the earth be blessed.

The ushering in of the gospel day having come, types and shadows fled away, blotting out the hand-writing of ordinances that was against us, which was contrary to us, and nailing it to the cross. "And when the day of Pentecost was fully come, they were all with one accord in one place." It was here, where the church under the gospel received the baptismal power of the Holy Ghost, with signs and wonders. It is here you will find the pattern church clothed with power, decked with the robe of Christ's righteousness; having on all the heavenly armor, ready to contend with the powers of darkness and spiritual wickedness in high places; Christ and the apostles to be the patterns for believers to follow. He gave them power over the unclean spirits, to heal the sick, the gift of prophecy, and discerning of spirits. They were all one in Christ Jesus.

Now where can you find, in all Christendom, the church that will compare with the gospel pattern? We are commanded to examine ourselves, whether we be in the faith, yea or nay. We read of one faith, one Lord, and one baptism. Some claim three modes of water baptism, some none; some sprinkling, and others immersion. As Jesus was baptized only once by water, Christ and the apostles being the examples for the church to pattern from, it is evident that there are two modes not according to the pattern shewed to the church. It is evident that Christ commanded his apostles to baptize in the name of the Father, Son, and Holy Ghost. And they baptized both men and women; and there were added to the church daily such as should be saved.

They were commanded to sing in the spirit, and with the understanding also. Where can it be found, from Matthew to Revelations, that primitive christians under the gospel had an ungodly choir to sing for the pattern church?

When we give alms, we are not to let our left hand know what our right hand doeth; we are not to blow a trumpet, as the hypocrites do. How are alms given now throughout all Christendom? The trumpet is blown far and wide for a donation, perhaps at a tavern or parsonage; all the dainties of the place are procured; both saint and sinner are invited to the feast, all kinds of plays introduced, and sometimes music and dancing. Does this look like the pattern church? It looks like the mother of harlots, the indulgences of the Pope, where he professed to forgive sins before they were committed.

Thus the church allows the world to serve the devil in the presence of professed preachers of the gospel, one night or more each year, for the support of preaching.

Members of the pattern church were forbidden gold, costly apparel, plaiting the hair, etc. Compare Christendom with primitive christians. See her decked with costly garments, ornamented with gold, swimming in luxuries, boasting of her strength in numbers, saying by her acts, I sit a queen, and am no widow. Does she not look more like the woman who rode the scarlet-colored beast?

Christ said his kingdom was not of this world; if it were, then would his servants fight. Now where did Christ, or his apostles, or the primitive christians, fight with carnal weapons? I know of but one, and Christ commanded him to put up the sword, for he that useth the sword shall perish by the sword. The soldiers asked Christ, "What shall we do?" "Do violence to no man." "Be content with your wages." The apostles were whipped, stoned, imprisoned, beheaded, and crucified; yet they prayed for their enemies, as Christ taught them: they rendered good for evil. If they were smitten on one cheek, they turned the other also. "Do good to them that hate you." This was the pattern for christians to follow.

Look at the professed church of Christ in this age of the world. See the sects of the day armed in deadly combat, one against another; fighting against those who bear the same name; destroying one another. Does this look like letting brotherly love continue? Is this the unity of the Spirit? Is this laying down our lives for the brethren? Is this the mark that Christ put upon his disciples? Oh, let the heavens be astonished, let the church repent in sackcloth and ashes.

The pattern church were of one heart and mind. They were all one in Christ Jesus. Look over the world to-day. See the professed church divided into many sects, and sub-divided into party names. See the towns and villages with three or four houses of public worship, when one would contain all that go for worship; three or four ministers to preach and maintain for the different sects. Does this look like being one in Christ? Are they all led by the same Spirit? Does it not look more like many being out of Christ? "By their fruits ye shall know them."

This pattern church was clothed with power; signs and wonders were wrought by her through Jesus Christ; the sick were healed, devils cast out, the blind made to see, and the dumb to talk. Unto them were given the discernment of spirits, the gift of prophecy. All these gifts were put into the church for her benefit by its great Head. We are exhorted by the word of God to contend earnestly for the faith once delivered to the saints, for it is impossible to please God without faith. Read the eleventh chapter of Hebrews. It shows what the faith was that was delivered to the saints. It quenched the violence of fire, subdued kingdoms, overcame the world; and the apostle says time would fail him to mention what faith had wrought. Now we are commanded to contend earnestly for the same faith. The great Head of the church never commanded his followers to contend for any thing that was not attainable.

I know of no Scripture from Matthew to Revelations, that proves that Jesus took these gifts out of his church, or robbed it of its power and glory. What then? Through unbelief and unholy living, by not keeping to the pattern that was given them. Can a church that has been broken into fragments contending for names more than they contend for the gifts of the church, having the love of all the world more than the love of God, filled with the pride and fashion of the day, keep the faith of the gospel? Reader, is it any wonder that the church has lost her power? that mene, tekel is written on her,—weighed in a balance and found wanting?

The true church was a live one; had a living ministry and living members. They were all taught by this great High Priest, who ever makes intercession for them. They learned at the great high school taught by One who taught as never man taught. They were not sent to the Jewish Sanhedrim, but to Jerusalem, and there tarried until they were endowed with power from on high. They neither learned of men nor received of men; but by the revelation of Jesus Christ.

How will the ministry compare in this age of the world? They are sent to different schools, educated by men, and, I fear, many receive their commissions from men. The disciples of Christ had one faith, preached one gospel, which was the power of God unto salvation. Now they come from their different schools, marked and stamped according to the different sects of the day.

Is it any wonder, looking over the fallen state of Zion, that her sons and daughters are gone into captivity? that faith and love is weak? that sin and iniquity increase? that darkness covers the land, and gross darkness the people? Is it any wonder, seeing the church has lost her love and power, that the devil should claim to have these gifts in his church, working miracles, healing the sick, discerning spirits, and calling up the dead? The church has lost these gifts; the devil is contending for them, as he did about the body of Moses, saying to the world, I have got the true church.

In the midst of all this confusion of Babels, God has a chosen seed, who are looking for the coming of our Lord and Savior Jesus Christ. Even so, come, Lord Jesus, and come quickly.

"ELIAS WHICH WAS TO COME."

Was John the Baptist the Elias which was to come, or do we look for another? This question is often asked, at the present day, by some who are unsettled in their views about the events to be looked for in the closing scenes of the gospel dispensation. Some, even of those who are expecting the Lord to come soon, are looking for Elias to first come.

This is not very surprising when some of the D. D.'s have been "perplexed" with what they call "difficulties" about the Scripture testimony that John fulfilled the prophecy of Malachi 4: 5, 6, which reads, "Behold, I will send you Elijah the prophet, before the coming of the great and dreadful day of the Lord. And he shall turn the hearts of the fathers to the children, and the hearts of the children to their fathers, lest I come and smite the earth with a curse."

This prophecy was uttered four hundred years before Christ. The Jewish church grew more and more corrupt in doctrine and practice, as seen in their developments during John's and Christ's ministry. Parents and children were in great disunion, as seen by Matt. 15: 46; also the church had nearly lost the faith of the fathers—Abraham, Isaac, and Jocob—concerning "the seed," and "promised possession."

"The general traditions of the Jewish nation" led them into error in regard to the manner of the coming of both Elijah and the Messiah. Their tradition led them to disregard the instructions and interpretation of Gabriel to Zacharias (Luke 1: 11-17), and consequently to overlook John and his mission. Their tradition also led them to reject and kill the Messiah.

The very error which some have fallen into in the christian church was what led the Jews to reject John as the forerunner of Christ's first advent. They looked for Elijah—the ancient prophet—to come before the Messiah, to fulfill Malachi 3: 1; 4: 5. This they had some authority for, had not the angel of God explained to Zacharias in the temple, some thirty years before, that the son which should be born to him would fill this prophecy.

Let us read Mal. 3: 1,—"Behold, I will send my messenger, and he shall prepare the way before me: and the Lord, whom ye seek, shall suddenly come to his temple." Mal. 4: 5, 6,—"Behold, I will send you Elijah the prophet before the coming of the great and dreadful day of the Lord. And he shall turn the heart of the fathers to the children, and the heart of the children to their fathers, lest I come and smite the earth with a curse." Luke 1: 13-17,—"But the angel said unto him, Fear not, Zacharias, for thy prayer is heard; and thy wife Elizabeth shall bear thee a son, and thou shalt call his name John. . . . And many of the children of Israel shall he turn to the Lord their God [to the patriarchal faith]. And he shall go before him in the spirit and power of Elias, to turn the hearts of the fathers to the children, and the disobedient to the wisdom of the just, to make ready a people prepared for the Lord."

Did John accomplish his mission, as pointed out by Gabriel? Let us see. Time passes on. John is born, grows to manhood, and is called of God to commence his work. He obeys. Soon he introduces Jesus to the people as the Messiah. Christ begins his ministry, claims to be the Messiah, the Son of God. He meets with great unbelief and objections.

The priesthood started the idea that a prophecy in Malachi 4 had not been fulfilled, and of course Christ's claim to the Messiahship was false. Jesus knowing all hearts, nips this objection in the bud, by calling the attention of the multitude (Matt. 11: 7, 14) to John the Baptist, who was now in prison, and began to doubt whether Jesus was the Messiah, and had sent two disciples to ask whether he was the Christ or not. Jesus replied to the inquiry, then turns to the multitude and asks them several questions to fix their attention upon John and his ministry, whom, says Christ, was "more than a prophet, for this is he of whom it is written, Behold, I send my messenger before thy face, which shall prepare thy way before thee. . . . For all the prophets and the law prophesied until John. And if ye will receive it, THIS IS ELIAS WHICH WAS FOR TO COME. He that hath ears to hear, let him hear." Have we ears? This settles the question fully that John was the messenger of Malachi 3: 1, and the Elijah of Malachi 4: 5, 6.

But we have more testimony. It seems that some of Christ's disciples had doubts on this point. On the occasion of the transfiguration, they ask, "Why then say the Scribes that Elias must first come? And Jesus answered and said unto them, Elias truly shall first come, and restore all things. But I say unto you, that Elias is come already, and they knew him not. . . Then the disciples understood that he spake unto them of John the Baptist." Matt. 17: 10-12.

But it is objected that John himself said he was not Elijah. Well, we will look. "The Jews sent priests and Levites from Jerusalem to ask him . . . "Art thou Elias? And he saith, I am not." John 1: 19-21. They meant Elijah, the ancient prophet, such as they looked for. Had John said Yes, they could have given him the lie, for they knew of his birth and parentage. He could say No truthfully to their question. But had they asked, Art thou "Elias that was to come?" he could not have said, I am not, for Gabriel and Christ had said he was.

It is again objected that "John did not restore all things," and Elijah must now come "to restore all things." We reply, he restored all things predicted of him. He revived the "Abrahamic faith," and introduced "the seed" to the church. Had he restored ALL things, or if Elijah is yet to do so, we do not need the coming of our Lord.

THE SEWING MACHINES AND DICTIONARIES.

"A Webster's Dictionary is something that I very much want, and I should be glad if I could make up a list of ten subscribers, so as to obtain it. But those who sympathize with our views are so few here, that I shall be unable to get the number required. The five which I have sent are all I can get."

"With a large family to support, and no dependence but my needle, a Sewing Machine would be a great help to us; and if there were more of our faith in this place, or more who look upon it with favor, I should go to work with some hope of securing it. If the requisite number (32) were not so large, I think I could, as it is; but I must be content for the present, to go without what I so much need."

We have received a number of letters like the above, and to put the Sewing Machine and the Webster's Dictionary within the reach of all who are thus situated, we make the following offer:—

For every $5.00, with five new subscribers, and $2.50 from each for one year, one copy of WEBSTER'S ($12.00) UNABRIDGED DICTIONARY.

For every $20.00 with sixteen new subscribers, and $2.50 from each for one year, one of GROVER & BAKER'S ($55.00) SEWING MACHINES.

This offer, with the other, extends only till the 1st of June. All names for the Dictionaries or Machines must be sent in before that date.

A Call from Milwaukee.

Bro. Alex. McDonald writes from Milwaukee, Wis.:—"There is a good field here for a good evangelical minister. If such will come this way, he can have a home with us as long as he may think proper to stay; and I will secure a place for him to speak in, and do all I can otherwise to sustain him in proclaiming the truth. AN EXPLANATION.

Some have wanted me to explain why I published Noah Bailey. I will here say that, to carry out his purposes, he pretends to be an Advent preacher, while in reality he is an enemy to all of their doctrines, and claims he is far ahead of them; despises the Crisis and other Advent publications; explains Scripture in a way to part wives from their husbands, and has done it in a number of instances,—so people say, where he is best known. He is a wolf in sheep's clothing, and guilty of the meanest crimes. Since writing before, Bro. Israel Damman, from Maine, says the truth about him was not half told; and others from Vermont know him to be a lazy, indolent hypocrite, and ought to be published for the good of others.

Now this is my explanation. Those who are under his influence will be ruined, unless they break the spell and escape.

SPIRITUALISM.—NO. 10.

THE DOCTRINES OF SPIRITUALISM.

"Now the Spirit speaketh expressly that in the latter times some shall depart from the faith, giving heed to seducing spirits, and doctrines of devils."—1 TIM. 4: 1.

As the Scripture cannot be broken" (John 10: 35), the foregoing must be fulfilled "in the latter times," where it is believed we are now living. It is a well-known fact that large numbers of the most noted Spiritualists have once been professors of religion, and members of churches. Many of their lecturers have been preachers of the gospel. Thus it is shown that the Scripture, just quoted, is not broken. If we did not see what we do, then it might be said the Scripture has failed.

If, as we have endeavored to show, Spiritualism is but another name for Demonism, then the doctrines taught by the spirits and their followers should be opposed to the Bible, in order to correspond with the rest of their teachings. We will now let the spirits and the Spiritualists tell their own story in their own language. Most of the evidence will be that which has been published in the Banner of Light, in Boston, which has been the leading Spiritualist paper for many years. Other Spiritualist papers and books publish the same. We will arrange their doctrines in the following twelve articles of faith, which we will call

THE SPIRIT'S CREED.

1. The Bible is not a reliable book.

In the testimony of a spirit given in the Banner of Light, Nov. 23d, 1861, it is said:—

"Many times before we have said that we cannot place implicit confidence in that which we find between the lids of the Bible."

A spirit, claiming to be Rev. John Moore, says:—"My friend asks, 'Do you believe the Bible?' I answer, No, I do not. I cannot believe one word of it as the word of God."

Another, when speaking of the Bible, says: "You may not place any confidence in that book.... I can assure my friend that God had no more to do with writing that book than he had;... and do not expect to create any light in the mental world, if you cling to your Bible."

A spirit, who claims to be Timothy M. Baker, says:—"I've got folks in Montpelier, and... I want them to get my sister where I can talk to her straight as I do to you, and I'll knock her God and Bible all to nothing."

2. There is no sin.

These spirits say:—"We say, as we have said a thousand times before, there is no such thing as sin; no such thing as evil... Now, then, if there is sin anywhere, God made that sin—he is the author of it." "The foundation of your religion is fast fading away. Soon we shall find you shaking hands with these new things. This must be so.... Jesus of Nazareth, if he were here to-day, would tell you as we tell you."

Another spirit, when speaking of sin, says: "Spiritually and divinely considered, there is no sin. Full well we know the book you call the Bible teaches of sin. Full well we know the whole christian world recognizes such a condition; but, to us, there is no sin."

Another says:—"All men and women are equally righteous, because all are good. No matter where we find them, or under whatever condition they exist, they are good."

Says another:—"Every thought, word and deed is of God, and therefore modern Spiritualism is of divine origin.... The religion of the heathen is no less divine than is yours. God approved of it as well as yours."

Another spirit says:—"Every thing that ever has been or ever will be is an immutable decree of God.... There is not an atom in the universe but will at some time become an immortal spirit.... It is vain for man to talk about disobeying the law of God; he can at no time disobey it.... Every grain of sand you tread upon to-day shall in time become an immortal soul, endowed with wisdom.... You may curse the Author of your being. Do you sin? No; you are but casting off the gross in your nature—obeying your God.... The highest archangel was once the lowest spirit on earth."

Says another spirit:—"'What!' says the self-righteous man, 'is God controlling the murderer when he lifts his hand against his brother?' Yes, we answer, he is, and every atom in nature proves us true."

Another says:—"We believe our God to be the author of sin, as of good. If we give him his due, we give him this."

3. There is no devil.

The demons appear to be very anxious to have us believe that no such beings exist. This is just as we should expect. A thief would be glad to convince all his neighbors that there were no thieves, so that they would not lock their doors and safes, and then he could have free access to them. So, if the demons can convince us that there are no such beings, we shall not be on the watch for their snares. The following is their teaching on this point:—

"There is no devil either.... Seems to me as though man must be devoid of good sense to believe any thing of the kind."

4. Christ is not raised.

A spirit says:—"But the question arises, What became of the body of Jesus? We answer, the friends of Jesus stole away the body.... So then we will say the natural body of Jesus Christ was never reanimated after the crucifixion. All nature, our God, tells us so."

How different the foregoing reads from the Bible on this subject. Says the apostle Paul,—"If Christ be not raised, your faith is vain; ye are yet in your sins. Then they also which are fallen asleep in Christ have perished.... But now is Christ risen from the dead, and become the first fruits of them that slept."—1 Cor. 15: 17, 18, 20. Luke says Jesus "showed himself alive after his passion by many infallible proofs." Acts 1: 3. Peter said to the Jews: "Ye... killed the Prince of life, whom God hath raised from the dead; whereof we are witnesses." Acts 3: 15.

5. Man is his own judge.

"Within the bosom of every man and woman there is a judgment seat, a throne of God; and before that, and that alone, should men bow down and worship. By that alone they are to be guided. He is to be judged by himself as a spirit; he is to come before no other tribunal. If by the law of self he is condemned, he must suffer according to the condemnation; if acquitted by self, he is indeed acquitted."

We need not stop to say that this is utterly opposed to the teaching of the Bible. According to this standard, if a man gets mad at his neighbor and kills him, no one must condemn him. Or if the seducer leads hundreds from the path of virtue, to gratify his beastly passions, which have completely seared his conscience about such things, "he is to come before no other tribunal" but "himself;" and his decision, is, to seduce the next fair one he can find. This is but one item in the "new religion" of Spiritualism, which, it is said, will "exert a moral and reformatory power among the nations, and inaugurate the millennial era."

6. There is no resurrection of the dead.

A spirit says:—"We presume our good brother will ask if Jesus did not raise the dead? He never did, and never could." Another says:—"The grave is the resting place of the form we no more require." All the spirits and their followers, so far as we know, deny the resurrection of the dead, which is a cardinal doctrine of the Bible. Says the apostle Paul, "If the dead rise not, then is not Christ raised." Again he says:—"Now if Christ be preached that he rose from the dead, how say some among you that there is no resurrection of the dead?" But if there be no resurrection of the dead, then is Christ not risen."—1 Cor. 15: 12, 13, 16. It will be seen that the apostle was free to admit that christianity was a failure if the dead rise not. He says, "If after the manner of men I have fought with the beasts at Ephesus, what advantageth it me, if the dead rise not? Let us eat and drink; for to-morrow we die." —1 Cor. 15: 32. Again we read,—"The Lord himself shall descend from heaven with a shout, with the voice of the archangel, and the trump of God; and the dead in Christ shall rise first."—1 Thess. 4: 16. Says the Savior:—"Marvel not at this; for the hour is coming, in the which all that are in the graves shall hear his voice, and shall come forth; they that have done good unto the resurrection of life, and they that have done evil, unto the resurrection of damnation."—John 5: 28. 29. No doctrine is more plainly taught in the Bible than that of the resurrection of the dead. This the spirits deny.

7. Man is his own Savior.

"The only true religion is a natural religion. ... you are your own Saviors."

In answer to the question, "Did not Christ die, that through his death we might inherit eternal life?" a spirit answers, "No! Christ did not die, that through his death we might live.... His death has no more to do with the remission of sins than the death of any of your martyrs."

Says a spirit, "No man should rely upon any Savior outside of himself. ... Each and every one is a Savior, as he is a judge, a God."

The teaching of the spirits on this point is directly the opposite of that in the Bible. When speaking of Jesus, Peter says:—"Neither is there salvation in any other; for there is none other name under heaven given among men whereby we must be saved."—Acts 4: 12.

8. Christ will not come personally.

Said Leo Miller in a discourse at the Melodeon in Boston, June 2d, 1860, "We behold in the advent of Spiritualism the second coming of the Spirit of Jesus of Nazareth."

So far as we can learn, all the spirits deny the personal coming of Christ. According to the teaching of the apostle John, this denial is one of the special marks of antichrist. When Jesus ascended, it was said to his disciples,—"Ye men of Galilee, why stand ye gazing up into heaven? this SAME JESUS which is taken up from you into heaven, shall so come in like manner as ye have seen him go into heaven."—Acts 1: 11. No language could more plainly express the personal coming of Christ. Says the apostle, "The Lord HIMSELF shall descend from heaven." 1 Thess. 4: 16. Christ came personally the first time, as such he taught in Jerusalem and elsewhere, was crucified, dead and buried, and "rose again the third day according to the Scriptures."—1 Cor. 15: 4. "This same Jesus" is the one who is to come again to raise the dead and set up his kingdom. But all the spirits deny it. Which shall we believe? the Bible, or the spirits?

THE GREAT FEAST DAY AT ROME.

Can you give the month of the year for the great gathering at Rome?

C. CUNNINGHAM.

As the great gathering to be held this year at the "seven-hilled city," is said to be for the purpose of celebrating the death of St. Peter, then, of course, the great day of the feast must correspond with the one on which the event took place which they wish to commemorate. When in New York a few days since, through the kindness of Bro. M. E. Green, we obtained the following information, from the Le Monde, which appears to fix the month and the day when "the great celebration" will take place:

"Last winter a number of Italian revolutionists sold in Rome, at a very low price, a quantity of steel watch chains, to the end of which was attached a small steel globe. When their stock was got rid of they explained that each chain was a symbol of the enslaved condition in which Rome and Venice were at that moment, and that the steel ball typified one of Orsini's bombs. Several young Romans, who had been taken in quite unawares to purchase and wear these steel ornaments, determined to have their revenge, and ordered a quantity of watch chains to be made after the design of the chains supposed to have been worn by St. Peter, and which are preserved in the Eudoxian Basilisk of one of the Roman churches. His Holiness not only approved of this idea, but suggested that the watch hook be copied from St. Peter's cross. They had an immense success, were eagerly bought up, and their value further enhanced by the Pope's permission that each chain might be laid for a moment on the original, preserved, as I have said, in the Eudoxian Basilisk, the result of which has been a number of miracles effected by these new ornaments. Not only have these blessed watch appendages been sold in all parts of Italy, but also in Belgium and Germany. The profits thereby realized are to be devoted to the erection of a monument which the youth of Rome wish to raise in honor of the Apostle Peter's chains, and which they hope to inaugurate on the eighteenth centenary of St. Peter's martyrdom, which will take place next 29th June. The steel copies are, it appears, to be purchased at two depots in Paris, to which I recommend all faithful sons of the church to apply ere the stock be exhausted; one is in the Rue St. Sulpice and the second in the Rue Grenelle St. Germain."

The foregoing shows quite plainly that the 29th of next June will be the day of special interest at Rome. Till that time, it will be only preparation for the great day. We shall wait with much interest for the news at that time, and during the remainder of the year.

FENIANISM.

It appears from some things which have recently come to light, that the Fenians are about ready to commence active operations upon a grand scale. On Monday evening, Feb. 26th, they had a large meeting of much interest in Odd Fellows' Hall, Washington, D. C. The President of the meeting was Mr. James Ryan, District Centre of D. C. Able speakers made stirring speeches, that met with much applause. Among the speakers was M. Morrison. The following is the substance of some of his remarks, as reported in the Washington Daily Star of Feb. 28th:—

"Mr. Morrison was next introduced. The broken towers of Erin, he said, are not to be rebuilt over champagne bottles and popping corks, but by the popping of rifle bullets. The last Congress of the Fenians, at Pittsburg, adjourned after deciding it to be the last to be held in America. He could tell where it will be held, but feared the people would not keep the secret; but it will be in a place where the members can go without wetting their feet. (Applause.) Mr. M. said there existed at one time a need for qualified men to lead the armies of Ireland; but the experience of the recent war has furnished these. He proceeded to describe the rise of "Fighting Tom Sweeny" from the ranks at Churubusco to his present position as General of the Fenian army. Sweeny entered the American army eighteen years ago to learn how to fight England, and now he lays his sword at the altar. In all the Fenian meetings no plan was submitted until Thursday or Friday last, when General Sweeny produced a plan, which was submitted to a committee of forty men, nine-tenths of whom were officers of the late American army. They reported it feasible and practicable, and urged its adoption. If any man wants to send an expedition direct to Ireland we will not interfere. But will any object to reaching free Ireland from another route? Mr. M. said that President Roberts at the Congress contributed $5,000, and in less time than he had been speaking, $20,000 was contributed by the members of Congress, and $200,000 was guaranteed to be paid within two weeks. President Roberts proposed to give $25,000, and resign to go in the ranks, but his offer was refused. There had been some talk of changing the headquarters from New York city. It was mentioned to Roberts, who said it was unnecessary now, for as soon as the flag floats over our army, he will remove his headquarters to the field. Mr. M. said the first stroke of the campaign is in Washington. It was proper in the capital of this great Republic we begin to work to establish one elsewhere."

We leave the reader to make his own comments. We may look for startling events soon.

TEMPORAL POWER OF THE POPE.

The "temporal power of the Pope" is in a very critical condition, and this fact the Catholics begin to feel. One known as "Rev. Father O'Connor," preached a sermon on Lord's day, Feb. 11th, in the College Hall, connected with "the Church of St. Francis Xavier," in Sixteenth St., New York, on the "Temporal power of the Pope." The large hall was crowded to its utmost capacity by an attentive audience. In the continuance of the temporal power of the Pope, the speaker thought there was more at stake than the mere power over territory. He said "the Pope had declared that in the present state of the world it was necessary for its welfare, that his authority should be sustained." He said "the present territory was assigned to the Pope for ever." He also claimed "that the temporal power of the Pope rested on more incontestible rights than any other power in Europe." (Applause.) He said, "who will blame the Pope for asserting his right, now threatened? It is a legitimate right, and it is a guarantee to him of his power over the christian world." The Popes, he said, "had a right to defend the temporal power which was vested in their successors."

He concluded his speech as follows:—

"At the present time a canal is being pierced through the Isthmus of Suez. A similar work may be undertaken before long in South America, which may become the channel of commerce with Europe and Eastern America and the immense population dwelling on the shores of the Pacific. Immense interests will grow up; capital will be invested depending on these works; treaties will be established with the people whose country is traversed; the commercial world will thus gain an interest on the soil—the right to establish an unobstructed passage. Now suppose fifty or one hundred years hence the descendants of those people who selected these establishments shall say, We will have no more canals pass through our territory; you must go in another direction; we claim to do as we please with our own; instead of your stores and warehouses we prefer verdant pastures and quiet homes; we care not what our forefathers did; the world belongs to the living, not to the dead; they could not deprive us of our sovereign rights; go your way—what reply would be given to these people? Would capital and commerce be abandoned, trade deranged, in deference to the commands of these people? If other arrangements failed to change their views there is little doubt that a suitable dose of solid shot and shell would be applied to teach them the force of their logic. (Applause.) It is upon these grounds the Catholic world claim their rights. We hold the Lombards and the people of those territories to their bargains. We cannot abandon the rights so fairly won and so dearly defended—(applause)—and connected with such important interests to the Catholic world. The reverend lecturer then proceeded to relate his experiences in Rome, illustrating by anecdotes the devotion of the people to the spiritual and temporal rule of the Popes. He then endeavored to explain the origin and to justify the continuance of the Pope's temporal power. God himself seemed to have watched over it. The Italians had a proverb among themselves, that they who lay their hands upon the Pope would be sure to burn their own fingers. Those who raise shouts of triumph or cries of despair at the calamities that befall him are like those who are alarmed at the temporary eclipse of the sun or moon. Let them wait a while, and all will be bright as ever. The experience of ages points like the hand of Providence to the present state of things to justify this confidence, and he who will place his calculation on the experience of ages would rather stake his whole fortune on the certainty of a Pope reigning in Rome fifty years hence than that a descendant of Victor Emanuel would rule over Italy, or the heir of Napoleon govern France. (Applause.) God had built his Church upon a rock, and the gates of hell could not prevail against it."

This sounds rather boastful,—very much like the language attributed to the "woman" on the scarlet-colored beast, in Rev. 18: 7, "I sit a queen, and am no widow, and shall see no sorrow." This is her language just before the time of her destruction. How like the position of old Babylon, when Belshazzar had his great feast, to express a feeling just like that now manifested by mystical Babylon, at Rome. The cup of sorrow is not far from her lips. The great day of the Lord is at hand. Are we ready to meet the Son of man?

LIFE SKETCHES.

A new edition has just been issued, and those who have subscribed and paid, will be supplied just as soon as it can be ascertained who have been supplied, and who have not. As some copies have been sent directly from Boston during Mrs. Mussey's absence, it may be difficult to tell the whole number who are yet unsupplied. Will not those who are expecting copies, whether paid for or not, please send their names immediately, and money if they have not already paid, and they shall receive the books by return mail. Price $1.00, postpaid.

Quite a number have received copies which are not yet paid for. Will they not send in the money immediately? Sr. Mussey needs every cent due her to pay for the present edition. Now who will send in their names and money, or the names of their friends, and thus enable Sr. M. to dispose of the whole edition at once, pay her bills, and pay her for her trouble in the past?

Those sending money now due, address Mrs. ABIGAIL MUSSEY, Crisis Box, Boston, Mass.

Those who wish for books, address E. P. Woodward, (Crisis Box), Boston, Mass.

THE MISSION IN PHILADELPHIA.

BRO. GRANT:—Allow me through the Crisis to express a few thoughts concerning the mission in Philadelphia, over which the Lord has placed our beloved Bro. Burbank. He has been instrumental in doing much good already amongst the most fallen and degraded of our citizens, and the work is still going on, and we in Philadelphia have often felt the necessity of some place, where those benefited might be removed from the former scenes of their degradation. To meet that necessity, Bro. Burbank has purchased a house at an expense of $2500, but as yet has no means of paying the money. Are there not twenty-five Advent brethren in the United States, having plenty of the Lord's money, who will each send him $100, and thus relieve his mind from all future anxiety on that subject? Your Bro. in Christ,

WM. STUART.

THE "BRUISED REED."

This is the title of the little pamphlet which I have prepared for the press, but I need about twenty-five dollars more than I now have at command, to pay the cost of publishing.

I have a printed index which I will gladly send to any address, on application. Some have inquired the price of the book. I should be glad if I was able to send it to all, without money and without price; but I suppose this will be impracticable. The retail price probably will not exceed fifteen cents a copy.

If any ask why I propose to publish so small a work, I suppose a satisfactory answer would be, "I have not the means to publish a large one, and not even this without help." A few words now in this place, may serve as a "preface" to the little book.

A reed, at best, is but a poor stick. Like the vine, it is "not fit for any work." It is worth but very little for fuel, and is not strong enough for use in ordinary work, where sound wood is required. This is a reed in its "best estate." But throw it down in a traveled street, and let the horses trample it under their feet, and let heavy laden team wagons crush it, then it is a bruised reed—good for nothing. This is my condition. If the Lord does any good with such a poor stick, all the glory is his alone. F. H. CHAMBERLAIN.

CONVENTION OF WOMEN.

DEAR SISTERS:—As I have received many letters asking when and where this meeting is to be held; and as it is impossible for me to answer them all, I will say to you, through the Crisis, that we adjourned our meeting at Poultney to meet on the the second Tuesday in April, 1866, wherever the door opened.

Where do you want us to meet? We have a standing invitation from the church at Poultney to return this coming April, and those who attended that one remember well the glorious season we had there. I am now ready to receive calls from any of the churches where the friends can provide for the delegates for a week; but prefer to visit some church where our labors are needed, as there will be some good laborers among us, and we wish to do all the good possible in that space of time. As there will not be so much business attended to at this session as the last, we shall spend the time in laboring for souls, for we believe time is short, and many souls must be gathered in in a very short space of time.

Sisters, get your reports ready. Let us see what we have been doing the year past. Remember the covenant we made to meet at the throne of grace every day at twelve o'clock to pray for this meeting. That covenant still binds us, therefore let us come boldly to a throne of grace, and ask our heavenly Father to bless our work.

We would like to meet in as central a place as possible. Those who wish to understand what this convention is for will please refer to the Crisis of last March and April.

Our Mission Schools in Memphis.

The day and evening schools in Memphis, which have now been going on some five or six weeks, under the charge of the Sisters Bywater, are doing well. We have just received the following private note from Bro. Himes about these schools, and give it a place in the Crisis as an item of interest to all the friends of the mission. W. B. H.

DEAR BRO. HERRON:—Our day school is doing well, but is yet small. The evening school is larger. Some of the freedmen already begin to read and write. I have been in the school part of the time, and helped. I have enjoyed it much. And to see how they progress, and how happy they are in the fact that they can get along so well and so fast in reading and writing, fills me with delight. Two of the pupils are local preachers of the African Methodist Church. They will be able to read the Bible and Hymn Book, so as to conduct meetings, in two months more, and will be as proud as graduates from old Harvard. The most pay $1.00 a month, and this has met the expenses of the teachers thus far, so that the rent, light and fuel, lamps, and some cards, etc., have been the only outlay. I shall go to St. Louis next week, and so on home. Yours for the Freedmen,

JOSHUA V. HIMES.

Memphis, Tenn., Feb. 22d.

We have also received the following letter:—

TO THE MISSIONARY BOARD.

From the Freedmen's School at Memphis.

DEAR FRIENDS:—Elder Himes, your minister you sent to us, told us you would send us some teachers, which made us very glad. But he says now, you will not send them at present. We all feel sorry for this. [The Board have sent them.—W. B. H.] We have long prayed for help to teach us how to read and write. We all want to read the Bible. At our request, Elder Himes started a school the last week in January, and we are getting to learn right smart, and we pray the Lord to make you willing to help us all you can. We (all who can) will pay our teacher one dollar a month for teaching us to read and write, and we hope you will not have much disadvantage from us. We are very thankful you sent Bro. Himes to us, to preach the kingdom and show us how to read the Bible.

Memphis, Tenn., Feb. 7th, 1866.

The above letter was read to the entire school on the evening of the 7th of February, and Mr. David Randolph, one of the scholars, who is a local preacher in the African M. E. Church, called for an expression of the school, when it was adopted by all.

Yours very respectfully,

SARAH A. BYWATER, Teacher.

TRACTS ACKNOWLEDGED.

BRO. GRANT:—I take this opportunity to express my heartfelt thanks to those devoted stewards of God in Connecticut, Rhode Island and New Hampshire, who have donated money for tracts for Minnesota. In consequence of which we received several packages from the Advent Christian Publication Society, Boston, Mass., for distribution in this State. I would also express my gratitude for a package of choice tracts from Mrs. A. E. Colton, N. Y. The most of these tracts have been scattered broadcast throughout this section of country, and we have reason to believe have done and are still doing a great work, in opening the eyes of many to the truth as it is in Jesus. The remainder are in the hands of faithful persons, who are sending them forth in every direction on their mission of love. They have gone forth with many prayers, and a firm reliance upon God that he would bless his own truth.

O! you that have thus cast into the treasury of the Lord, will you not in the great day of accounts receive your own with usury? Instead of burying your talent in the earth, you have put it out at interest; and how vast will be the accumulation of that interest you may never know until the great day of reckoning. By thus scattering the bread of life to thousands who are perishing for lack of knowledge, how many saints you have comforted and strengthened, how many wavering ones confirmed, how many backsliders brought home, how many sinners induced to kneel at the foot of the cross and accept of proffered mercy. "He that winneth souls is wise." How many souls may these tracts win for Christ! And who shall receive the reward? Will not those who donated them receive the recompense of their labors of love in the resurrection of the just? Yes. Then "they that be wise shall shine as the brightness of the firmament, and they that turn many to righteousness as the stars forever and ever." Who can desire a better investment?

THE AMERICAN ADVENT MISSION SOCIETY.

ITS WORK AMONG THE FREEDMEN.

A number of questions have been asked with regard to our mission work; to some of which, in order to prevent misapprehension in the minds of any, as to the objects and doings of the Society, it is deemed proper here to reply.

ITS OBJECT.

1. "What is the object of the Society? Is it to educate the freedmen in the arts and sciences?"

It is not. The Society has never contemplated any such work. The great object of the Society, in their labor among the freedmen, and the object in relation to which all other efforts are but as means to that end, is THEIR CHRISTIANIZATION,—by the preaching of the gospel, by faithful and continued instruction in its principles and duties, and by teaching them to read it for themselves; which last, as one of the means of christianization, is regarded as more important than all other.

For the accomplishment of this object, missionaries and teachers are to be sent out and sustained; day schools, night schools, and Sabbath schools established; meetings for prayer and religious teaching held; churches organized, families visited, the poor and the sick and the old and the young cared for, and a system of moral and religious training adopted, which, with God's blessing, will result in raising the freedmen from their state of ignorance and degradation to a nobler manhood and a purer christianhood, and thus fit them for greater responsibilities and usefulness in this world, and prepare them for the infinite joy and glory of the world to come.

This is the work which the American Advent Mission Society proposes to do. For this purpose the Society was organized. For this purpose were its funds raised. And for this purpose was its President commissioned to proceed to St. Louis and Memphis to establish schools and missions there, or wherever in that vicinity Providence should open the way.

With this object in view, a mission has been established in Memphis, another in St. Louis, and one is contemplated in St. Charles. The school in St. Louis is under the charge of Miss Francelia F. Curtis, teacher, and a board of resident overseers. The Mission at Memphis, which is our chief mission, will be under the supervision of Dr. I. I. Leslie, recently from the Nashville Mission of the American Millennial Association. Bro. Leslie's whole heart is in the work, and his ability and experience, and soundness in the faith, render him a valuable acquisition. He will be assisted in his labors by Miss Martha S. Butler, a qualified and experienced teacher from Connecticut, and possibly, also, by the two sisters Bywater, of Memphis, who for some time past have had the school in charge. Bro. Leslie and Sr. Butler started for the scene of their labors last week, and have doubtless arrived there by this time. The friends of our mission work may therefore expect to hear from them before long.

PREACHING WITHOUT TEACHING.

2. "Would not the Society accomplish more good by sending out preachers only, to preach 'the gospel of the kingdom,' and leave to other societies the work of teaching the freedmen to read the Bible?"

Any effort to christianize the freedmen, which pays no regard to their character, condition and wants, will prove a failure. The missionary, therefore, who does not carry with him the primer, the spelling-book, and Testament, as means and auxiliaries in the great work of christianization, will find their doors shut against him, and his efforts fruitless. Their character, condition, and wants, demand something more than preaching.

1. Their moral degradation. Mere preaching fails to reach it, and seems in most cases to effect no radical cure. A more effectual remedy is needed. "The great mass are sadly corrupted and debauched by native depravity, multiplied and intensified by slavery. The sacredness of the marriage relation is comparatively but little appreciated or regarded. Family feuds, jealousy, hate, revenge, broken hearts, or, what is worse, ruined virtue, and worse than orphaned children, are some of the sad and painful facts which the missionary is compelled to witness." Such is the character of the great mass; and even the majority of those among them who are nominally christian, are said to be not much better. The membership in the African churches South is very large, and they exhibit much apparent enjoyment in religious worship, and show much seeming piety; yet it is very far from being all real.

Says the American Missionary,—"A well grounded suspicion rests upon much of this assumed or vaunted piety, because it fails to make its possessors better; those who make the largest pretensions to it being persistently guilty of the grossest sins,—falsehood, dishonesty and licentiousness;"—and facts are related to show that this is, to a very great extent, characteristic of the so-called christianity of the negroes South, ministers not excepted. They have had preaching all their lives, yet still they are, as a people, with a few Uncle Tom exceptions, vicious and degraded, and seemingly ignorant of what belongs to christian character and duties. Vices witnessed in the master have been copied and so long practised, that they have become a part of their very being—a second nature; and they can be eradicated only by teaching them to read the Word of God for themselves, and by a thorough religious training, under the patient and repeated instruction of pious teachers.

2. Their ignorant and defenceless condition. They are in a state of the most abject ignorance, and are still, to a great extent, subject to the power of their former oppressors, who, as never before, are embittered and exasperated against them as the cause of all their disasters. They are denied the rights to which, as freedmen and citizens, they are entitled, their condition, in many places, being in some respects worse now than it was in a state of slavery; and, against the outrage and wrong which, beyond the shield of the Freedmen's Bureau and the presence of the U. S. troops, they are still compelled to suffer, they have, in most cases, no defence and no redress. It becomes, then, a question of christian philanthropy,—What, in this direction, can we do for their help?

3. Their wants. They want to learn to read. Having got the idea that the ability to read will secure to them a recognition of their just rights, including the right to property, the right of suffrage, and the right to testify in

THE SEWING MACHINES AND DICTIONARIES.

"A Webster's Dictionary is something that I very much want, and I should be glad if I could make up a list of ten subscribers, so as to obtain it. But those who sympathize with our views are so few here, that I shall be unable to get the number required. The five which I have sent are all I can get."

"With a large family to support, and no dependence but my needle, a Sewing Machine would be a great help to us; and if there were more of our faith in this place, or more who look upon it with favor, I should go to work with some hope of securing it. If the requisite number (32) were not so large, I think I could, as it is; but I must be content for the present, to go without what I so much need."

We have received a number of letters like the above, and to put the Sewing Machine and the Webster's Dictionary within the reach of all who are thus situated, we make the following offer:—

For every $5.00, with five new subscribers, and $2.50 from each for one year, one copy of WEBSTER'S ($12.00) UNABRIDGED DICTIONARY.

For every $20.00 with sixteen new subscribers, and $2.50 from each for one year, one of GROVER & BAKER'S ($55.00) SEWING MACHINES.

This offer, with the other, extends only till the 1st of June. All names for the Dictionaries or Machines must be sent in before that date.

THE WORLD'S CRISIS.

Valuable Premiums for New Subscribers!

SEWING MACHINES AND DICTIONARIES.

To every one who shall, any time before the 1st of June, send us, with the money, THIRTY-TWO NEW SUBSCRIBERS for One Year, ($2.50 each), or Sixty-four for Six Months, ($1.25 each), we will send, by express or rail, a

Grover & Baker's
($55) SEWING MACHINE,

one of the simplest, most durable, completest and best, (in our opinion the very best), in the market. A great labor-saving machine and blessing, in the family and work room; and a gift of priceless value, which you can now, with a little effort, present to your thankful wife, sister, mother or daughter.

FOR TEN NEW SUBSCRIBERS, with the money for One Year, or Twenty for Six months, one copy of

Webster's ($12)
UNABRIDGED DICTIONARY,

containing 10,000 words and meanings not found in other Dictionaries, over 3000 fine Engravings, and more matter than any other single volume in the world. Invaluable to every student, minister, or general reader.

FOR THREE NEW SUBSCRIBERS, with the money for One Year, or Six for Six Months, one copy, postpaid, of

or a Bible Dictionary; either and both of which are indispensable helps in the study of the Scriptures.

The names and monies can be sent in as fast as they are obtained, and when the full number is received, the Gift will be forwarded.

Come, brethren, a general rally from Maine to California! The Judge is at the door; and, with these gifts in view, and the greater reward yet to be given to all who do what they can to prepare a people for his coming, let us every one see what we can do.

A Call from Milwaukee.

Bro. Alex. McDonald writes from Milwaukee, Wis.:—"There is a good field here for a good evangelical minister. If such will come this way, he can have a home with us as long as he may think proper to stay; and I will secure a place for him to speak in, and do all I can otherwise to sustain him in proclaiming the truth. Any preaching brother wishing to answer this call, will please address ALEX. MCDONALD, No. 121 Fourth St., Milwaukee, Wis."

For the World's Crisis.

AN EXPLANATION.

Some have wanted me to explain why I published Noah Bailey. I will here say that, to carry out his purposes, he pretends to be an Advent preacher, while in reality he is an enemy to all of their doctrines, and claims he is far ahead of them; despises the Crisis and other Advent publications; explains Scripture in a way to part wives from their husbands, and has done it in a number of instances,—so people say, where he is best known. He is a wolf in sheep's clothing, and guilty of the meanest crimes. Since writing before, Bro. Israel Damman, from Maine, says the truth about him was not half told; and others from Vermont know him to be a lazy, indolent hypocrite, and ought to be published for the good of others.

Now this is my explanation. Those who are under his influence will be ruined, unless they break the spell and escape.

HIRAM MUNGER.

P. S.—I know Bailey to be a lazy, dangerous man among christians. His course is destructive to public morals and religion, and I would warn my brethren to keep clear of his influence. JOHN G. HOOK.

SPIRITUALISM.—NO. 10.

THE DOCTRINES OF SPIRITUALISM.

"Now the Spirit speaketh expressly that in the latter times some shall depart from the faith, giving heed to seducing spirits, and doctrines of devils."—1 TIM. 4: 1.

As the Scripture cannot be broken" (John 10: 35), the foregoing must be fulfilled "in the latter times," where it is believed we are now living. It is a well-known fact that large numbers of the most noted Spiritualists have once been professors of religion, and members of churches. Many of their lecturers have been preachers of the gospel. Thus it is shown that the Scripture, just quoted, is not broken. If we did not see what we do, then it might be said the Scripture has failed.

If, as we have endeavored to show, Spiritualism is but another name for Demonism, then the doctrines taught by the spirits and their followers should be opposed to the Bible, in order to correspond with the rest of their teachings. We will now let the spirits and the Spiritualists tell their own story in their own language. Most of the evidence will be that which has been published in the Banner of Light, in Boston, which has been the leading Spiritualist paper for many years. Other Spiritualist papers and books publish the same. We will arrange their doctrines in the following twelve articles of faith, which we will call

THE SPIRIT'S CREED.

1. The Bible is not a reliable book.

In the testimony of a spirit given in the Banner of Light, Nov. 23d, 1861, it is said:—

"Many times before we have said that we cannot place implicit confidence in that which we find between the lids of the Bible."

A spirit, claiming to be Rev. John Moore, says:—"My friend asks, 'Do you believe the Bible?' I answer, No, I do not. I cannot believe one word of it as the word of God."

Another, when speaking of the Bible, says: "You may not place any confidence in that book.... I can assure my friend that God had no more to do with writing that book than he had;... and do not expect to create any light in the mental world, if you cling to your Bible."

A spirit, who claims to be Timothy M. Baker, says:—"I've got folks in Montpelier, and... I want them to get my sister where I can talk to her straight as I do to you, and I'll knock her God and Bible all to nothing."

2. There is no sin.

These spirits say:—"We say, as we have said a thousand times before, there is no such thing as sin; no such thing as evil... Now, then, if there is sin anywhere, God made that sin—he is the author of it." "The foundation of your religion is fast fading away. Soon we shall find you shaking hands with these new things. This must be so.... Jesus of Nazareth, if he were here to-day, would tell you as we tell you."

Another spirit, when speaking of sin, says: "Spiritually and divinely considered, there is no sin. Full well we know the book you call the Bible teaches of sin. Full well we know the whole christian world recognizes such a condition; but, to us, there is no sin."

Another says:—"All men and women are equally righteous, because all are good. No matter where we find them, or under whatever condition they exist, they are good."

Says another:—"Every thought, word and deed is of God, and therefore modern Spiritualism is of divine origin.... The religion of the heathen is no less divine than is yours. God approved of it as well as yours."

Another spirit says:—"Every thing that ever has been or ever will be is an immutable decree of God.... There is not an atom in the universe but will at some time become an immortal spirit.... It is vain for man to talk about disobeying the law of God; he can at no time disobey it.... Every grain of sand you tread upon to-day shall in time become an immortal soul, endowed with wisdom.... You may curse the Author of your being. Do you sin? No; you are but casting off the gross in your nature—obeying your God.... The highest archangel was once the lowest spirit on earth."

Says another spirit:—"'What!' says the self-righteous man, 'is God controlling the murderer when he lifts his hand against his brother?' Yes, we answer, he is, and every atom in nature proves us true."

Another says:—"We believe our God to be the author of sin, as of good. If we give him his due, we give him this."

3. There is no devil.

The demons appear to be very anxious to have us believe that no such beings exist. This is just as we should expect. A thief would be glad to convince all his neighbors that there were no thieves, so that they would not lock their doors and safes, and then he could have free access to them. So, if the demons can convince us that there are no such beings, we shall not be on the watch for their snares. The following is their teaching on this point:—

"There is no devil either.... Seems to me as though man must be devoid of good sense to believe any thing of the kind."

4. Christ is not raised.

A spirit says:—"But the question arises, What became of the body of Jesus? We answer, the friends of Jesus stole away the body.... So then we will say the natural body of Jesus Christ was never reanimated after the crucifixion. All nature, our God, tells us so."

How different the foregoing reads from the Bible on this subject. Says the apostle Paul,—"If Christ be not raised, your faith is vain; ye are yet in your sins. Then they also which are fallen asleep in Christ have perished.... But now is Christ risen from the dead, and become the first fruits of them that slept."—1 Cor. 15: 17, 18, 20. Luke says Jesus "showed himself alive after his passion by many infallible proofs." Acts 1: 3. Peter said to the Jews: "Ye... killed the Prince of life, whom God hath raised from the dead; whereof we are witnesses." Acts 3: 15.

5. Man is his own judge.

"Within the bosom of every man and woman there is a judgment seat, a throne of God; and before that, and that alone, should men bow down and worship. By that alone they are to be guided. He is to be judged by himself as a spirit; he is to come before no other tribunal. If by the law of self he is condemned, he must suffer according to the condemnation; if acquitted by self, he is indeed acquitted."

We need not stop to say that this is utterly opposed to the teaching of the Bible. According to this standard, if a man gets mad at his neighbor and kills him, no one must condemn him. Or if the seducer leads hundreds from the path of virtue, to gratify his beastly passions, which have completely seared his conscience about such things, "he is to come before no other tribunal" but "himself;" and his decision, is, to seduce the next fair one he can find. This is but one item in the "new religion" of Spiritualism, which, it is said, will "exert a moral and reformatory power among the nations, and inaugurate the millennial era."

6. There is no resurrection of the dead.

A spirit says:—"We presume our good brother will ask if Jesus did not raise the dead? He never did, and never could." Another says:—"The grave is the resting place of the form we no more require." All the spirits and their followers, so far as we know, deny the resurrection of the dead, which is a cardinal doctrine of the Bible. Says the apostle Paul, "If the dead rise not, then is not Christ raised." Again he says:—"Now if Christ be preached that he rose from the dead, how say some among you that there is no resurrection of the dead?" But if there be no resurrection of the dead, then is Christ not risen."—1 Cor. 15: 12, 13, 16. It will be seen that the apostle was free to admit that christianity was a failure if the dead rise not. He says, "If after the manner of men I have fought with the beasts at Ephesus, what advantageth it me, if the dead rise not? Let us eat and drink; for to-morrow we die." —1 Cor. 15: 32. Again we read,—"The Lord himself shall descend from heaven with a shout, with the voice of the archangel, and the trump of God; and the dead in Christ shall rise first."—1 Thess. 4: 16. Says the Savior:—"Marvel not at this; for the hour is coming, in the which all that are in the graves shall hear his voice, and shall come forth; they that have done good unto the resurrection of life, and they that have done evil, unto the resurrection of damnation."—John 5: 28. 29. No doctrine is more plainly taught in the Bible than that of the resurrection of the dead. This the spirits deny.

7. Man is his own Savior.

"The only true religion is a natural religion. . . . you are your own Saviors."

In answer to the question, "Did not Christ die, that through his death we might inherit eternal life?" a spirit answers, "No! Christ did not die, that through his death we might live. . . . His death has no more to do with the remission of sins than the death of any of your martyrs."

Says a spirit, "No man should rely upon any Savior outside of himself. . . . Each and every one is a Savior, as he is a judge, a God."

The teaching of the spirits on this point is directly the opposite of that in the Bible. When speaking of Jesus, Peter says:—"Neither is there salvation in any other; for there is none other name under heaven given among men whereby we must be saved."—Acts 4: 12.

8. Christ will not come personally.

Said Leo Miller in a discourse at the Melodeon in Boston, June 2d, 1860, "We behold in the advent of Spiritualism the second coming of the Spirit of Jesus of Nazareth."

So far as we can learn, all the spirits deny the personal coming of Christ. According to the teaching of the apostle John, this denial is one of the special marks of antichrist. When Jesus ascended, it was said to his disciples,—"Ye men of Galilee, why stand ye gazing up into heaven? this SAME JESUS which is taken up from you into heaven, shall so come in like manner as ye have seen him go into heaven."—Acts 1: 11. No language could more plainly express the personal coming of Christ. Says the apostle, "The Lord HIMSELF shall descend from heaven." 1 Thess. 4: 16. Christ came personally the first time, as such he taught in Jerusalem and elsewhere, was crucified, dead and buried, and "rose again the third day according to the Scriptures."—1 Cor. 15: 4. "This same Jesus" is the one who is to come again to raise the dead and set up his kingdom. But all the spirits deny it. Which shall we believe? the Bible, or the spirits?

THE GREAT FEAST DAY AT ROME.

Can you give the month of the year for the great gathering at Rome?

C. CUNNINGHAM.

As the great gathering to be held this year at the "seven-hilled city," is said to be for the purpose of celebrating the death of St. Peter, then, of course, the great day of the feast must correspond with the one on which the event took place which they wish to commemorate. When in New York a few days since, through the kindness of Bro. M. E. Green, we obtained the following information, from the Le Monde, which appears to fix the month and the day when "the great celebration" will take place:

"Last winter a number of Italian revolutionists sold in Rome, at a very low price, a quantity of steel watch chains, to the end of which was attached a small steel globe. When their stock was got rid of they explained that each chain was a symbol of the enslaved condition in which Rome and Venice were at that moment, and that the steel ball typified one of Orsini's bombs. Several young Romans, who had been taken in quite unawares to purchase and wear these steel ornaments, determined to have their revenge, and ordered a quantity of watch chains to be made after the design of the chains supposed to have been worn by St. Peter, and which are preserved in the Eudoxian Basilisk of one of the Roman churches. His Holiness not only approved of this idea, but suggested that the watch hook be copied from St. Peter's cross. They had an immense success, were eagerly bought up, and their value further enhanced by the Pope's permission that each chain might be laid for a moment on the original, preserved, as I have said, in the Eudoxian Basilisk, the result of which has been a number of miracles effected by these new ornaments. Not only have these blessed watch appendages been sold in all parts of Italy, but also in Belgium and Germany. The profits thereby realized are to be devoted to the erection of a monument which the youth of Rome wish to raise in honor of the Apostle Peter's chains, and which they hope to inaugurate on the eighteenth centenary of St. Peter's martyrdom, which will take place next 29th June. The steel copies are, it appears, to be purchased at two depots in Paris, to which I recommend all faithful sons of the church to apply ere the stock be exhausted; one is in the Rue St. Sulpice and the second in the Rue Grenelle St. Germain."

The foregoing shows quite plainly that the 29th of next June will be the day of special interest at Rome. Till that time, it will be only preparation for the great day. We shall wait with much interest for the news at that time, and during the remainder of the year.

FENIANISM.

It appears from some things which have recently come to light, that the Fenians are about ready to commence active operations upon a grand scale. On Monday evening, Feb. 26th, they had a large meeting of much interest in Odd Fellows' Hall, Washington, D. C. The President of the meeting was Mr. James Ryan, District Centre of D. C. Able speakers made stirring speeches, that met with much applause. Among the speakers was M. Morrison. The following is the substance of some of his remarks, as reported in the Washington Daily Star of Feb. 28th:—

"Mr. Morrison was next introduced. The broken towers of Erin, he said, are not to be rebuilt over champagne bottles and popping corks, but by the popping of rifle bullets. The last Congress of the Fenians, at Pittsburg, adjourned after deciding it to be the last to be held in America. He could tell where it will be held, but feared the people would not keep the secret; but it will be in a place where the members can go without wetting their feet. (Applause.) Mr. M. said there existed at one time a need for qualified men to lead the armies of Ireland; but the experience of the recent war has furnished these. He proceeded to describe the rise of "Fighting Tom Sweeny" from the ranks at Churubusco to his present position as General of the Fenian army. Sweeny entered the American army eighteen years ago to learn how to fight England, and now he lays his sword at the altar. In all the Fenian meetings no plan was submitted until Thursday or Friday last, when General Sweeny produced a plan, which was submitted to a committee of forty men, nine-tenths of whom were officers of the late American army. They reported it feasible and practicable, and urged its adoption. If any man wants to send an expedition direct to Ireland we will not interfere. But will any object to reaching free Ireland from another route? Mr. M. said that President Roberts at the Congress contributed $5,000, and in less time than he had been speaking, $20,000 was contributed by the members of Congress, and $200,000 was guaranteed to be paid within two weeks. President Roberts proposed to give $25,000, and resign to go in the ranks, but his offer was refused. There had been some talk of changing the headquarters from New York city. It was mentioned to Roberts, who said it was unnecessary now, for as soon as the flag floats over our army, he will remove his headquarters to the field. Mr. M. said the first stroke of the campaign is in Washington. It was proper in the capital of this great Republic we begin to work to establish one elsewhere."

We leave the readerto make his own comments. We may look for startling events soon.

TEMPORAL POWER OF THE POPE.

The "temporal power of the Pope" is in a very critical condition, and this fact the Catholics begin to feel. One known as "Rev. Father O'Connor," preached a sermon on Lord's day, Feb. 11th, in the College Hall, connected with "the Church of St. Francis Xavier," in Sixteenth St., New York, on the "Temporal power of the Pope." The large hall was crowded to its utmost capacity by an attentive audience. In the continuance of the temporal power of the Pope, the speaker thought there was more at stake than the mere power over territory. He said "the Pope had declared that in the present state of the world it was necessary for its welfare, that his authority should be sustained." He said "the present territory was assigned to the Pope for ever." He also claimed "that the temporal power of the Pope rested on more incontestible rights than any other power in Europe." (Applause.) He said, "who will blame the Pope for asserting his right, now threatened? It is a legitimate right, and it is a guarantee to him of his power over the christian world." The Popes, he said, "had a right to defend the temporal power which was vested in their successors."

"At the present time a canal is being pierced through the Isthmus of Suez. A similar work may be undertaken before long in South America, which may become the channel of commerce with Europe and Eastern America and the immense population dwelling on the shores of the Pacific. Immense interests will grow up; capital will be invested depending on these works; treaties will be established with the people whose country is traversed; the commercial world will thus gain an interest on the soil—the right to establish an unobstructed passage. Now suppose fifty or one hundred years hence the descendants of those people who selected these establishments shall say, We will have no more canals pass through our territory; you must go in another direction; we claim to do as we please with our own; instead of your stores and warehouses we prefer verdant pastures and quiet homes; we care not what our forefathers did; the world belongs to the living, not to the dead; they could not deprive us of our sovereign rights; go your way—what reply would be given to these people? Would capital and commerce be abandoned, trade deranged, in deference to the commands of these people? If other arrangements failed to change their views there is little doubt that a suitable dose of solid shot and shell would be applied to teach them the force of their logic. (Applause.) It is upon these grounds the Catholic world claim their rights. We hold the Lombards and the people of those territories to their bargains. We cannot abandon the rights so fairly won and so dearly defended—(applause)—and connected with such important interests to the Catholic world. The reverend lecturer then proceeded to relate his experiences in Rome, illustrating by anecdotes the devotion of the people to the spiritual and temporal rule of the Popes. He then endeavored to explain the origin and to justify the continuance of the Pope's temporal power. God himself seemed to have watched over it. The Italians had a proverb among themselves, that they who lay their hands upon the Pope would be sure to burn their own fingers. Those who raise shouts of triumph or cries of despair at the calamities that befall him are like those who are alarmed at the temporary eclipse of the sun or moon. Let them wait a while, and all will be bright as ever. The experience of ages points like the hand of Providence to the present state of things to justify this confidence, and he who will place his calculation on the experience of ages would rather stake his whole fortune on the certainty of a Pope reigning in Rome fifty years hence than that a descendant of Victor Emanuel would rule over Italy, or the heir of Napoleon govern France. (Applause.) God had built his Church upon a rock, and the gates of hell could not prevail against it."

This sounds rather boastful,—very much like the language attributed to the "woman" on the scarlet-colored beast, in Rev. 18: 7, "I sit a queen, and am no widow, and shall see no sorrow." This is her language just before the time of her destruction. How like the position of old Babylon, when Belshazzar had his great feast, to express a feeling just like that now manifested by mystical Babylon, at Rome. The cup of sorrow is not far from her lips. The great day of the Lord is at hand. Are we ready to meet the Son of man?

LIFE SKETCHES.

A new edition has just been issued, and those who have subscribed and paid, will be supplied just as soon as it can be ascertained who have been supplied, and who have not. As some copies have been sent directly from Boston during Mrs. Mussey's absence, it may be difficult to tell the whole number who are yet unsupplied. Will not those who are expecting copies, whether paid for or not, please send their names immediately, and money if they have not already paid, and they shall receive the books by return mail. Price $1.00, postpaid.

Quite a number have received copies which are not yet paid for. Will they not send in the money immediately? Sr. Mussey needs every cent due her to pay for the present edition. Now who will send in their names and money, or the names of their friends, and thus enable Sr. M. to dispose of the whole edition at once, pay her bills, and pay her for her trouble in the past?

Those sending money now due, address Mrs. ABIGAIL MUSSEY, Crisis Box, Boston, Mass.

Those who wish for books, address E. P. Woodward, (Crisis Box), Boston, Mass.

THE MISSION IN PHILADELPHIA.

BRO. GRANT:—Allow me through the Crisis to express a few thoughts concerning the mission in Philadelphia, over which the Lord has placed our beloved Bro. Burbank. He has been instrumental in doing much good already amongst the most fallen and degraded of our citizens, and the work is still going on, and we in Philadelphia have often felt the necessity of some place, where those benefited might be removed from the former scenes of their degradation. To meet that necessity, Bro. Burbank has purchased a house at an expense of $2500, but as yet has no means of paying the money. Are there not twenty-five Advent brethren in the United States, having plenty of the Lord's money, who will each send him $100, and thus relieve his mind from all future anxiety on that subject? Your Bro. in Christ,

WM. STUART.

THE "BRUISED REED."

This is the title of the little pamphlet which I have prepared for the press, but I need about twenty-five dollars more than I now have at command, to pay the cost of publishing.

I have a printed index which I will gladly send to any address, on application. Some have inquired the price of the book. I should be glad if I was able to send it to all, without money and without price; but I suppose this will be impracticable. The retail price probably will not exceed fifteen cents a copy.

If any ask why I propose to publish so small a work, I suppose a satisfactory answer would be, "I have not the means to publish a large one, and not even this without help." A few words now in this place, may serve as a "preface" to the little book.

A reed, at best, is but a poor stick. Like the vine, it is "not fit for any work." It is worth but very little for fuel, and is not strong enough for use in ordinary work, where sound wood is required. This is a reed in its "best estate." But throw it down in a traveled street, and let the horses trample it under their feet, and let heavy laden team wagons crush it, then it is a bruised reed—good for nothing. This is my condition. If the Lord does any good with such a poor stick, all the glory is his alone. F. H. CHAMBERLAIN.

For the World's Crisis.

CONVENTION OF WOMEN.

DEAR SISTERS:—As I have received many letters asking when and where this meeting is to be held; and as it is impossible for me to answer them all, I will say to you, through the Crisis, that we adjourned our meeting at Poultney to meet on the the second Tuesday in April, 1866, wherever the door opened.

Where do you want us to meet? We have a standing invitation from the church at Poultney to return this coming April, and those who attended that one remember well the glorious season we had there. I am now ready to receive calls from any of the churches where the friends can provide for the delegates for a week; but prefer to visit some church where our labors are needed, as there will be some good laborers among us, and we wish to do all the good possible in that space of time. As there will not be so much business attended to at this session as the last, we shall spend the time in laboring for souls, for we believe time is short, and many souls must be gathered in in a very short space of time.

Sisters, get your reports ready. Let us see what we have been doing the year past. Remember the covenant we made to meet at the throne of grace every day at twelve o'clock to pray for this meeting. That covenant still binds us, therefore let us come boldly to a throne of grace, and ask our heavenly Father to bless our work.

We would like to meet in as central a place as possible. Those who wish to understand what this convention is for will please refer to the Crisis of last March and April.

Our Mission Schools in Memphis.

The day and evening schools in Memphis, which have now been going on some five or six weeks, under the charge of the Sisters Bywater, are doing well. We have just received the following private note from Bro. Himes about these schools, and give it a place in the Crisis as an item of interest to all the friends of the mission. W. B. H.

DEAR BRO. HERRON:—Our day school is doing well, but is yet small. The evening school is larger. Some of the freedmen already begin to read and write. I have been in the school part of the time, and helped. I have enjoyed it much. And to see how they progress, and how happy they are in the fact that they can get along so well and so fast in reading and writing, fills me with delight. Two of the pupils are local preachers of the African Methodist Church. They will be able to read the Bible and Hymn Book, so as to conduct meetings, in two months more, and will be as proud as graduates from old Harvard. The most pay $1.00 a month, and this has met the expenses of the teachers thus far, so that the rent, light and fuel, lamps, and some cards, etc., have been the only outlay. I shall go to St. Louis next week, and so on home. Yours for the Freedmen,

JOSHUA V. HIMES.

Memphis, Tenn., Feb. 22d.

We have also received the following letter:—

TO THE MISSIONARY BOARD.

From the Freedmen's School at Memphis.

DEAR FRIENDS:—Elder Himes, your minister you sent to us, told us you would send us some teachers, which made us very glad. But he says now, you will not send them at present. We all feel sorry for this. [The Board have sent them.—W. B. H.] We have long prayed for help to teach us how to read and write. We all want to read the Bible. At our request, Elder Himes started a school the last week in January, and we are getting to learn right smart, and we pray the Lord to make you willing to help us all you can. We (all who can) will pay our teacher one dollar a month for teaching us to read and write, and we hope you will not have much disadvantage from us. We are very thankful you sent Bro. Himes to us, to preach the kingdom and show us how to read the Bible.

Memphis, Tenn., Feb. 7th, 1866.

The above letter was read to the entire school on the evening of the 7th of February, and Mr. David Randolph, one of the scholars, who is a local preacher in the African M. E. Church, called for an expression of the school, when it was adopted by all.

Yours very respectfully,

SARAH A. BYWATER, Teacher.

TRACTS ACKNOWLEDGED.

BRO. GRANT:—I take this opportunity to express my heartfelt thanks to those devoted stewards of God in Connecticut, Rhode Island and New Hampshire, who have donated money for tracts for Minnesota. In consequence of which we received several packages from the Advent Christian Publication Society, Boston, Mass., for distribution in this State. I would also express my gratitude for a package of choice tracts from Mrs. A. E. Colton, N. Y. The most of these tracts have been scattered broadcast throughout this section of country, and we have reason to believe have done and are still doing a great work, in opening the eyes of many to the truth as it is in Jesus. The remainder are in the hands of faithful persons, who are sending them forth in every direction on their mission of love. They have gone forth with many prayers, and a firm reliance upon God that he would bless his own truth.

O! you that have thus cast into the treasury of the Lord, will you not in the great day of accounts receive your own with usury? Instead of burying your talent in the earth, you have put it out at interest; and how vast will be the accumulation of that interest you may never know until the great day of reckoning. By thus scattering the bread of life to thousands who are perishing for lack of knowledge, how many saints you have comforted and strengthened, how many wavering ones confirmed, how many backsliders brought home, how many sinners induced to kneel at the foot of the cross and accept of proffered mercy. "He that winneth souls is wise." How many souls may these tracts win for Christ! And who shall receive the reward? Will not those who donated them receive the recompense of their labors of love in the resurrection of the just? Yes. Then "they that be wise shall shine as the brightness of the firmament, and they that turn many to righteousness as the stars forever and ever." Who can desire a better investment?

THE AMERICAN ADVENT MISSION SOCIETY.

ITS WORK AMONG THE FREEDMEN.

A number of questions have been asked with regard to our mission work; to some of which, in order to prevent misapprehension in the minds of any, as to the objects and doings of the Society, it is deemed proper here to reply.

ITS OBJECT.

1. "What is the object of the Society? Is it to educate the freedmen in the arts and sciences?"

It is not. The Society has never contemplated any such work. The great object of the Society, in their labor among the freedmen, and the object in relation to which all other efforts are but as means to that end, is THEIR CHRISTIANIZATION,—by the preaching of the gospel, by faithful and continued instruction in its principles and duties, and by teaching them to read it for themselves; which last, as one of the means of christianization, is regarded as more important than all other.

For the accomplishment of this object, missionaries and teachers are to be sent out and sustained; day schools, night schools, and Sabbath schools established; meetings for prayer and religious teaching held; churches organized, families visited, the poor and the sick and the old and the young cared for, and a system of moral and religious training adopted, which, with God's blessing, will result in raising the freedmen from their state of ignorance and degradation to a nobler manhood and a purer christianhood, and thus fit them for greater responsibilities and usefulness in this world, and prepare them for the infinite joy and glory of the world to come.

This is the work which the American Advent Mission Society proposes to do. For this purpose the Society was organized. For this purpose were its funds raised. And for this purpose was its President commissioned to proceed to St. Louis and Memphis to establish schools and missions there, or wherever in that vicinity Providence should open the way.

With this object in view, a mission has been established in Memphis, another in St. Louis, and one is contemplated in St. Charles. The school in St. Louis is under the charge of Miss Francelia F. Curtis, teacher, and a board of resident overseers. The Mission at Memphis, which is our chief mission, will be under the supervision of Dr. I. I. Leslie, recently from the Nashville Mission of the American Millennial Association. Bro. Leslie's whole heart is in the work, and his ability and experience, and soundness in the faith, render him a valuable acquisition. He will be assisted in his labors by Miss Martha S. Butler, a qualified and experienced teacher from Connecticut, and possibly, also, by the two sisters Bywater, of Memphis, who for some time past have had the school in charge. Bro. Leslie and Sr. Butler started for the scene of their labors last week, and have doubtless arrived there by this time. The friends of our mission work may therefore expect to hear from them before long.

PREACHING WITHOUT TEACHING.

2. "Would not the Society accomplish more good by sending out preachers only, to preach 'the gospel of the kingdom,' and leave to other societies the work of teaching the freedmen to read the Bible?"

Any effort to christianize the freedmen, which pays no regard to their character, condition and wants, will prove a failure. The missionary, therefore, who does not carry with him the primer, the spelling-book, and Testament, as means and auxiliaries in the great work of christianization, will find their doors shut against him, and his efforts fruitless. Their character, condition, and wants, demand something more than preaching.

1. Their moral degradation. Mere preaching fails to reach it, and seems in most cases to effect no radical cure. A more effectual remedy is needed. "The great mass are sadly corrupted and debauched by native depravity, multiplied and intensified by slavery. The sacredness of the marriage relation is comparatively but little appreciated or regarded. Family feuds, jealousy, hate, revenge, broken hearts, or, what is worse, ruined virtue, and worse than orphaned children, are some of the sad and painful facts which the missionary is compelled to witness." Such is the character of the great mass; and even the majority of those among them who are nominally christian, are said to be not much better. The membership in the African churches South is very large, and they exhibit much apparent enjoyment in religious worship, and show much seeming piety; yet it is very far from being all real.

Says the American Missionary,—"A well-grounded suspicion rests upon much of this assumed or vaunted piety, because it fails to make its possessors better; those who make the largest pretensions to it being persistently guilty of the grossest sins,—falsehood, dishonesty and licentiousness;"—and facts are related to show that this is, to a very great extent, characteristic of the so-called christianity of the negroes South, ministers not excepted. They have had preaching all their lives, yet still they are, as a people, with a few Uncle Tom exceptions, vicious and degraded, and seemingly ignorant of what belongs to christian character and duties. Vices witnessed in the master have been copied and so long practised, that they have become a part of their very being—a second nature; and they can be eradicated only by teaching them to read the Word of God for themselves, and by a thorough religious training, under the patient and repeated instruction of pious teachers.

2. Their ignorant and defenceless condition. They are in a state of the most abject ignorance, and are still, to a great extent, subject to the power of their former oppressors, who, as never before, are embittered and exasperated against them as the cause of all their disasters. They are denied the rights to which, as freedmen and citizens, they are entitled, their condition, in many places, being in some respects worse now than it was in a state of slavery; and, against the outrage and wrong which, beyond the shield of the Freedmen's Bureau and the presence of the U. S. troops, they are still compelled to suffer, they have, in most cases, no defence and no redress. It becomes, then, a question of christian philanthropy,—What, in this direction, can we do for their help?

3. Their wants. They want to learn to read. Having got the idea that the ability to read will secure to them a recognition of their just rights, including the right to property, the right of suffrage, and the right to testify in the courts,—and that these will put into their hands the power of self-protection against their enemies and oppressors, they are determined, by every possible effort, to secure to themselves whatever protection and elevation a knowledge of letters may confer; and to that effort will every true christian philanthropist freely and warmly give the help of both his hand and heart.

But they have a higher motive in their efforts to learn to read. The great and crowning desire of their hearts is, to be able to read the Word of God. For that, like the fabled Tantalus, they have, until now, reached forth and yearned after in vain. Though immersed to the chin in a sea of books and Bibles, their insatiable hunger and thirst they have forever been forbidden to satisfy. And now, after famishing so long for the bread of life, and for the water of life, always before their eyes, yet hitherto out of their reach, both are brought, at last, suddenly and freely, to their very lips, and they are bid to eat, drink, and be filled, with or without money or price.

Is it a wonder, then, that they should everywhere exhibit such an intense greed for learning, and especially for the Word of God? Since the world began, never before was such a spectacle seen,—a whole race, born in a day, so nobly ambitious to learn, and making such rapid and wonderful progress. God, who has planted this earnest desire in their hearts, has his purposes to fulfil thereby; and while the last sands of time are falling, he is, by his own appointed instruments, doing a quick work for the enlightenment and redemption of these almost heathen people of a christian land. That missionary of Jesus, therefore, and that missionary association, which would reach them with the gospel of the kingdom, can do so only by taking advantage of this, their great want and desire. Efforts which ignore these wants will fail, and monies expended in mere preaching, regardless of these wants, will be money thrown away. The school, therefore, is the only door of access to the freedmen. This is the testimony of all who have been among them and labored with them.

Says Mr. Horace James, Superintendent of Negro Affairs in North Carolina, "The first want of the negroes is instruction by devoted and cultured teachers. Schools are needed everywhere."

Says the Rev. D. B. Nichols, a missionary in Virginia, "Schools, prayer-meetings, and preaching should go together, and this appears to be the will of God."

Says the American Missionary Association, which is doing more for the evangelization of the freedmen than all other societies together:

"So great was found to be the ignorance of the people, and so universal their desire to learn to read, and especially the Bible, that it became the clearest dictate, not only of finite wisdom but of Divine Providence, that the school-teacher should go with the preacher, and that both alike should be missionaries of the cross. . . . . In very many places, the school teacher, imbued with the spirit of Christ and the love of souls, has seemed to be able to reach them with spiritual instruction as well as the minister who did not teach. . . . . The christian missionary work for the freedmen is one work; it cannot be divided. The minister of Christ, the missionary of the cross, the missionary association that would attempt to divide it, and preach the gospel with no regard to the destitute condition of the people, or their desire for education, would be stripped of more than half its power, and would not be welcomed by the people."

Says Elder Joshua V. Himes, President of the American Advent Mission Society, in a letter to the Board from Memphis,—

"Without a school, all efforts to reach the freedmen by the preaching of the gospel of the kingdom alone, will be comparatively a failure; for they receive with confidence only such as come to them well recommended by those whom they know to be their friends, or who show by their works that they come for their instruction and elevation. What success has attended the labors of Bro. Flagg and myself among the freedmen here and in St. Louis, has been owing to the knowledge that we came to establish schools, and to a favorable introduction to them by those here whom they recognize as their friends. With a school, we can do much; without one, very little."

Says Dr. I. I. Leslie, recently, and for the year past, of the Nashville Mission, in a letter to the Secretary of the Amer. Adv. Miss. Society,—

"The door of access to this people is the school. If you get a school, you can get a congregation; without a school, you can get no hearers. These people, old and young, are all scholars,—mere primary scholars. They are not yet a thinking people; hence you cannot get them to leave their present faith in any thing at once, especially their religious faith. They cannot investigate; and so they will remain under the influence of their present religious teachers (for they have them) until you gain their entire confidence. This you cannot do unless you do something for them—something for their benefit.

The school is what they most desire and ask for. If you will not teach them to read, they look upon you as they do upon the southern white people all around them. If your Board could be here one week, and see the true wants of this people, and understand, as I now do, the only way to gain their confidence, and thus lead them into the truth and to Christ really, they would not, for a moment, entertain the thought that a school could be dispensed with. You may send preachers here to proclaim the coming of the Lord to this poor people, and to lead them into the faith which we entertain, but without, at the same time, teaching them to read the Word of God for themselves, and getting them interested in it, the preaching will be like water thrown upon the ground.

The people have been preached to death. They now ask for something besides. They want to be taught to read. This is their cry. Send your preachers here, and the first question they will be asked is, 'Have you come to teach us?' Can they preach here, and not teach? No! they cannot! If this people could read, think, and inwardly digest what they read and hear, then we might do as we do at the North,—sow the seed, and go on from field to field, feeling that it will take root and grow. But there is no such prospect here. It would be a sad mistake to attempt to convert this people to the truth in relation to the Lord's speedy coming, by simply preaching it to them, and then leaving them to be devoured by the enemy. You may spend all the means in your treasury in sounding abroad the coming of the Savior here, and unless the word preached is continued to be taught, and the people educated and pressed into receiving it, by judicious, continued and persevering effort, on the part of the missionary and teacher, nothing of any amount will be accomplished."

These are a few of the testimonies on this point, and they might be multiplied to almost any extent. They are sufficient to show that the school, with the faithful and continued labors of the christian teacher and missionary, is the very foundation of our Mission work for the freedmen, and that all efforts for their christianization must begin with that, or fail.

HIGHWAYS AND HEDGES.

Word is sent to me to visit the sick man in the garret. Looking to the Lord for grace, I pass along through a narrow alley, and, opening a door, pass up three flights of dark stairs to the cheerless room where the suffering man lay; and, on inquiring, find that he has no "hope of salvation." The beautiful story of the cross is repeated in his ears; a prayer is offered to the God of the poor. The man looks to Jesus, for his heart has been touched by the Spirit of the Most High.

A few days afterward another visit is made. In the lower entry a sad scene presents itself. There lies a young man upon the floor in a "rum fit." He has just returned from the war, and very likely has been decoyed into some rum-hole, drugged there, and robbed. The entry is filled with persons. A half-dozen are holding him to the floor, for in his delirium he dashes his head against the stairs, and throws himself about in a fearful manner, and to prevent him from so doing, he is held by pitying arms. I am obliged to step over him to get up stairs. Once more I am in the gloomy garret, but its occupant had "fallen asleep." I inquire of one who saw him in his dying moments, and the testimony given cheers my heart.

"He tell me he hab gib his heart to de Lord, an' was willin' and ready to go."

Another soul saved. How glorious! Truly "the Lord is plenteous in mercy."

Thus we are "sorrowful, yet always rejoicing." The fruits of the Spirit make us rejoice. "When I am weak, then am I strong."

Word is sent to us that "the little child is dead." We visit the dilapidated house. Everything looks neat and clean within, but poverty dwells there. Upon a table, uncoffined, lay the little one who had lived but two years, and lighted up the gloom of the place for that time, then died, leaving the poor mother almost heart-broken. The day is cold, but no fire warms the mother's shivering body. She is pinched with hunger. Something is supplied for her wants, a few words of comfort from the precious Bible are read, and we leave for other scenes of sorrow.

But Jesus will soon come. We cry, "Amen, even so, come, Lord Jesus, and come quickly." We hope to be found laboring for Christ in the highways and hedges when he appears. We have every reason to desire the speedy return of the Redeemer. We do not know the time of his return, but we quarrel with no one about it, nor fight against it, but wish that the nearest date might be the correct one. Everywhere we tell the poor that Jesus will soon come, and we urge them to get ready without delay. Yours in the highways and hedges,

F. H. BURBANK.

COMING TO THE LIGHT.

The following items of experience, gathered from a private letter, handed us by Bro. M——, are given by his request to the readers of the Crisis.—ED.

"BRO. MUNGER:—* * * * As it is uncertain about seeing you, I take the pen to write, and I mean to be honest. As to the "dose," you mixed it without much mercy, but I could not complain. I saw that I had had mercy long enough, and when the lash came I had to bear it. You took scriptures that I had been holding on to, text after text, and explained them in such a way that I could bring nothing against your position, and so you knocked out block after block on which I had stood. I knew every time you knocked one out, and I thought you knew it too; for it seemed as though you would bring round, bear down, and strike, if possible, still harder, and leave me tottering and trembling more and more.

I saw how it was working when I had been to a few meetings, and began to think of staying away. I was in this place when you came to see us. Now I had nothing against you. I liked to hear you preach, but when A—— said that morning he was going after you to bring you up here to make a visit, I shrank at the thought of meeting you. I did not want to see you then. * * * *

So I let the spirit of resistance work, and it went all through me. I knew it, and I felt pretty well fortified by the time you got here. It was no mystery to me when you said you could not get near me. I did not mean you should. But a few words dropped just before you left broke some bands that had held me, and my feelings changed.

The next morning I had a load to carry. I felt that I had something to do. I went into the closet, and in agony I cried, "Lord, what wilt thou have me to do? I'll do anything"; and there on my knees the first thing that was presented to my mind was to see you and tell you where I was, how I had been held, etc., etc., and that you could explain things that had been a mystery to me, and advise and counsel and help me as no other one could. Can I do that? It looked like a mountain, but I wanted light; I needed help and advice, and I settled it in this way: if the Lord will send Bro. M. here again, I'll believe it is duty, and do it. * * * *

You did not think, perhaps, how crossing it was to tell you what I did at Bro. F.'s; but it broke the ice for me a little, and when duty was presented that evening, though it was crossing, I tried to do it. Next night it was a little easier bearing the cross. The meetings stopped then, and the next thing that came up for me to do was with my Methodist Brn. O! how I began to feel then; like Lot's wife I began to look back. I saw hard places ahead, and there were strong ties behind.

Here I hung through the week, but not a very easy position. Bro. Ross came Saturday, preached that evening, and in his first sermon he said God would give us all the light we needed, if he had to send a man a great way; but would not compel us to follow the light. The remark struck me forcibly, and the question came up, Did God send Bro. M. here on my account? The thought made me feel that an awful responsibility rested on me. * * *
It seems to me now that no other one could have shaken me up, and then broken the bands as you did; others handled me too easy.

An Advent Bro. was talking with me once, and spoke about my staying in the church, etc. I said, Look here, if I was on the ocean, in danger of losing my life, and a boat or sailing craft came along and picked me up, and the crew nursed me, fed me, and took care of me for years, and I stayed with them till their craft got old, a little crazy, and in some danger of coming to pieces, what should I do? run away and leave them after they had done so much for me? or stay and do what little I could to help the crew and hold the craft together? 'O stay!' he replied, as long as you can do any good, but do not stay to lose your own life.' That was my mind, to stay as long as I could do any good; so he left me feeling quite easy; but I did not get out of your hands so easy. After knocking out the blocks, shaking and advising, you took the old craft and held it up in such a dangerous condition, that I thought sure I'd got to jump with all my might somewhere to save dear life, and let others follow if they would; but I began to halt, and I had a hard time. I could not live so. I must decide. I thought I had tried homeopathic doses long enough, and thought it was best to try something else. But I had something to do.

Last Saturday I went down to see the minister. That was a cross. He has been here almost two years, and I never have felt free to talk with him on any subject. I knew he was bitter against the Adventists. It was like meeting a lion, but go I must. I told him where I was, how I felt, and what I believed. He told me how anxious the members were all feeling about me, etc.; he wanted me to consider the matter well and pray over it; then he would call the Brn. together, have a general class-meeting, and (if I do not change my mind) state before the church my views and feelings as I had done to him. I thought that was reining me rather tight, for no one to my knowledge who has left the church has been required to do that before. I think he expected me to back out on such a proposal. I thought a moment, saw the cross, then said, I'll do it. So now I am waiting for the summons to appear before the powers that be.

Now, Bro. M., will you take me into your faith again, and pray that I may have grace, wisdom, and boldness to stand up and witness for God and his truth in the day of trial?"

LUNAR PHENOMENON.

BRO. GRANT:—By the request of Elder D. T. Taylor, I send a description of a lunar phenomenon of which I was an eye-witness as well as several other persons of this village.

It occurred on the evening of Tuesday, Feb. 23d, 1864. I might have given an account of it at the time, but that I supposed others had also seen it and would give a better description of it than I could. I have never seen any notice of it whatever in any of the papers, although it was very beautiful and strange.

When the moon was about an hour high, which was about half past seven o'clock, I first observed it. The moon had been full the day before. The sky was very clear, a bright circle surrounded the moon at quite a distance from it, while a bright belt ran parallel to the horizon at the same height as the moon and passing through it. This belt ran about one third way around the visible horizon, growing fainter as it receded from the moon, until it was finally lost in the clear sky. Upon the points where it crossed the circle were mock moons, round and bright; approaching the brightness of the moon itself. On the north side of the moon, on which side the greater part of the belt lay, there were visible three other mock moons, those nearest the moon being brighter than those more remote.

There appeared also another belt of equal brilliancy with the first, passing perpendicularly through the moon, terminating at each end in the circle, but without a mock moon.

But what appeared to me the most beautiful was a bright rainbow in the form of a semicircle, which appeared directly over head, seeming to have the very point of the zenith for its centre. This was not part of another circle around the moon, but seemed quite independent of it, as it had the zenith for its centre and was visible only between that point and the moon. I call it a rainbow simply because it resembled one, having all the colors in regular order and plainly visible.

This beautiful sight I beheld for about the space of an hour, until a great cloud came up from the west and at last covered the whole sky. I called the attention of several persons to it, who with me pronounced it beautiful and strange. Your brother in the blessed hope,

WILLIAM MORPHY.

Correspondence.

From BRO. B. Hitchcock.

BRO. GRANT:—I am just home from a tour of several days. I went in company with Bro. Durand to Madison; found the brethren somewhat discouraged, but, notwithstanding the dark clouds, something whispered to me—You shall have twenty souls from the enemy's ranks, which I repeated to Bro. Young. Said he, "I hope we shall." I turned to Bro. Durand and said, Shall we have them? He said, "Yes, twenty; but I guess you have got the number rather large."

We commenced our meeting Sunday morning. Not so many out as we expected, owing to our appointment not being sufficiently given out. In the afternoon a good congregation. In the evening house crowded. Met Bro. Woodruff, who has labored in this place, and with him Bro. Ford. I preached from these words: "Fear not, little flock, it is your Father's good pleasure to give you the kingdom." Had a free time. The brethren took hold of the work. The Spirit of God settled upon the people, convicting of sin. When an invitation was given to rise for prayers, our hearts were made to rejoice to see four break away from the enemy's ranks, and come over on the Lord's side.

Next evening, notwithstanding the inclemency of the weather, a goodly number were out to meeting. But how hard it is for the natural heart to yield to Christ. No move. I was almost discouraged—concluded to give up the pursuit—thought we should start for home next day. The next morning Bro. Durand came and two other brethren, saying we could not leave; several had scarcely slept all night, and that the work of God would certainly break out more powerfully. I concluded to try once more in the name of the Lord. Accordingly the news was circulated, and we had a full house. I preached from Gal. 6: 7, 8. Bro. Durand followed with a powerful exhortation. The tears began to flow, and the spirit of conviction to fasten upon the hearts of the people. To God be all the glory. Some seven or eight came to Christ. The army of the Lord is filling up. The children of God are rejoicing. They seem to be inspired with holy courage and faith.

Next evening the house was crowded. The Spirit of God still worked. Nearly as many more forward for prayers. How much it seems like the last call of mercy to a wicked world. How conclusive the evidences that the Lord will be here in a little while. O to be ready to hail the glad day!

The following evening being our last, we felt reluctant to leave, but duty calls. What a scene! Mothers and fathers begging their children to come to Christ. How good it was to see them yield to the Savior.

Of the new recruits we found we had twenty-one, besides several backsliders. Bro. Durand stood by me to the last, administering words of comfort to the little flock. I pray that God will bless the dear friends in Madison, and at last give them an abundant entrance into the everlasting kingdom of God. We shall see them again soon, if the Lord will.

B. HITCHCOCK.

Forestville, Ct., Feb. 27th.

From Bro. J. K. Bellows.

BRO. GRANT:—I have visited a number of places in Ct. At Campville found a goodly number holding fast, believing in the near coming of the Lord, but somewhat puzzled what to believe on the time. What shall the children do?

At Plymouth Hollow, or Thomaston, they have been cold, but are looking up a little. At Waterbury they are divided on the "age to come," and not love enough to come together and be united.

At Cheshire, Ct., they have meetings only when the preacher comes. At Wallingford Farms I spent five or six days. Bro. Whitehead came, and we had good meetings. Tuesday evening fourteen came forward for prayer. Wednesday evening ten, and we had an interesting meeting.

At this place I read the death of the companion of our dear Bro. Boutell. I felt to sympathize with him, and to send him a mite to help him on his way. I felt to do as I would like to be done by in like circumstances. I visited the brethren in W., and they gave me $16.50 to send to him. May God bless the givers and receiver, and bring us all to his soon coming kingdom. Yours,

J. K. BELLOWS.

Obituaries.

LEACH. Fell asleep in Jesus, Dec. 29th, 1865, Alice R. Leach, only daughter of Bro Benjamin and Sr. Rebecca Leach, of Laporte City, Iowa, aged nine years, ten months, and fifteen days.

Kind and gentle in all her ways, she was known, only to be loved. Alice, with her pleasant countenance, was always welcomed to the Sabbath school. Always obedient to her parents and kind to her brothers, she was endeared to them all. While they miss her, and mourn her loss, it is not without hope, for Alice loved the Saviour, and often would say, "Mother, tell me of Jesus and heaven." The writer spoke to a large congregation, from Psa. 116: 15.

Alice, dear, thou 'rt gone to rest;
Thine is an early tomb;
But Jesus summoned thee away,
To rest till he shall come.

Alice, dear, thou 'rt gone to rest;
Thy toils and cares are o'er;
And sorrow, sickness, pain and death,
Shall ne'er distress thee more.

WM. H. BRINKERHOFF.

HILL. Died in Ottro, Iowa, Mrs. Dorcas Hill, wife of Mr. Wm. Hill, formerly of Baraboo, Wis. aged forty-six years.

After a severe and protracted illness, Mrs. Hill rested from her pains and sufferings, in full confidence of having a "part in the first resurrection." The text chosen in connection with her burial service, was 1 Thess. 4: 13, 14,—"But I would not have thee to be ignorant, brethren," etc.

She was a faithful wife and mother, and an exemplary christian, one of whom it may be said, "Blessed are the dead which die in the Lord from henceforth; yea, saith the Spirit, that they may rest from their labors: and their works do follow them."

Summary of News.

FOREIGN.

Liverpool, Feb. 17.

Liverpool, Feb. 17. The Royal assent has been given to the bill suspending the habeas corpus in Ireland. Upward of one hundred arrests had been made in Dublin on the 17th, principally strangers, among them Colonel John Williams Byron of the Federal army. Many more arrests were expected.

It is reported that the Emperor of Austria is willing to furnish Maximilian any number of troops required on condition that they be incorporated into the Mexican army and their expenses paid.

Diplomatic relations are entirely closed between Russia and the Papal Court.

The Army and Navy Gazette says the troops in Ireland are being distributed more among the small towns, thereby giving a greater feeling of security.

A letter from Rome says it was believed that at the next "Consistory" a Bishop of the United States will receive the Cardinal's hat.

A large meeting had been held at Exeter Hall under the auspices of the Freedman's Aid Society, to celebrate the passing of the Constitutional Amendment act in America, and consequent legal abolition of slavery. Speeches in favor of close union of England and America were loudly applauded.

The Cape of Good Hope mails of Jan. 15 have been received. The war between the Free States and Basutos continued, but only in name.

Great distress continued to prevail at the Cape among the working classes from lack of employers and farmers from the failure of their crops. A day of humiliation and prayer had been observed on account of the drouth.

Late advices from Syria report 4000 Turks attacked 1500 Maronites, commanded by Joseph Karam, near Tripoli. Karam repulsed three assaults, capturing four guns and several prisoners. The Turks were getting reinforcements.

DOMESTIC.

New York, March 1. There is great excitement among the Fenians to-night in consequence of the news of the suspension of the habeas corpus in Ireland. John O'Mahony has issued the following order:

Headquarters Fenian Brotherhood,
New York, March 1, 1866.

Brothers:—

The hour for action has arrived. The habeas corpus is suspended in Ireland. Our brothers are being arrested by hundreds and thrown into prison. Call your Circles together immediately. Send us all the aid in your power at once, and in God's name let us start for our destination. Aid! Brothers, help for God and Ireland!!

(Signed) JOHN O'MAHONY.
God save the Green.

All circles of the Fenians are requested to meet in their respective halls and armories to take action on the news just received.

Patrick J. Downing, Secretary of Civil Affairs, issues a call for immediate action, and says the military department will take charge of the military contributions.

General B. F. Mullen, Secretary of Military and Naval Affairs, has published a similar appeal, and tells the brethren to look out for secret orders.

The Irish People, newspaper, says: "Gentlemen just arrived from Paris state that the moment the Irish population assumes a belligerent character towards England they will be recognized by Louis Napoleon."

Worcester, Mass., March 2. The Fenians of Massachusetts are on the alert. The news by the steamer last night causes great excitement here. Maj. M. S. McConville, State Centre of Massachusetts, has issued a call to the Brotherhood in the State to be ready for immediate action.

New York, March 2. Col. O'Mahony's call was responded to by largely attended meetings of all the Circles which were held last night.

New York, March 2. A Havana letter says the Captain General has received orders to send 6000 troops to join the Spanish Pacific Squadron.

The London Times of the 17th says: "The American Fenians are rich enough to send envoys and agents of all kinds across the ocean; they remit money for arms and for maintaining a regular propaganda in the country. Nor are subscriptions confined to America. The Irish Fenians in England are said to be a numerous and liberal body, and to supply the necessities of the movement with a steady stream of money. Nourished from these sources, it is not to be wondered at that Fenianism should grow strong and bold in Ireland. We know not if the government have received any new and particular information which has induced them to act suddenly, but in the increased activity of the movement during the past month, and the presence of a number of persons in various districts with the scarcely concealed purpose of promoting insurrection, there is ample reason for the present precautions."

New York, March 2. Col. Roberts, one of the Presidents of the Fenian Brotherhood, issues an appeal to the members of the order. He says: "England is seeking to crush out a rebellion before it is well begun, by filling her jails with patriots;' and asks: "Will Irishmen in America stand idly by? Come forward to fight the common foe in the only way in which military aid can reach them. Not a moment is to be lost! Your prompt assistance will enable us to take the field within — days. Let men who will fight report to General Sweeny, and those who can contribute, send their money at once to these head-quarters, for which they will receive Irish national bonds."

Washington, March 2. A large meeting was held to-night to hear something about the Fenian movement. There were several speakers, among them Capt. McCafferty, said to be a confidential messenger from Head Centre Stephens to the Fenians in America. He gave a glowing account of Fenians were requested to convene in secret council after the meeting to hear important statements that could not be made public.

New York, March 5. Advices from Central America report that Granada and Masaya, in Nicaragua, had experienced twenty-one shocks of an earthquake in twenty-four hours, eight of which were of alarming severity. The volcano of Turrialba, in Costa Rica, was in a very active state, emitting volumes of smoke and dust. Earthquakes had also been experienced at San Jose.

New York, March 5. Archbishop McCloskey, in an exhortation preliminary to the regular discourse in St. Patrick's Cathedral, yesterday, denounced Fenianism, called upon all Catholics to withdraw from it, and was particularly severe on the Jones' Woods demonstration.

☞ The Mexican Times of Jan. 27th says fresh foreign troops are daily arriving in Mexico.

Quarterly Conference.

A quarterly session of the Advent Christian State Conference, of New Hampshire, will be held in Exeter, N. H., commencing evening of March 15th and continuing over the following Sunday. Let prayer go up to God, in the meantime, that this meeting may result in great good.

A. W. SIBLEY, Secretary.

P. S. The Campmeeting Committee of New Hampshire are requested to be at this meeting, as there is some important business to come before them.

A. W. S.

Quarterly Meeting.

The next quarterly meeting of the Advent Christian Conference will be held at the Leech Creek school-house, six miles east of Baraboo, near Russell's Corner. Will Eld. Barnes arrange for this meeting? Come up, brethren, from the highways and hedges, and get recruited anew for the conflict. The Master is coming soon. A number of preaching brethren are expected to attend, and preach the Word.

GEO. W. TURNER,
Sec'y of Con.

Protracted Meeting.

Monday, March 5th, Eld. J. M. Muhlig will commence a protracted meeting at Hanover, Mass., in the vestry of the Baptist church, and continue over the following Sunday, and as much longer as the interest demands.

Minnesota Quarterly Meeting.

The third quarterly meeting of the Minnesota conference will be held (Providence not preventing) in the Dudley school-house, near Utica station, commencing on Saturday afternoon, at 2 o'clock, March 31st, and continue over the following Sunday. As it is the last general meeting prior to the annual conference, we hope to see a general attendance of ministers and people throughout the state.

THOS. K. ALLEN, SEC.

Notice.

Brethren in Wisconsin who may desire my labors among them, or correspond with me relative to the cause of our soon coming King, may address me at Prairie du Sac, Sauk Co., Wis.

J. R. PRESTON.

Notice.

Preaching brethren coming to Hoosick will please to correspond with George B. Keach, Hoosick Falls, N. Y. Box 2.

Appointments.

☞ We would say to our preaching Brethren that it is necessary we should receive their appointments as early as TUESDAY MORNING, as our paper goes to press about noon; otherwise they will not be inserted till the week following.

LINES.

In memory of Truman F. Thomas, son of Enos and Martha Thomas, of Alexandria, N. H., who died Feb. 17th, 1865, aged twenty-seven years, a soldier in the late war. He was taken prisoner before Petersburg, and with three hundred others confined in one room, without clothes, fire, or sufficient food. When so weak he could not stand, he was taken to a hospital, and a large spoonful of laudanum given him. He went to sleep and never awoke. Affectionately inscribed to the bereaved friends.

There is a sad and mournful wail
Borne on the stilly air,
And heads are bowed, and tears do flow
For one most truly dear.

He left the home that gave him birth,
And every dear delight,
To go where duty seemed to call,
To battle for the right.

He fell not on a southern soil,
Amid the cannon's roar,
Where many a mother's youthful pride
Lay weltering in his gore;

For in the battle's deadly strife,
In cold, or heat, or storm,
Through the long march he passed unscathed,
That strong and youthful form.

But sad his fate, and dark the hour,
When, in that loathsome cell,
Deprived of food and clothes and fire,
Doomed many months to dwell,

They gave him what they said would be
A cordial for his pain;
He drank the drug and fell asleep,
And never woke again.

Oh! sad the news for waiting ones,
Their eyes o'erflow with tears;
The parents mourn, heart-broken now,
Their hope for future years.

And they of the same household band
His dreadful fate deplore,
And weep with saddened hearts that here
They'll see his face no more.

And she who would have been his bride,
Will sigh in vain to hear
The gentle tones of the loved one's voice,
Like music to her ear.

Peace to the weeping parents' hearts;
This path before they've trod;
Ere this they've laid some precious ones
Beneath the grassy sod.

Oh, mourning ones, there is a balm
For every wounded heart;
Come to the Great Physician, He
Will strength and grace impart.

And still remember He can hear
The prisoner in his cell;
Then trust your loved one in his hands,
"He doeth all things well."

EXTRACTS FROM BRO. HIMES' JOURNAL.

Tuesday, Jan. 30.—Heard an old Freedman speak to-night, at Pleasant Hill. He took a text, and said nothing about it. He gave a good talk, however, on the journey of the Israelites in the wilderness, and the deliverance of Daniel from the lions, and raised quite a shout in the camp.

I followed by reading a part of the eighth chapter of Deuteronomy, which related to the trials of the wilderness, and closed by some remarks on keeping God's Word, and living sober and temperate lives. Many of the Freedmen, like the white people South, drink a great deal of whisky. I came out against this with all my powers. This had the desired effect on many present. Some came right out and took the pledge never to drink any more.

In going home I had a talk with the preacher about his long life in slavery. He said he had had a hard time of it. He had been sold no less than fourteen times. He was never whipped but once, and then it took four men to do it. They fastened him down, and then whipped his bare back to a jelly. They were from twelve o'clock at night till daylight about it. And then the salt and pepper put on the back was awful. "But thank God," said he, "that is done with: we are free."

Memphis, Wednesday, Jan. 31.—Had an interesting visit with Bro. C. R. Griggs, late post sutler at Fort Pickering, in this city. He now resides in Urbana, Ill., and enjoys a pleasant home and competence with his family there, after much necessary absence in the time of the war. We had a long and very interesting interview, talking over the past and the present. He still holds to the great principles of the Advent faith, but does not enjoy as much as he once did. * * *

Received garments to-day for the Freedmen; and among others furnished a poor widow (who lost her husband in the army), with her four children, with comfortable garments. She was very thankful: said she never had received so much help before. Those that prepared these articles have the prayers and blessings of this widow and her fatherless children. It is more blessed to give than to receive.

Thursday, Feb. 1.—Took the boat "Pauline Carrol" for Helena, Ark., where I arrived next day at noon, and had a warm reception by James W. Alexander, a local preacher of the African M. E. Church. He is nearly white—was the son of his master by a slave. He is a man of talent, and industrious business habits. Just before the war he paid $3,500 for himself, wife and children. He has a noble family, and they are very much respected in town by all classes. He is well to do, and is prospering in business.

He introduced me at once to Capt. Sweeny, of the Freedmen's Bureau. I found him to be a noble, generous-hearted friend of the colored race. He does not mince matters with Secessionists. If they offer any insult to the Freedmen, or their schools, within his district, he at once sends his soldiers to see that the wrong is redressed, and good conduct for the future promised. We need more such men in "Cæsar's household." I soon found I was not in a Brownsville or Memphis atmosphere. All was pleasant and happy. I was treated as a brother. I was safe in the midst of two thousand black troops and fifteen hundred colored citizens, who looked on me as a friend of their race. No man of Secesh proclivities would dare to threaten or insult me here, as in Brownsville. Indeed, here, the rebel Generals Tappan and Pillow have acted a noble part toward the colored people, with others in the town.

Here in the best society I have found South, and it is said that this hopeful state of things extends to the country around, even where there are no troops. It is relief to me to find so hopeful a state of things. * * * *

Met to-night with Freedmen in general class. They spoke well, and in a healthy tone. I addressed them at the close on temperance and the school question, and was very kindly received by Elder Carter and his people.

Saturday, Feb. 3.—Called again upon Eld. Carter. He never had a day's schooling, but preached while a slave for twenty years. He is a man of ability, and is entirely black. He is doing a good work here among the Freedmen, and is now building a chapel for their use.

I preached this evening with Bro. Carter's people, on "The Blessed Hope." It thrilled the hearts of the Freedmen. Lieut. Godfrey, of Illinois, and of the 56th Colored Regiment, was much stirred, and followed me in an earnest address of twenty minutes. He does not see the matter clearly, as yet, but the subject got a good hold upon him, and he gave it his full approbation.

Sunday, Feb. 4.—Attended morning devotions with Bro. Alexander and family. It was pleasant to see them all free, enjoying and rising in life, and, best of all, looking for "that blessed hope."

Spoke to the Freedmen this forenoon on the true inheritance of the saints, and the time when they will come into possession. Many gave a hearty assent to my positions as I read passage after passage proving that the meek shall soon inherit the earth.

In the afternoon, met with the Baptists. Bro. White, their minister, preached. He had been absent at the North for a time, and was warmly welcomed home. He is an enthusiastic speaker, and sets all the elements in motion when he preaches. I had not seen an audience of Freedmen so moved and excited. Their feet were kept in motion with a sort of light stamping upon the floor, that made a clattering noise, in connection with moaning sounds of a plaintive or joyous character, in accordance with the tone of the preaching. Sometimes a burst of feeling in response to some sentiment that pleased them would drown the voice of the speaker in shouts of joy in view of the triumphs of the righteous, or shrieks of grief over the end of the wicked. And they are so used to this that they do not have a good meeting without these exercises. Sometimes they lose their strength, but oftener go into paroxysms, and give various expressions of ecstacy of joy as they march about the house. But these exercises are confined to excitable, nervous temperaments, and are no evidence of superior piety. Many who are calm and quiet lead as good lives as these more demonstrative ones.

At the close of Bro. White's discourse, when all was quiet, I addressed them for a short time, after which the pastor gave notice that I would preach in the evening on the subject of prophecy, and invited them to come. At night the house was thronged. A number of the white people, including the chief school teachers, were also in.

I read and explained to the audience the first and second chapters of Daniel. The subject was entirely new to most present. They all had heard of Daniel in the lion's den, and how the Lord delivered him. I referred to their melody, which I have before mentioned,

"The Lord delivered Daniel,
The Lord delivered Daniel,
The Lord delivered Daniel,
Why not deliver me?"

and the reference seemed to move many of the audience. Now, said I, I shall tell you to-night something more about Daniel than you have been learned to talk and sing.

I spoke about two hours, and got the whole question before them, with the big Chart for the eye, and a plain exposition of the Great Image, with such repetition of words as was necessary to fix the subject on their minds indelibly. When I got to the feet and toes of the Image, and held before them the idea of the stone which was to smite the Image, and dash it in pieces, they said the kingdom was coming next, and gave expressions of approbation and joy in view of soon seeing the Kingdom of God.

This was a blessed season to us all. I felt that I had done my duty to these benighted souls, so far as I could in one discourse upon historic prophecy, and they now have the idea of the coming kingdom more clearly in their minds than many who are intelligent and better educated among the white people, who will not give their attention to the subject. None so blind as those who will not see.

Monday, Feb. 5.—Have visited the soldiers' camps, and talked with them. They are a noble class of men: men of good common sense, and as good a share of knowledge, both of men and things generally, as may be acquired by observation. They have no education. Very few can read or write as yet, but they have schools, and are improving the opportunities given them. But they understand the nature and character of our government, and are not only loyal, but as capable of exercising the elective franchise as many of the white people in the South. They would vote always for loyal and good men, for the maintenance of republican institutions, and the support of good order. * * * * *

Called on Mrs. Arena Miller, daughter of one of the "chivalry" of Virginia by a slave woman. Her husband was black. She had fifteen children. In intellectual and social qualities they are above most of the colored people, and would compare well with the first white families of the Old Dominion had they been educated. She is seventy-seven years old, and now lives here with her children, and is learning to read. I found her with Noah Webster's old spelling-book in her hand. She read me the fourth chapter of Matthew, and read it well. She seemed to be quite elated with this achievement, and said, "I am now learning to read right smart. And you would be surprised to hear how well I can spell." Her two daughters, now with her, are accomplished house servants, but never dared to take a book to learn to read. The penalty for a white person teaching a slave to read was only (?) five hundred lashes!! But now they are determined to have education.

Visited the Freedmen's school at the Baptist church, under the care of Eld. White and his wife, who take a deep interest in their people. There were about seventy scholars in attendance. They appeared well, and I learn are doing well. I addressed them on the importance of religion and education, and enforced upon them the duty of making special efforts to rise out of their present state of ignorance. They received me cordially, and, also, my words of faithfulness and love, with the promise that they would be true to themselves and their race.

Called upon Mrs. Clark, Matron of the Orphan Asylum. After some conversation on the great work of helping the Freedmen, she remarked that my discourse on The Blessed Hope, on Saturday night, rather perplexed some of the colored friends. Well, said I, how so? "Well, thee spoke of the resurrection and the new heavens and new earth, as connected with the consummation of their hope; and this may all be well: but thee said nothing about the never-dying soul going to heaven at death, or the spirit of man that lives on, and will live as long as God lives. This seemed to confuse their minds." I replied that my text did not lead me to speak of any thing save "that blessed hope." The intermediate state was another question entirely, of which I had but little knowledge, as the Word of God imparts little or no information on the subject. I used to think I knew all about it, and construed many passages to prove that men were alive when dead; but I have lost all confidence in the theories of men, and cling close and fast to the written Word. I preach Jesus and him crucified for the salvation of sinners, and Jesus and the resurrection for their glorification and hope.

We had a lengthy and interesting conversation, and in conclusion agreed to disagree on some points.

Mrs. C. and her truly christian family are doing a noble work, in which I bade them God speed. They belong to the Quakers of the George Fox school, and hold to the second coming of Christ, and the resurrection of the dead. They enjoy the love of God in the soul, and labor for the salvation of men.

Visited the Teachers' Home. It is kept by Susan L. Horner, of the Society of Friends in Indiana, who sustain her as the matron, with others who are teachers sent here by them. The teachers, with others, were in, and almost the first topic of conversation was the sermon of last evening, on the four empires of earth, and the kingdom of God to succeed them as an event soon to come. They kept me answering questions on that and kindred subjects for about three hours. I have not seen people so deeply interested and inquisitive for a long time, and it was entirely unexpected to me. Some of the company received the doctrine of the sermon as the truth, and none made any argument against it. All wanted more light, and this I gave to the best of my ability.

They brought up the subject of man's state in death, and made special inquiries on this point, and on the final destiny of wicked men; to all of which I gave full and direct Scriptural answers. Some who were present (not teachers) received my views with favor, and asked for tracts on the subject, which I promised.

In the evening, I explained the Chart to Bro. Alexander's family and others who came in, to whom these things were not only new, but wonderful.

By special invitation, I spent the night at the Teachers' Home. Here the theme of prophecy and the kingdom of God was renewed, and we did not and could not break off till about midnight.

This has been an exciting day. Much interest has been created here in many minds on the signs of the times, and the coming of Christ; and they would like to hear more on the same subject. * * * * *

Wednesday, Feb. 7.—Arrived safely at Memphis, with health and good-cheer for the prosecution and finishing of my work here.—Voice.

For the World's Crisis.

THE MILLENNEUM.

BRO. GRANT:—I have before me Coggswell's Theological Class Book. On page 170 I read as follows: "According to these predictions (Daniel's and John's), the church is to be oppressed by Papal superstition and Mahometan delusion 1260 years. These are to commence, continue, and close together. The Papal superstition, most probably, commenced in 606, when Phocas constituted the Bishop of Rome, universal Bishop, and Mahomet began his infamous reign the seme year.

Add 1260 to 606, and it makes 1866, the probable time for the commencement of the release of the church, and the destruction of her enemies. About this time the Jews and Gentiles will be converted, and unite together in one body under Christ, their spiritual head. Then will commence the latter day glory of the church—the season of Millennial blessedness."

"This," says he, "is agreeable to the opinion of the most able and learned modern writers on the prophecies."

Now, as the year 1866 is already upon us, there is no longer a chance for disagreement on the point of time between pre- and post millennialists. But as to the nature, or what shall be the characteristics of the Millennium, there is still a wide difference of opinion among those who are expecting a blessed era in the future. Our author sums up the glories of that blessed period as follows:

"There will be a great outpouring of the Holy Spirit; large increase of divine light and knowledge, and a consequent removal of intellectual darkness and delusion; universal love, friendship, peace, and harmony; great agreement respecting the doctrines, duties, institutions, and practices of religion; great temperance, enjoyment and happiness; the earth will yield bounteously, and be replenished with people who will voluntarily submit to the rules of the gospel; there will be a conversion of all nations, if not of all individuals, unto the truth, and the salvation of Christ."

Now if all these things are to be looked for as concomitants of the Millennium, surely that glorious day must be yet far in the future. But, thanks to the light that has shone on the word of the Lord, and revealed to some of his children a condition of things far more satisfactory, and glorious, and soul-cheering, than the mere "opinions of the most able and learned modern writers of the prophecies."

The year upon which we have now entered may bring us the true Millennium, it being a very notable prophetic year. How solemn, and yet how glorious the thought. This may be the year when the pilgrim and stranger will leave the wilderness of this world behind, and come to his own country, the inheritance of the saints in light.

This may be the year when our warfare with sin and Satan may close, and we come off the field victorious conquerors, with the palm of victory in our hands, singing that glorious war song,—"Thanks be to God, who giveth us the victory, through Jesus Christ our Lord." This may be the year when we shall end our race, and come to the mark and prize of our high calling of God, and the end of our faith and salvation of the soul.

This may be the year when we shall be permitted to sit down with Abraham, Isaac, and Jacob, in the kingdom of God. This may be the year when we shall drink of the wine anew in the kingdom of heaven, with Christ our Redeemer. This may be the year of the redemption of our body, and the manifestation of the sons of God.

If we have been faithful to confess Christ in word and deed before a gainsaying world, this may be the year when he shall confess us before his Father and the holy angels, saying, Lo, I and the children which thou hast given me. This may be the year when the Son of man shall commission his angels to go forth and reap the field—gather, bind, and burn up the tares, so that this earth, which has been the theatre of so much sin, shall at last be rid of those things that offend, and them that do iniquity, and the Father's good pleasure be manifested in giving to the little flock the kingdom.

This may be the year when death and the grave are to render up their prey; the earth and sea give up their dead, and the strong man armed no longer able to keep his palace or his goods in peace, having no legal right to them, but a stronger than he shall come upon him, and take from him his armor and his goods.

Reader, hast thou been one of those that spake often one to another, feared the Lord, and thought upon his name? If so, "they shall be mine, saith the Lord of hosts, in that day when I make up my jewels." This may be the year when Christ's scattered jewels will all be gathered together unto him; when he shall call to the earth from the rising sun to the going down thereof, saying, "Gather my saints together unto me, those that have made a covenant with me by sacrifice," and oh, what a bright constellation they will make, standing at the right hand of Christ, clothed in white raiment,—an innumerable company, which no man can number.

This may be the year when our sins shall be blotted out, and the times of refreshing come from the presence of the Lord. This may be the year that shall witness the marriage of the Lamb—a solemnization in such splendor as this world never yet beheld. The bride "shall be brought unto the King in raiment of needle work: the virgins, her companions that follow her, shall be brought unto thee. With gladness and rejoicing shall they be brought; they shall enter into the King's palace."

The arches of heaven will echo and resound while the redeemed shall cry one to another, "Let us rejoice and be glad, for the marriage of the Lamb is come, and his bride hath made herself ready." "And they that were ready went in with him to the marriage, and the door was shut." C. BOND.

FENIANISM.

The following is from an English editor of an interesting monthly. It shows that the eyes of some are being opened to the critical state of things in the world. Most seem to be asleep, while they are in a position as dangerous as they would be to sleep in a boat floating towards the Niagara. After speaking of affairs in Russia, the writer says, under date of Dec. 1865:—

"The next subject in the progress of events is that which is most important to ourselves—the progress of the British Empire. We are at this day encompassed by more perils than at any former time of our history, and far less prepared to meet them. We first got up a corps of volunteers, and then raised the cry, 'We are the temple of the Lord,' and between the two we lay down and slept to all true policy and all true religion. Our church has become so enervated and so corrupt that it cannot, or will not, expel an infidel minister or an infidel bishop. Our policy is to stay at home making money, while we leave Italy and Poland, and Denmark, and Circassia—the first to the gallant and generous aid of France, and the others to the mercies of Russia and Prussia. We literally think of nothing but our own interests, all the world over; and as we have left the world to provide for itself, so the world has left us to provide for ourselves. And we have need to do so, for dangers and enemies are as numerous around us as there are men or nations upon earth. There is not one nation which we have not attacked, or insulted, or deserted, or degraded! No, not one, unless out of our reach in Central Africa or Asia! This is a literal fact, and we shall soon have to endure the consequences.

Let the reader, now, reflect upon the following statements, and he may find them but too correct. Can you doubt that Russia is advancing upon India with the full intention of invading it? Can you doubt that the people hate us with all their hearts? Can you deny that they are justified in their hatred, if ever hatred could be justified in a human breast? The accounts which the writer has received from eye witnesses of the insult and tyranny which we heap upon the feeble Hindoos, would make you wild with indignation; yet God permits it that we may fill up the measure of our iniquity. Other nations have exceeded us in other sins—every nation has its favorite sin—but none have equalled us in hypocrisy. There it is we shine supreme. In public and in private—through all the wheels, and chords, and works of life—hypocrisy steals on, like some subtle oil, and keeps the whole machinery of this nation in smooth and comfortable motion. From offering up a prayer in time of 'pestilence,' without acknowledging the sin which brought the pestilence, to kicking the wretched Hindoo from our public roads into the mire, while we send him bishops to teach him christianity, all is hypocrisy, unequalled in the annals of mankind. India we may then look upon as inevitably lost. 'I will send thee against an hypocritical people,' is a part of Holy Writ which has more than one application, and does it not apply to us? Russia, and the Prince of Rosh, and India, are likely to occupy the foreground in the great scenes of the impending futurity.

Yet there is a danger closer at hand, and more immediately affecting us, which, for that reason, we have reserved for the last point—AMERICA and the FENIANS. . . . Fenianism, to speak plainly, is a thing by no means to be despised, but greatly to be dreaded. (Its name may possible be derived by a corrupt spelling from the ancient Phœnicians, who are supposed, in the very earliest times, to have traded with Ireland, and to have colonized a part of it. 'Fenian' is adopted as a substitute for 'Phœnician.') The true object of these modern Phœnicians is to be revenged upon England for all the hideous crimes which she has committed on Irish soil. Those crimes and cruelties have been lately made public in a volume which we would advise no one to read through and through, lest he should forget himself, and call down 'fire from heaven?' The story of those crimes is one of the ghastliest in the history of human guilt. We laugh at the feeble efforts of the Fenians on their native soil. But they may far better laugh at us, with scorn for scorn. Irish Fenianism is only a false attack—a military diversion. The true point of attack is Canada and British America, and while Fenianism in Ireland detains a large body of troops at home, the Fenians of America will invade us on all sides, on the other coast of the Atlantic! Meanwhile, the conduct of the American government is more than suspicious. It has made most unjustifiable claims upon us. It urges those claims to the utmost. In case of our refusing compliance, it has the whole body of Fenians ready, to let loose upon Canada, supported very possibly by American troops. To make the matter worse, the President has liberated Mitchell, the most daring, active, and able of the Irish conspirators, and, it has been justly remarked, he has given the Fenians the very thing which they wanted most—a HEAD. The Fenians, until now, have been a body without a head; but, having procured the liberation of Mitchell, their organization will be complete, and they may proceed to action (as they threaten to do) immediately.

But whatever time they may fix upon for action, one thing is clear—that the Fenians are neither to be ridiculed nor despised. Their projects as to Ireland may be as absurd as you please, but if it should turn out that those projects were only to divert our attention from Canada, we shall then have been woefully deceived in our estimate of Fenian tactics. The laugh will then be on their side—not upon ours. They will have displayed consummate generalship, and we consummate stupidity. Never ridicule an enemy until, at least, you know what is his real object, for, if you mistake a feigned attack for a serious one, the laugh will be against you. Nor must we overlook one or two very peculiar circumstances connected with this movement. The American government is said to have given information to the English government as to the designs of the Fenians upon Ireland. Grant, for argument's sake, that this report is true, what words can do justice to the dulness of our public press in mistaking such a proceeding for an evidence of good will on the part of the American government? The Americans, having a bitter dispute with us as to 'damages,' are resolved not to lose or throw away such an important instrument of vengeance as a Fenian invasion of Canada! But they know full well that the Fenians cannot be in two places at one time. If they invade Ireland, they must abandon all designs upon Canada; Ireland alone would exhaust all their resources. Therefore is common policy, in mere shrewdness, the American government would have given warning to our government as to the Fenian designs upon Ireland, knowing well that the Fenians, being effectually stopped in their Irish adventures, would have no resource left but to invade Canada; that is to say, they would have no resource but to do just what the American government would wish them to do! Whereas had the Fenians attempted Ireland, they must have abandoned their schemes as to Canada! This will fully account for the information conveyed by the American government to our own, without the slightest necessity for supposing any good will in the case, but, on the contrary, ill will, and a view to an impending quarrel. Yet we do not venture to assert that any such information has been given; we only express an opinion as to the blunder of our public journals in not seeing the drift of the American cabinet, supposing it to have forwarded such information to our own.

Another remarkable circumstance is this: The President has ordered all the American ironclads to be prepared for sea at once, and the sale of the military stores to be suspended, as those stores may be required for war purposes. And all this, we are told, is intended for the suppression of the Fenians, should they venture to attack British America! Can credulity or simplicity go further than this? Does any one seriously believe it? It so happens that the Fenians have no navy whatever, but they have the nucleus of an army; yet the President makes vast preparations by sea in order to stop an invasion of Canada, which can only be made by land. This is manifestly absurd, and the conclusion is evident: the President is getting ready to CO-OPERATE with the Fenians, in the event of our rejecting his claim of 'compensation'! Yet the public press has not, as yet, hinted at this palpable manœuvre, nor warned us of this two-edged sword. In short, we seem to be blinded at home, and enveloped abroad, by ever-increasing clouds—the eastern cloud of Russian policy, and the western cloud that covers the Atlantic from shore to shore.

'Peace and safety' has for some time past been the prevailing cry. A year or two ago we heard that Russia was all but broken up. Now we find her threefold more dangerous than ever, for she threatens India itself. We went to war with Russia to secure India, and for that purpose alone we formed a strict alliance with Turkey, a Mahometan country, and the most depraved empire in the world. As a just retribution, we find that Russia has turned the flank of Turkey, and is bearing down direct upon our Indian territories. We committed a deadly sin to defend the mere outposts of India, and now the CITADEL itself is certain to be attacked. This retribution is most just. Again, we cruelly insulted the American States while they were distracted by a civil war, most decidedly brought on by their hatred of negro slavery.* The original ground of the American war was the extirpation of SLAVERY, and whatever inferior motives may have been mixed up with the chief motive, the people of America deserve everlasting praise. Yet we poured upon them inexhaustible produce, exaggerating their faults and denying their virtues. Now America has triumphed, and we have to confront that hatred which our ungenerous strictures have created. We have completely weeded out every friend that we had on earth, having deserted even Portugal, our oldest ally. We have reserved, to decorate our garden, the pestilential flower that 'rots itself at ease' upon the Bosphorus; and when that vile weed has been rooted up we shall find us surrounded by a desert.

While we were finishing these pages, the news arrived of still more vast preparations made by Russia, both by sea and land, as if for some grand movement. All the Russian imperial princes are actively engaged in forwarding these preparations, and next spring is the time by which they are to be completed. What does all this point to? As for the REDUCTION of the French army, that is a mere deception, for France can at any moment call out one million of men, trained, and ready for the field, whenever she may want them."

* If the South had not tried to separate from the North, slavery would have continued as long as the North made money by it,—that's the truth.

POOR BILLY.

"One man there was, and many such you might
Have met, who never had a dozen thoughts
In all his life."—Pollock.

There is a great apparent difference in point of development between man and man. Here is one, whom I have known for many years, and who now lives not far from my place of abode. He is called "Poor Billy"; but why? He is a tall, able-bodied man, and enjoys robust health, and has quite a large sum of money at interest.

Why, then, is he called poor? Well, because he is almost an idiot. If you should hear him try to speak, you could not understand him. And he is so deaf that if you should speak to him he would not be apt to hear you; and if he did hear, it is very doubtful whether he would know what you meant.

It is said that when he was a young child he seemed about as bright as other children; but when quite young he was very sick with a dangerous disease, and when he got better it was noticed that he was deaf, and his organs of speech were injured so that he could not talk so as to be understood. I suppose he is now nearly sixty years old, yet he is but a child in judgment, and can neither read nor write.

Now look at a different case. The man of whom I now speak was a very near relative of "Poor Billy." But he was as much above other men as Billy was below. He was Governor of the Empire State; and also at least twice in the Cabinet at Washington, and for some years there was but one man in the country above him—that was the President.

What made the difference between these two men? Their pedigree was precisely the same, if they could trace it through to the garden of Eden. Precisely the same blood flowed in the veins of both. Yet what a vast difference in their development. The one stood for a time almost the foremost man on the American continent; the other, so low in the scale of intelligence as scarce to know the "name his mother called him by."

Ah! proud pretender to science, there is a cause of causes back of all that you can trace. GOD makes men to differ. And if you have learning, and talent, and great ability, thank HIM for it, for all your powers come from Him.

But what advantage will all these noble gifts be to you in the great day when "every one of us shall give an account of himself to God?" If misimproved, they will only aggravate your ruin.

And there is a difference between what the world calls "misimprovement," and what the Bible calls it. No matter how high you stand, even if you excel all that have walked the earth for a thousand years; if you are not a faithful servant and humble follower of Christ, you are hastening to destruction. You have hid your Lord's talent in a napkin, or buried it in the vain and delusive things of earth, and a fearful reckoning awaits you.

Then "seek ye the Lord while he may be found," or it will be more "tolerable for the land of Sodom, in the day of judgment, than for thee." F. H. CHAMBERLAIN.

BESSIE'S FAITH.

In the cold, gray, solemn starlight
Of a winter's night,
Little Bessie, weak and weary,
In her home so dark and dreary,
Watched for morning light.

On her bed of straw so cheerless,
Long she sadly tossed:
Ah! ye heirs of wealth and pleasure,
From your overflowing measure
Give, nor count it lost.

Hungry, shivering little Bessie,
Stole she from her bed,
Prayed that God would feed her mother,
And her feeble, helpless brother,
With his daily bread.

Looking through the little skylight,
Bessie saw a star;
How its cheerful twinkling won her,
As it smiled in love upon her
From its home afar!

Gazing through the one small window
On that orb so bright,
Soon the starbeams banished sadness,
Bessie's face was lit with gladness,
And her heart grew light.

"God is good—he'll not desert me:"
Oh the faith of youth!
Food and warmth came with the morrow;
Bessie's night of want and sorrow
Held the gem of truth.

Deep within her childish bosom
Sank the seeds of trust:
Her prayer of faith was clothed with power,
And taught her in her darkest hour
God is ever just.

BOYS—THEIR MISTAKES.

Among the many good things written and printed to guide ministers and rulers, fathers and mothers, and the like, I do not recollect of ever reading a good article in a good religious paper addressed to boys, or for their special benefit. These are not young men, nor yet children. They are boys! and I look upon them with great interest. They are soon to be young men, and then men, and the interests of the church and of the nation will be in their hands.

Now, my nervous, restless young friend, there is no period of life in which you are in danger of making so many mistakes as in boyhood. So sit down a few minutes and listen, while I point out to you some of the mistakes which you are very liable to make.

First mistake: That parents and teachers often thwart you just because they have the power.

You know that parents and teachers have often forbid your doing this or that, and directed you to do what you don't want to do, or what you think may just as well be put off, or that might be done in some easier way. Then you feel that you know all about it as well as they do, and better too, and so you have a right to resist and contest the thing, and certainly to grumble about it. It seems to you that they love to command, and make you do the very thing that you don't want to do, and so you ask, "what good will it do?" or, "why can't I do it some other time?" or you go about it muttering and murmuring, as if greatly abused.

Now understand that this is a great mistake. The parent who will toil from early dawn till you are asleep in the evening to support you, and who will watch over you day and night when you are sick, loves you too well to lay one command on you which is not for your good to obey. Does that parent ever bid you crush your finger in a vice, or bruise it with a hammer, or make you freeze your feet in the snow? Does the teacher ever rejoice when you are in pain, or contrive how he can make your head ache? Why, then, should it give them pleasure to hurt your feelings, or to cross your will, unless they do it for your good? I do not believe that the parent or teacher, in one case out a thousand, ever thwarts a boy unless he thinks it for his good. To array yourself against this authority, then, is a mistake, but a very common one. I don't believe a boy ever rebels, or plays truant, or runs away from his home, without first trying to convince himself that he is right and has been abused, and that his father or teacher is a very hard-hearted creature.

Perhaps you will say, "I would honor my father and my mother if they were only rich, so that we could have every thing we want, and if they were educated and refined, a real gentleman and a real lady; but how can I honor one who is poor and uneducated, and not respected and not refined, and who is at times impatient and fretful, and sometimes even violent and passionate? My dear boy, God knew there would be just such parents, and he knew how hard it would be to respect and honor such, and so he has provided for it in two ways; first, by laying his own command on us, and secondly, by promising us a special reward. "Thy days shall be long," the first and last command with a promise. Honor thy father and thy mother because they are thy parents, and though they may make mistakes, sometimes, they mean to seek only your good.

Second mistake: That any thing vulgar or sinful can be manly.

Boys sometimes—perhaps often, get the notion that it is manly for a boy to smoke, or use tobacco, because men, and respectable men do it; that to use profane, or vulgar, or obscene language is manly; that to be irreverent and low in speech is manly—because men do so at times. A sad mistake, I assure you. If such men are allowed in good society, it is in spite of these things, and not in consequence of them. I have never seen a father who, as I thought, really wanted to have his boy learn to smoke, or to be vulgar or profane; and what would you think of a father, who, every morning, at family worship should pray that his son might that day learn to use one more intense oath, or might learn to blaspheme the name of God with new glibness. Now is it right to do anything for which we may not pray? And what would your mother say if in the morning she should find her boy kneeling down and praying God to help him to be more profane, or to use viler language than ever before? And yet you know that many a boy will use language and oaths and vile speech during the day, on which he dares not think when he meets God alone in the dark. Know then, my boy, that if you think that any thing that is low or vulgar, or such as you would not want to say or do before your mother or sister, is manly, you are mistaken. "Sin is a reproach to any people," and to none more so than to young people. And as to those low, vile men who would teach you vile things, and encourage you to be vulgar or profane, shun them as you would demons from the bottomless pit.

Third mistake: That you can break off bad habits any time you please.

You will often meet with boys who boast that they are not tied by bad habits; so that at any time they please they can stop having wicked thoughts whenever they please—stop using profane language, and have the imagination and words all pure, whenever they please: but let them try, and then see. The trouble is, they won't "please," and they won't try to do it. You might just as well dip your hands in tar and keep that on them a month, and then say, "O, I can wash it all off in a moment, whenever I please." You might just as well swallow poison, and say, "I can throw it all out of my system any moment I please." What would you think of a boy who should play with a mad dog or a rattlesnake, under the belief that he could expel the poison of their bite at any moment? No. Sin is like pitch—it will stick to you. It is like poison, it will not go at your bidding. Many a boy drinks this poison through a vile book, a vile picture, or a viler companion, till his soul is defiled, his imagination is polluted and made a den of unclean things, and a rendezvous of unclean spirits, all the rest of his life. All the waters of the Nile could not wash such a heart clean. No boy can conceive what shame, what bondage, what remorse and misery he is laying up for himself even in this life, by early or secret indulgence in sin. These sins are like little ropes, but they hang you over the bottomless pit. The waters of Jordan once cleansed one leper, and that was a miracle; but no waters can make your soul pure when once polluted. It is easy to learn to sin, but to break away from it when once learned is almost superhuman.—John Todd, in Congregationalist.

THE HONEST BOY.

A gentleman from the country placed his son with a dry goods merchant. For a time all went well. At length a lady came to the store to purchase a silk dress, and the young man waited on her. The price demanded was agreed to, and he proceeded to fold the goods. He discovered a flaw in the silk before he had finished, and pointing it out to the lady, said, "Madam, I deem it my duty to tell you there is a fracture in the silk."

Of course she did not take it.

The merchant overheard the remark, and immediately wrote to the father of the young man to come and take him home; "for," said he, "he will never make a merchant."

The father was much grieved, and hastened to be informed of his deficiencies.

"Why will he not make a merchant?" he asked.

"Because he has no tact," was the answer. "Only a day or two ago he told a lady, who was buying silk of him, that the goods were damaged, and I lost the bargain."

"And is that all his fault?"

"Yes."

"Then I love my son better than ever, and I thank you for telling me of the matter. I would not have him another day in your store for the world."

"THE HOLES ARE THERE STILL!"

This story, so fraught with meaning, we have often met with, but it will bear frequent repetition. Will our little readers con it over?

A father, whose son was addicted to some vicious propensities, bade the boy drive a nail into a certain post whenever he committed a fault; and agreed that the nail should be drawn out whenever he corrected an error. In process of time the post was completely filled with nails.

The youth became alarmed at the extent of his indiscretions, and set about reforming himself. One by one, the nails were drawn out, and the father commended his noble, self-denying heroism, in freeing himself from his faults.

"They are all drawn out," said the parent. The boy looked sad, and there was a whole volume of practical wisdom in his sadness. With a heavy heart he replied:

"True, father, but the holes are there still!"

THE GREAT TEACHER.—It is said that Victoria, the Queen of England, when at home in her beautiful palace at Windsor, has a Sunday school which she attends, and in which she has a class of children. Many little boys and girls would, no doubt, feel greatly honored to be taught by a queen. But, children, you may have for a teacher, if you wish it, the greatest of all kings,—the Lord of lords, and King of kings; for Jesus Christ has said, "Learn of me."

I CAN'T FORGET IT.—"I forget a great many things which happened last year," said a little girl, the tears running down her cheeks; "but I can't forget the angry words I spoke to my dear mother who is now dead."

LINES.

In memory of Truman F. Thomas, son of Enos and Martha Thomas, of Alexandria, N. H., who died Feb. 17th, 1865, aged twenty-seven years, a soldier in the late war. He was taken prisoner before Petersburg, and with three hundred others confined in one room, without clothes, fire, or sufficient food. When so weak he could not stand, he was taken to a hospital, and a large spoonful of laudanum given him. He went to sleep and never awoke. Affectionately inscribed to the bereaved friends.

There is a sad and mournful wail
Borne on the stilly air,
And heads are bowed, and tears do flow
For one most truly dear.

He left the home that gave him birth,
And every dear delight,
To go where duty seemed to call,
To battle for the right.

He fell not on a southern soil,
Amid the cannon's roar,
Where many a mother's youthful pride
Lay weltering in his gore;

For in the battle's deadly strife,
In cold, or heat, or storm,
Through the long march he passed unscathed,
That strong and youthful form.

But sad his fate, and dark the hour,
When, in that loathsome cell,
Deprived of food and clothes and fire,
Doomed many months to dwell,

They gave him what they said would be
A cordial for his pain;
He drank the drug and fell asleep,
And never woke again.

Oh! sad the news for waiting ones,
Their eyes o'erflow with tears;
The parents mourn, heart-broken now,
Their hope for future years.

And they of the same household band
His dreadful fate deplore,
And weep with saddened hearts that here
They'll see his face no more.

And she who would have been his bride,
Will sigh in vain to hear
The gentle tones of the loved one's voice,
Like music to her ear.

Peace to the weeping parents' hearts;
This path before they've trod;
Ere this they've laid some precious ones
Beneath the grassy sod.

Oh, mourning ones, there is a balm
For every wounded heart;
Come to the Great Physician, He
Will strength and grace impart.

And still remember He can hear
The prisoner in his cell;
Then trust your loved one in his hands,
"He doeth all things well."

Farmington, N. H. MARTHA S. HORNE.

EXTRACTS FROM BRO. HIMES' JOURNAL.

Tuesday, Jan. 30.—Heard an old Freedman speak to-night, at Pleasant Hill. He took a text, and said nothing about it. He gave a good talk, however, on the journey of the Israelites in the wilderness, and the deliverance of Daniel from the lions, and raised quite a shout in the camp.

I followed by reading a part of the eighth chapter of Deuteronomy, which related to the trials of the wilderness, and closed by some remarks on keeping God's Word, and living sober and temperate lives. Many of the Freedmen, like the white people South, drink a great deal of whisky. I came out against this with all my powers. This had the desired effect on many present. Some came right out and took the pledge never to drink any more.

In going home I had a talk with the preacher about his long life in slavery. He said he had had a hard time of it. He had been sold no less than fourteen times. He was never whipped but once, and then it took four men to do it. They fastened him down, and then whipped his bare back to a jelly. They were from twelve o'clock at night till daylight about it. And then the salt and pepper put on the back was awful. "But thank God," said he, "that is done with: we are free."

Memphis, Wednesday, Jan. 31.—Had an interesting visit with Bro. C. R. Griggs, late post sutler at Fort Pickering, in this city. He now resides in Urbana, Ill., and enjoys a pleasant home and competence with his family there, after much necessary absence in the time of the war. We had a long and very interesting interview, talking over the past and the present. He still holds to the great principles of the Advent faith, but does not enjoy as much as he once did. * * *

Received garments to-day for the Freedmen; and among others furnished a poor widow (who lost her husband in the army), with her four children, with comfortable garments. She was very thankful: said she never had received so much help before. Those that prepared these articles have the prayers and blessings of this widow and her fatherless children. It is more blessed to give than to receive.

Thursday, Feb. 1.—Took the boat "Pauline Carrol" for Helena, Ark., where I arrived next day at noon, and had a warm reception by James W. Alexander, a local preacher of the African M. E. Church. He is nearly white—was the son of his master by a slave. He is a man of talent, and industrious business habits. Just before the war he paid $3,500 for himself, wife and children. He has a noble family, and they are very much respected in town by all classes. He is well to do, and is prospering in business.

He introduced me at once to Capt. Sweeny, of the Freedmen's Bureau. I found him to be a noble, generous-hearted friend of the colored race. He does not mince matters with Secessionists. If they offer any insult to the Freedmen, or their schools, within his district, he at once sends his soldiers to see that the wrong is redressed, and good conduct for the future promised. We need more such men in "Cæsar's household." I soon found I was not in a Brownsville or Memphis atmosphere. All was pleasant and happy. I was treated as a brother. I was safe in the midst of two thousand black troops and fifteen hundred colored citizens, who looked on me as a friend of their race. No man of Secesh proclivities would dare to threaten or insult me here, as in Brownsville. Indeed, here, the rebel Generals Tappan and Pillow have acted a noble part toward the colored people, with others in the town.

Here is the best society I have found South, and it is said that this hopeful state of things extends to the country around, even where there are no troops. It is relief to me to find so hopeful a state of things. * * * *

Met to-night with Freedmen in general class. They spoke well, and in a healthy tone. I addressed them at the close on temperance and the school question, and was very kindly received by Elder Carter and his people.

Saturday, Feb. 3.—Called again upon Eld. Carter. He never had a day's schooling, but preached while a slave for twenty years. He is a man of ability, and is entirely black. He is doing a good work here among the Freedmen, and is now building a chapel for their use.

I preached this evening with Bro. Carter's people, on "The Blessed Hope." It thrilled the hearts of the Freedmen. Lieut. Godfrey, of Illinois, and of the 56th Colored Regiment, was much stirred, and followed me in an earnest address of twenty minutes. He does not see the matter clearly, as yet, but the subject got a good hold upon him, and he gave it his full approbation.

Sunday, Feb. 4.—Attended morning devotions with Bro. Alexander and family. It was pleasant to see them all free, enjoying and rising in life, and, best of all, looking for "that blessed hope."

Spoke to the Freedmen this forenoon on the true inheritance of the saints, and the time when they will come into possession. Many gave a hearty assent to my positions as I read passage after passage proving that the meek shall soon inherit the earth.

In the afternoon, met with the Baptists. Bro. White, their minister, preached. He had been absent at the North for a time, and was warmly welcomed home. He is an enthusiastic speaker, and sets all the elements in motion when he preaches. I had not seen an audience of Freedmen so moved and excited. Their feet were kept in motion with a sort of light stamping upon the floor, that made a clattering noise, in connection with moaning sounds of a plaintive or joyous character, in accordance with the tone of the preaching. Sometimes a burst of feeling in response to some sentiment that pleased them would drown the voice of the speaker in shouts of joy in view of the triumphs of the righteous, or shrieks of grief over the end of the wicked. And they are so used to this that they do not have a good meeting without these exercises. Sometimes they lose their strength, but oftener go into paroxysms, and give various expressions of ecstacy of joy as they march about the house. But these exercises are confined to excitable, nervous temperaments, and are no evidence of superior piety. Many who are calm and quiet lead as good lives as these more demonstrative ones.

At the close of Bro. White's discourse, when all was quiet, I addressed them for a short time, after which the pastor gave notice that I would preach in the evening on the subject of prophecy, and invited them to come. At night the house was thronged. A number of the white people, including the chief school teachers, were also in.

I read and explained to the audience the first and second chapters of Daniel. The subject was entirely new to most present. They all had heard of Daniel in the lion's den, and how the Lord delivered him. I referred to their melody, which I have before mentioned,

"The Lord delivered Daniel,
The Lord delivered Daniel,
The Lord delivered Daniel,
Why not deliver me?"

and the reference seemed to move many of the audience. Now, said I, I shall tell you to-night something more about Daniel than you have been learned to talk and sing.

I spoke about two hours, and got the whole question before them, with the big Chart for the eye, and a plain exposition of the Great Image, with such repetition of words as was necessary to fix the subject on their minds indelibly. When I got to the feet and toes of the Image, and held before them the idea of the stone which was to smite the Image, and dash it in pieces, they said the kingdom was coming next, and gave expressions of approbation and joy in view of socn seeing the Kingdom of God.

This was a blessed season to us all. I felt that I had done my duty to these benighted souls, so far as I could in one discourse upon historic prophecy, and they now have the idea of the coming kingdom more clearly in their minds than many who are intelligent and better educated among the white people, who will not give their attention to the subject. None so blind as those who will not see.

Monday, Feb. 5.—Have visited the soldiers' camps, and talked with them. They are a noble class of men: men of good common sense, and as good a share of knowledge, both of men and things generally, as may be acquired by observation. They have no education. Very few can read or write as yet, but they have schools, and are improving the opportunities given them. But they understand the nature and character of our government, and are not only loyal, but as capable of exercising the elective franchise as many of the white people in the South. They would vote always for loyal and good men, for the maintenance of republican institutions, and the support of good order. * * * * *

Called on Mrs. Arena Miller, daughter of one of the "chivalry" of Virginia by a slave woman. Her husband was black. She had fifteen children. In intellectual and social qualities they are above most of the colored people, and would compare well with the first white families of the Old Dominion had they been educated. She is seventy-seven years old, and now lives here with her children, and is learning to read. I found her with Noah Webster's old spelling-book in her hand. She read me the fourth chapter of Matthew, and read it well. She seemed to be quite elated with this achievement, and said, "I am now learning to read right smart. And you would be surprised to hear how well I can spell." Her two daughters, now with her, are accomplished house servants, but never dared to take a book to learn to read. The penalty for a white person teaching a slave to read was only (?) five hundred lashes!! But now they are determined to have education.

Visited the Freedmen's school at the Baptist church, under the care of Eld. White and his wife, who take a deep interest in their people. There were about seventy scholars in attendance. They appeared well, and I learn are doing well. I addressed them on the importance of religion and education, and enforced upon them the duty of making special efforts to rise out of their present state of ignorance. They received me cordially, and, also, my words of faithfulness and love, with the promise that they would be true to themselves and their race.

Called upon Mrs. Clark, Matron of the Orphan Asylum. After some conversation on the great work of helping the Freedmen, she remarked that my discourse on The Blessed Hope, on Saturday night, rather perplexed some of the colored friends. Well, said I, how so? "Well, thee spoke of the resurrection and the new heavens and new earth, as connected with the consummation of their hope; and this may all be well: but thee said nothing about the never-dying soul going to heaven at death, or the spirit of man that lives on, and will live as long as God lives. This seemed to confuse their minds." I replied that my text did not lead me to speak of any thing save "that blessed hope." The intermediate state was another question entirely, of which I had but little knowledge, as the Word of God imparts little or no information on the subject. I used to think I knew all about it, and construed many passages to prove that men were alive when dead; but I have lost all confidence in the theories of men, and cling close and fast to the written Word. I preach Jesus and him crucified for the salvation of sinners, and Jesus and the resurrection for their glorification and hope.

We had a lengthy and interesting conversation, and in conclusion agreed to disagree on some points.

Mrs. C. and her truly christian family are doing a noble work, in which I bade them God speed. They belong to the Quakers of the George Fox school, and hold to the second coming of Christ, and the resurrection of the dead. They enjoy the love of God in the soul, and labor for the salvation of men.

Visited the Teachers' Home. It is kept by Susan L. Horner, of the Society of Friends in Indiana, who sustain her as the matron, with others who are teachers sent here by them. The teachers, with others, were in, and almost the first topic of conversation was the sermon of last evening, on the four empires of earth, and the kingdom of God to succeed them as an event soon to come. They kept me answering questions on that and kindred subjects for about three hours. I have not seen people so deeply interested and inquisitive for a long time, and it was entirely unexpected to me. Some of the company received the doctrine of the sermon as the truth, and none made any argument against it. All wanted more light, and this I gave to the best of my ability.

They brought up the subject of man's state in death, and made special inquiries on this point, and on the final destiny of wicked men; to all of which I gave full and direct Scriptural answers. Some who were present (not teachers) received my views with favor, and asked for tracts on the subject, which I promised.

In the evening, I explained the Chart to Bro. Alexander's family and others who came in, to whom these things were not only new, but wonderful.

By special invitation, I spent the night at the Teachers' Home. Here the theme of prophecy and the kingdom of God was renewed, and we did not and could not break off till about midnight.

This has been an exciting day. Much interest has been created here in many minds on the signs of the times, and the coming of Christ; and they would like to hear more on the same subject. * * * * *

THE MILLENNEUM.

BRO. GRANT:—I have before me Coggswell's Theological Class Book. On page 170 I read as follows: "According to these predictions (Daniel's and John's), the church is to be oppressed by Papal superstition and Mahometan delusion 1260 years. These are to commence, continue, and close together. The Papal superstition, most probably, commenced in 606, when Phocas constituted the Bishop of Rome, universal Bishop, and Mahomet began his infamous reign the seme year.

Add 1260 to 606, and it makes 1866, the probable time for the commencement of the release of the church, and the destruction of her enemies. About this time the Jews and Gentiles will be converted, and unite together in one body under Christ, their spiritual head. Then will commence the latter day glory of the church—the season of Millennial blessedness."

"This," says he, "is agreeable to the opinion of the most able and learned modern writers on the prophecies."

Now, as the year 1866 is already upon us, there is no longer a chance for disagreement on the point of time between pre- and post millennialists. But as to the nature, or what shall be the characteristics of the Millennium, there is still a wide difference of opinion among those who are expecting a blessed era in the future. Our author sums up the glories of that blessed period as follows:

"There will be a great outpouring of the Holy Spirit; large increase of divine light and knowledge, and a consequent removal of intellectual darkness and delusion; universal love, friendship, peace, and harmony; great agreement respecting the doctrines, duties, institutions, and practices of religion; great temperance, enjoyment and happiness; the earth will yield bounteously, and be replenished with people who will voluntarily submit to the rules of the gospel; there will be a conversion of all nations, if not of all individuals, unto the truth, and the salvation of Christ."

Now if all these things are to be looked for as concomitants of the Millennium, surely that glorious day must be yet far in the future. But, thanks to the light that has shone on the word of the Lord, and revealed to some of his children a condition of things far more satisfactory, and glorious, and soul-cheering, than the mere "opinions of the most able and learned modern writers of the prophecies."

The year upon which we have now entered may bring us the true Millennium, it being a very notable prophetic year. How solemn, and yet how glorious the thought. This may be the year when the pilgrim and stranger will leave the wilderness of this world behind, and come to his own country, the inheritance of the saints in light.

This may be the year when our warfare with sin and Satan may close, and we come off the field victorious conquerors, with the palm of victory in our hands, singing that glorious war song,—"Thanks be to God, who giveth us the victory, through Jesus Christ our Lord." This may be the year when we shall end our race, and come to the mark and prize of our high calling of God, and the end of our faith and salvation of the soul.

This may be the year when we shall be permitted to sit down with Abraham, Isaac, and Jacob, in the kingdom of God. This may be the year when we shall drink of the wine anew in the kingdom of heaven, with Christ our Redeemer. This may be the year of the redemption of our body, and the manifestation of the sons of God.

If we have been faithful to confess Christ in word and deed before a gainsaying world, this may be the year when he shall confess us before his Father and the holy angels, saying, Lo, I and the children which thou hast given me. This may be the year when the Son of man shall commission his angels to go forth and reap the field—gather, bind, and burn up the tares, so that this earth, which has been the theatre of so much sin, shall at last be rid of those things that offend, and them that do iniquity, and the Father's good pleasure be manifested in giving to the little flock the kingdom.

This may be the year when death and the grave are to render up their prey; the earth and sea give up their dead, and the strong man armed no longer able to keep his palace or his goods in peace, having no legal right to them, but a stronger than he shall come upon him, and take from him his armor and his goods.

Reader, hast thou been one of those that spake often one to another, feared the Lord, and thought upon his name? If so, "they shall be mine, saith the Lord of hosts, in that day when I make up my jewels." This may be the year when Christ's scattered jewels will all be gathered together unto him; when he shall call to the earth from the rising sun to the going down thereof, saying, "Gather my saints together unto me, those that have made a covenant with me by sacrifice," and oh, what a bright constellation they will make, standing at the right hand of Christ, clothed in white raiment,—an innumerable company, which no man can number.

This may be the year when our sins shall be blotted out, and the times of refreshing come from the presence of the Lord. This may be the year that shall witness the marriage of the Lamb—a solemnization in such splendor as this world never yet beheld. The bride "shall be brought unto the King in raiment of needle work: the virgins, her companions that follow her, shall be brought unto thee. With gladness and rejoicing shall they be brought; they shall enter into the King's palace."

The arches of heaven will echo and resound while the redeemed shall cry one to another, "Let us rejoice and be glad, for the marriage of the Lamb is come, and his bride hath made herself ready." "And they that were ready went in with him to the marriage, and the door was shut." C. BOND.

FENIANISM.

The following is from an English editor of an interesting monthly. It shows that the eyes of some are being opened to the critical state of things in the world. Most seem to be asleep, while they are in a position as dangerous as they would be to sleep in a boat floating towards the Niagara. After speaking of affairs in Russia, the writer says, under date of Dec. 1865:—

"The next subject in the progress of events is that which is most important to ourselves—the progress of the British Empire. We are at this day encompassed by more perils than at any former time of our history, and far less prepared to meet them. We first got up a corps of volunteers, and then raised the cry, 'We are the temple of the Lord,' and between the two we lay down and slept to all true policy and all true religion. Our church has become so enervated and so corrupt that it cannot, or will not, expel an infidel minister or an infidel bishop. Our policy is to stay at home making money, while we leave Italy and Poland, and Denmark, and Circassia—the first to the gallant and generous aid of France, and the others to the mercies of Russia and Prussia. We literally think of nothing but our own interests, all the world over; and as we have left the world to provide for itself, so the world has left us to provide for ourselves. And we have need to do so, for dangers and enemies are as numerous around us as there are men or nations upon earth. There is not one nation which we have not attacked, or insulted, or deserted, or degraded! No, not one, unless out of our reach in Central Africa or Asia! This is a literal fact, and we shall soon have to endure the consequences.

Let the reader, now, reflect upon the following statements, and he may find them but too correct. Can you doubt that Russia is advancing upon India with the full intention of invading it? Can you doubt that the people hate us with all their hearts? Can you deny that they are justified in their hatred, if ever hatred could be justified in a human breast? The accounts which the writer has received from eye witnesses of the insult and tyranny which we heap upon the feeble Hindoos, would make you wild with indignation; yet God permits it that we may fill up the measure of our iniquity. Other nations have exceeded us in other sins—every nation has its favorite sin—but none have equalled us in hypocrisy. There it is we shine supreme. In public and in private—through all the wheels, and chords, and works of life—hypocrisy steals on, like some subtle oil, and keeps the whole machinery of this nation in smooth and comfortable motion. From offering up a prayer in time of 'pestilence,' without acknowledging the sin which brought the pestilence, to kicking the wretched Hindoo from our public roads into the mire, while we send him bishops to teach him christianity, all is hypocrisy, unequalled in the annals of mankind. India we may then look upon as inevitably lost. 'I will send thee against an hypocritical people,' is a part of Holy Writ which has more than one application, and does it not apply to us? Russia, and the Prince of Rosh, and India, are likely to occupy the foreground in the great scenes of the impending futurity.

Yet there is a danger closer at hand, and more immediately affecting us, which, for that reason, we have reserved for the last point—AMERICA and the FENIANS. . . . Fenianism, to speak plainly, is a thing by no means to be despised, but greatly to be dreaded. (Its name may possible be derived by a corrupt spelling from the ancient Phœnicians, who are supposed, in the very earliest times, to have traded with Ireland, and to have colonized a part of it. 'Fenian' is adopted as a substitute for 'Phœnician.') The true object of these modern Phœnicians is to be revenged upon England for all the hideous crimes which she has committed on Irish soil. Those crimes and cruelties have been lately made public in a volume which we would advise no one to read through and through, lest he should forget himself, and call down 'fire from heaven?' The story of those crimes is one of the ghastliest in the history of human guilt. We laugh at the feeble efforts of 'the Fenians on their native soil. But they may far better laugh at us, with scorn for scorn. Irish Fenianism is only a false attack—a military diversion. The true point of attack is Canada and British America, and while Fenianism in Ireland detains a large body of troops at home, the Fenians of America will invade us on all sides, on the other coast of the Atlantic! Meanwhile, the conduct of the American government is more than suspicious. It has made most unjustifiable claims upon us. It urges those claims to the utmost. In case of our refusing compliance, it has the whole body of Fenians ready to let loose upon Canada, supported very possibly by American troops. To make the matter worse, the President has liberated Mitchell, the most daring, active, and able of the Irish conspirators, and, it has been justly remarked, he has given the Fenians the very thing which they wanted most—a HEAD. The Fenians, until now, have been a body without a head; but, having procured the liberation of Mitchell, their organization will be complete, and they may proceed to action (as they threaten to do) immediately.

But whatever time they may fix upon for action, one thing is clear—that the Fenians are neither to be ridiculed nor despised. Their projects as to Ireland may be as absurd as you please, but if it should turn out that those projects were only to divert our attention from Canada, we shall then have been woefully deceived in our estimate of Fenian tactics. The laugh will then be on their side—not upon ours. They will have displayed consummate generalship, and we consummate stupidity. Never ridicule an enemy until, at least, you know what is his real object, for, if you mistake a feigned attack for a serious one, the laugh will be against you. Nor must we overlook one or two very peculiar circumstances connected with this movement. The American government is said to have given information to the English government as to the designs of the Fenians upon Ireland. Grant, for argument's sake, that this report is true, what words can do justice to the dulness of our public press in mistaking such a proceeding for an evidence of good will on the part of the American government? The Americans, having a bitter dispute with us as to 'damages,' are resolved not to lose or throw away such an important instrument of vengeance as a Fenian invasion of Canada! But they know full well that the Fenians cannot be in two places at one time. If they invade Ireland, they must abandon all designs upon Canada; Ireland alone would exhaust all their resources. Therefore in common policy, in mere shrewdness, the American government would have given warning to our government as to the Fenian designs upon Ireland, knowing well that the Fenians, being effectually stopped in their Irish adventures, would have no resource left but to invade Canada; that is to say, they would have no resource but to do just what the American government would wish them to do! Whereas had the Fenians attempted Ireland, they must have abandoned their schemes as to Canada! This will fully account for the information conveyed by the American government to our own, without the slightest necessity for supposing any good will in the case, but, on the contrary, ill will, and a view to an impending quarrel. Yet we do not venture to assert that any such information has been given; we only express an opinion as to the blunder of our public journals in not seeing the drift of the American cabinet, supposing it to have forwarded such information to our own.

Another remarkable circumstance is this: The President has ordered all the American ironclads to be prepared for sea at once, and the sale of the military stores to be suspended, as those stores may be required for war purposes. And all this, we are told, is intended for the suppression of the Fenians, should they venture to attack British America! Can credulity or simplicity go further than this? Does any one seriously believe it? It so happens that the Fenians have no navy whatever, but they have the nucleus of an army; yet the President makes vast preparations by sea in order to stop an invasion of Canada, which can only be made by land. This is manifestly absurd, and the conclusion is evident: the President is getting ready to CO-OPERATE with the Fenians, in the event of our rejecting his claim of 'compensation'! Yet the public press has not, as yet, hinted at this palpable manœuvre, nor warned us of this two-edged sword. In short, we seem to be blinded at home, and enveloped abroad, by ever-increasing clouds—the eastern cloud of Russian policy, and the western cloud that covers the Atlantic from shore to shore.

'Peace and safety' has for some time past been the prevailing cry. A year or two ago we heard that Russia was all but broken up. Now we find her threefold more dangerous than ever, for she threatens India itself. We went to war with Russia to secure India, and for that purpose alone we formed a strict alliance with Turkey, a Mahometan country, and the most depraved empire in the world. As a just retribution, we find that Russia has turned the flank of Turkey, and is bearing down direct upon our Indian territories. We committed a deadly sin to defend the mere outposts of India, and now the CITADEL itself is certain to be attacked. This retribution is most just. Again, we cruelly insulted the American States while they were distracted by a civil war, most decidedly brought on by their *hatred of negro slavery. The original ground of the American war was the extirpation of SLAVERY, and whatever inferior motives may have been fnixed up with the chief motive, the people of America deserve everlasting praise. Yet we poured upon them inexhaustible produce, exaggerating their faults and denying their virtues. Now America has triumphed, and we have to confront that hatred which our ungenerous strictures have created. We have completely weeded out every friend that we had on earth, having deserted even Portugal, our oldest ally. We have reserved, to decorate our garden, the pestilential flower that 'rots itself at ease' upon the Bosphorus; and when that vile weed has been rooted up we shall find us surrounded by a desert.

While we were finishing these pages, the news arrived of still more vast preparations made by Russia, both by sea and land, as if for some grand movement. All the Russian imperial princes are actively engaged in forwarding these preparations, and next spring is the time by which they are to be completed. What does all this point to? As for the REDUCTION of the French army, that is a mere deception, for France can at any moment call out one million of men, trained, and ready for the field, whenever she may want them."

* If the South had not tried to separate from the North, slavery would have continued as long as the North made money by it,—that's the truth.

POOR BILLY.

"One man there was, and many such you might
Have met, who never had a dozen thoughts
In all his life."—Pollock.

There is a great apparent difference in point of development between man and man. Here is one, whom I have known for many years, and who now lives not far from my place of abode. He is called "Poor Billy"; but why? He is a tall, able-bodied man, and enjoys robust health, and has quite a large sum of money at interest.

Why, then, is he called poor? Well, because he is almost an idiot. If you should hear him try to speak, you could not understand him. And he is so deaf that if you should speak to him he would not be apt to hear you; and if he did hear, it is very doubtful whether he would know what you meant.

It is said that when he was a young child he seemed about as bright as other children; but when quite young he was very sick with a dangerous disease, and when he got better it was noticed that he was deaf, and his organs of speech were injured so that he could not talk so as to be understood. I suppose he is now nearly sixty years old, yet he is but a child in judgment, and can neither read nor write.

Now look at a different case. The man of whom I now speak was a very near relative of "Poor Billy." But he was as much above other men as Billy was below. He was Governor of the Empire State; and also at least twice in the Cabinet at Washington, and for some years there was but one man in the country above him—that was the President.

What made the difference between these two men? Their pedigree was precisely the same, if they could trace it through to the garden of Eden. Precisely the same blood flowed in the veins of both. Yet what a vast difference in their development. The one stood for a time almost the foremost man on the American continent; the other, so low in the scale of intelligence as scarce to know the "name his mother called him by."

Ah! proud pretender to science, there is a cause of causes back of all that you can trace. GOD makes men to differ. And if you have learning, and talent, and great ability, thank HIM for it, for all your powers come from Him.

But what advantage will all these noble gifts be to you in the great day when "every one of us shall give an account of himself to God?" If misimproved, they will only aggravate your ruin.

And there is a difference between what the world calls "misimprovement," and what the Bible calls it. No matter how high you stand, even if you excel all that have walked the earth for a thousand years; if you are not a faithful servant and humble follower of Christ, you are hastening to destruction. You have hid your Lord's talent in a napkin, or buried it in the vain and delusive things of earth, and a fearful reckoning awaits you.

Then "seek ye the Lord while he may be found," or it will be more "tolerable for the land of Sodom, in the day of judgment, than for thee." F. H. CHAMBERLAIN.

BESSIE'S FAITH.

In the cold, gray, solemn starlight
Of a winter's night,
Little Bessie, weak and weary,
In her home so dark and dreary,
Watched for morning light.

On her bed of straw so cheerless,
Long she sadly tossed:
Ah! ye heirs of wealth and pleasure,
From your overflowing measure
Give, nor count it lost.

Hungry, shivering little Bessie,
Stole she from her bed,
Prayed that God would feed her mother,
And her feeble, helpless brother,
With his daily bread.

Looking through the little skylight,
Bessie saw a star;
How its cheerful twinkling won her,
As it smiled in love upon her
From its home afar!

Gazing through the one small window
On that orb so bright,
Soon the starbeams banished sadness,
Bessie's face was lit with gladness,
And her heart grew light.

"God is good—he'll not desert us!"
Oh the faith of youth!
Food and warmth came with the morrow;
Bessie's night of want and sorrow
Held the gem of truth.

Deep within her childish bosom
Sank the seeds of trust:
Her prayer of faith was clothed with power,
And taught her in her darkest hour
God is ever just.

BOYS—THEIR MISTAKES.

Among the many good things written and printed to guide ministers and rulers, fathers and mothers, and the like, I do not recollect of ever reading a good article in a good religious paper addressed to boys, or for their special benefit. These are not young men, nor yet children. They are boys! and I look upon them with great interest. They are soon to be young men, and then men, and the interests of the church and of the nation will be in their hands.

Now, my nervous, restless young friend, there is no period of life in which you are in danger of making so many mistakes as in boyhood. So sit down a few minutes and listen, while I point out to you some of the mistakes which you are very liable to make.

First mistake: That parents and teachers often thwart you just because they have the power.

You know that parents and teachers have often forbid your doing this or that, and directed you to do what you don't want to do, or what you think may just as well be put off, or that might be done in some easier way. Then you feel that you know all about it as well as they do, and better too, and so you have a right to resist and contest the thing, and certainly to grumble about it. It seems to you that they love to command, and make you do the very thing that you don't want to do, and so you ask, "what good will it do?" or, "why can't I do it some other time?" or you go about it muttering and murmuring, as if greatly abused.

Now understand that this is a great mistake. The parent who will toil from early dawn till you are asleep in the evening to support you, and who will watch over you day and night when you are sick, loves you too well to lay one command on you which is not for your good to obey. Does that parent ever bid you crush your finger in a vice, or bruise it with a hammer, or make you freeze your feet in the snow? Does the teacher ever rejoice when you are in pain, or contrive how he can make your head ache? Why, then, should it give them pleasure to hurt your feelings, or to cross your will, unless they do it for your good? I do not believe that the parent or teacher, in one case out a thousand, ever thwarts a boy unless he thinks it for his good. To array yourself against this authority, then, is a mistake, but a very common one. I don't believe a boy ever rebels, or plays truant, or runs away from his home, without first trying to convince himself that he is right and has been abused, and that his father or teacher is a very hard-hearted creature.

Perhaps you will say, "I would honor my father and my mother if they were only rich, so that we could have every thing we want, and if they were educated and refined, a real gentleman and a real lady; but how can I honor one who is poor and uneducated, and not respected and not refined, and who is at times impatient and fretful, and sometimes even violent and passionate? My dear boy, God knew there would be just such parents, and he knew how hard it would be to respect and honor such, and so he has provided for it in two ways; first, by laying his own command on us, and secondly, by promising us a special reward. "Thy days shall be long," the first and last command with a promise. Honor thy father and thy mother because they are thy parents, and though they may make mistakes sometimes, they mean to seek only your good.

Second mistake: That any thing vulgar or sinful can be manly.

Boys sometimes—perhaps often, get the notion that it is manly for a boy to smoke, or use tobacco, because men, and respectable men do it; that to use profane, or vulgar, or obscene language is manly; that to be irreverent and low in speech is manly—because men do so at times. A sad mistake, I assure you. If such men are allowed in good society, it is in spite of these things, and not in consequence of them. I have never seen a father who, as I thought, really wanted to have his boy learn to smoke, or to be vulgar or profane; and what would you think of a father, who, every morning, at family worship should pray that his son might that day learn to use one more intense oath, or might learn to blaspheme the name of God with new glibness. Now is it right to do anything for which we may not pray? And what would your mother say if in the morning she should find her boy kneeling down and praying God to help him to be more profane, or to use viler language than ever before? And yet you know that many a boy will use language and oaths and vile speech during the day, on which he dares not think when he meets God alone in the dark. Know then, my boy, that if you think that any thing that is low or vulgar, or such as you would not want to say or do before your mother or sister, is manly, you are mistaken. "Sin is a reproach to any people," and to none more so than to young people. And as to those low, vile men who would teach you vile things, and encourage you to be vulgar or profane, shun them as you would demons from the bottomless pit.

Third mistake: That you can break off bad habits any time you please.

You will often meet with boys who boast that they are not tied by bad habits; so that at any time they please they can stop having wicked thoughts whenever they please—stop using profane language, and have the imagination and words all pure, whenever they please: but let them try, and then see. The trouble is, they won't "please," and they won't try to do it. You might just as well dip your hands in tar and keep that on them a month, and then say, "O, I can wash it all off in a moment, whenever I please." You might just as well swallow poison, and say, "I can throw it all out of my system any moment I please." What would you think of a boy who should play with a mad dog or a rattlesnake, under the belief that he could expel the poison of their bite at any moment? No. Sin is like pitch—it will stick to you. It is like poison, it will not go at your bidding. Many a boy drinks this poison through a vile book, a vile picture, or a viler companion, till his soul is defiled, his imagination is polluted and made a den of unclean things, and a rendezvous of unclean spirits, all the rest of his life. All the waters of the Nile could not wash such a heart clean. No boy can conceive what shame, what bondage, what remorse and misery he is laying up for himself even in this life, by early or secret indulgence in sin. These sins are like little ropes, but they hang you over the bottomless pit. The waters of Jordan once cleansed one leper, and that was a miracle; but no waters can make your soul pure when once polluted. It is easy to learn to sin, but to break away from it when once learned is almost superhuman.—John Todd, in Congregationalist.

THE HONEST BOY.

A gentleman from the country placed his son with a dry goods merchant. For a time all went well. At length a lady came to the store to purchase a silk dress, and the young man waited on her. The price demanded was agreed to, and he proceeded to fold the goods. He discovered a flaw in the silk before he had finished, and pointing it out to the lady, said, "Madam, I deem it my duty to tell you there is a fracture in the silk."

Of course she did not take it.

The merchant overheard the remark, and immediately wrote to the father of the young man to come and take him home; "for," said he, "he will never make a merchant."

The father was much grieved, and hastened to be informed of his deficiencies.

"Why will he not make a merchant?" he asked.

"Because he has no tact," was the answer. "Only a day or two ago he told a lady, who was buying silk of him, that the goods were damaged, and I lost the bargain."

"And is that all his fault?"

"Yes."

"Then I love my son better than ever, and I thank you for telling me of the matter. I would not have him another day in your store for the world."

"THE HOLES ARE THERE STILL!"

This story, so fraught with meaning, we have often met with, but it will bear frequent repetition. Will our little readers con it over?

A father, whose son was addicted to some vicious propensities, bade the boy drive a nail into a certain post whenever he committed a fault; and agreed that the nail should be drawn out whenever he corrected an error. In process of time the post was completely filled with nails.

The youth became alarmed at the extent of his indiscretions, and set about reforming himself. One by one, the nails were drawn out, and the father commended his noble, self-denying heroism, in freeing himself from his faults.

"They are all drawn out," said the parent. The boy looked sad, and there was a whole volume of practical wisdom in his sadness. With a heavy heart he replied:

"True, father, but the holes are there still!"

THE GREAT TEACHER.—It is said that Victoria, the Queen of England, when at home in her beautiful palace at Windsor, has a Sunday school which she attends, and in which she has a class of children. Many little boys and girls would, no doubt, feel greatly honored to be taught by a queen. But, children, you may have for a teacher, if you wish it, the greatest of all kings,—the Lord of lords, and King of kings; for Jesus Christ has said, "Learn of me."

I CAN'T FORGET IT.—"I forget a great many things which happened last year," said a little girl, the tears running down her cheeks; "but I can't forget the angry words I spoke to my dear mother who is now dead."

☞ THE CRISIS is devoted to the exposition of all Bible truth; especially the doctrine of the immediate, personal coming and reign of Christ on the earth; holiness of heart; the unconscious state of the dead; their literal resurrection, and final destruction of the wicked.

For the World's Crisis.

"BEHOLD, I COME QUICKLY."

"Behold He cometh in the clouds,
And every eye shall see";
Dark mystery no longer shrouds
The word of prophecy.
Ye waiting saints, your heads lift up,
Your blest redemption's nigh;
The promised land, your glorious hope,
Soon, soon shall greet your eye.

A glorious crown of righteousness,
Laid up in heaven above,
He'll bring his faithful saints to bless,
"That his appearing love."
"All that ye have, dear friends, hold fast,
That no man take thy crown";
Soon in Christ's kingdom, home at last,
With joy ye shall sit down.

He that shall come, will quickly come,
And shall not tarry long;
He'll raise to youth's immortal bloom
His holy, ransomed throng.
All shall not sleep, all shall not die;
To an immortal state,
Changed in the twinkling of an eye,
His living saints that wait.

"Behold, I come; I quickly come,
And my reward with me,
To give to every man the sum
Just as his works shall be."
Amen. Our heart cries even so,
Lord Jesus, quickly come,
And in thy kingdom here below,
O' bring thy dear saints home.

THE DOCTRINE OF THE PHARISEES AND OF THE SADDUCEES DEFINED.

And an Explanation of the Parable of the Rich Man and Lazarus.

"E'en adders hear,
But turn, and dart into the dark again."
"He is a slave who fears to be
In the right with two or three."

THE DOCTRINE OF THE PHARISEES AND OF THE SADDUCEES.

"Then said Jesus unto them, Take heed and beware of the leaven of the Pharisees and of the Sadducees. . . Then understood they how that He bade them not beware of the leaven of bread, but of the doctrine of the Pharisees and of the Sadducees."—MATT. 16. 6–12.

Having now considered what was "the doctrine of the Sadducees," and what "the doctrine of the Pharisees," relating to a future life, one of which denied the scriptural doctrine of the resurrection, and the other nullified or destroyed it by their traditions; we are prepared to explain "the parable of the Rich Man and Lazarus"; and thus come to the stronghold, wherein the defenders of man's conscious existence in death, and rewards in the intermediate state, between death and the resurrection, have taken refuge with a great degree of certainty that they have the truth, though not altogether without fear that they may be entrenched in error.

THE PARABLE.

"There was a certain rich man, which was clothed in purple and fine linen, and fared sumptuously every day: and there was a certain beggar named Lazarus, which was laid at his gate, full of sores, and desiring to be fed with the crumbs which fell from the rich man's table: moreover the dogs came and licked his sores. And it came to pass, that the beggar died, and was carried by the angels into Abraham's bosom: the rich man also died, and was buried; and in hell he lift up his eyes, being in torments, and seeth Abraham afar off, and Lazarus in his bosom. And he cried and said, Father Abraham, have mercy on me, and send Lazarus, that he may dip the tip of his finger in water, and cool my tongue; for I am tormented in this flame. But Abraham said, Son, remember that thou in thy lifetime receivedst thy good things, and likewise Lazarus evil things: but now he is comforted, and thou art tormented. And beside all this, between us and you there is a great gulf fixed: so that they which would pass from hence to you cannot; neither can they pass to us that would come from thence. Then he said, I pray thee therefore, father, that thou wouldest send him to my father's house: for I have five brethren; that he may testify unto them, lest they also come into this place of torment. Abraham saith unto him, They have Moses and the prophets; let them hear them. And he said, Nay, father Abraham: but if one went unto them from the dead, they will repent. And he said unto him, If they hear not Moses and the prophets, neither will they be persuaded, though one rose from the dead."—Luke 16: 19–31.

Let us now critically observe, and most carefully consider this parable.

1. This parable was addressed to the Pharisees:—"And the Pharisees heard all these things, and they derided him."—Verse 14. That it was a parable, is evident from its structure and the moral it contains, together with the fact that "without a parable spake he not unto them."—Matt. 13: 34.

2. Parables are illustrations of certain facts or truths, and not designed always to teach doctrine. Every part or limb of a parable is by no means to be regarded as illustrating the truth or fact to be made plain; hence the saying, "A parable should not be made to go on all fours." Nor is truth, or the subject to be illustrated, made perfectly plain by a parable; for it is said, "The legs of a parable are not equal"; that is, the thing illustrated by a parable cannot be made to appear so perfectly, or without halting. These facts not having been observed as general rules, there has been too much fancy and speculation in the interpretation of this and other parables uttered by our Lord.

3. The object of this parable is not to teach the doctrine of the soul's immortality, or the conscious existence of the soul or spirit in death, or the character or condition of the righteous and wicked in an intermediate state, or the place of the custody of souls or spirits in the state of the dead. None of these themes were the subjects of conversation or controversy between Christ and the Pharisees, at the time of the giving of this parable, as can be seen from the record. Besides, if Jesus by this parable designed to teach the doctrine of the immortality of the soul, and the character of the intermediate state, he certainly taught what he on no other occasion did teach, either to his own disciples, or the multitude; and he would be made to teach contradictory doctrine to what he taught his disciples, and also the most absurd and ridiculous nonsense respecting the intermediate state, not worthy of the Great Teacher from heaven, or of the credence of any reflective, intelligent mind, especially enlightened by the gospel.

Suppose we interpret the parable as instructing us concerning the intermediate state, both of the just and unjust, thus: "Lazarus died, and was carried by angels" literally and bodily to "Abraham's" literal "bosom." This would be the literal interpretation of the parable concerning the state of Lazarus! But that will not do. Let us then spiritualise the parable thus: Lazarus died, and his soul—an "infinitesimal" part of him, "ten thousand times less than a mite," is conveyed by angels to Abraham's spirit bosom, where the rich man sees him "afar off," possessing an organized body; and who makes petition to Abraham, that Lazarus might "dip the tip of his" infinitesimal "finger," which must be a million times less than a millionth part of his whole soul, "in water," a drop of which is ten million times larger than Lazarus and the rich man's soul together, to "cool" his "tongue," which of course no fire could find to burn or water to cool! Now to palm off upon the Son of God such nonsense as this, or any other interpretation that can be given by spiritualizing the parable, as his sublime doctrine of a future state after death, is to betray the greatest ignorance of scriptural knowledge and historic facts, which should put to the blush any man attempting to do it, or believe it.

Again. It is said also, "The rich man died, and was buried; and in hell he lifted up his eyes, being in torment." Thus, after he "died, and was buried," he finds himself in "hell," etc. Suppose we go to the grave of a rich miser, and examine and see if he has fallen through, and gone down into the interior of the earth, and to perdition below, where he awakes to his sad fate! No, he is still in his grave. What then? We must spiritualize him. The rich man's soul, which is "ten thousand times less" than any thing he can conceive of, has gone down into hell, where he "lifts up his eyes," which must be a millionth less than his whole soul, and with them he sees "Lazarus" and "Abraham" "afar off," and prays father Abraham to send Lazarus to "cool" his "tongue" with "water"! Think of the tongue of an immaterial soul being cooled with material water! This is said to be Jesus' doctrine of the intermediate state! a doctrine teaching the invocation and prayers to saints hereafter from those in hell, and they refusing to heed their most earnest entreaties in the least degree! And yet this is believed, and is pretended to be the faith of those who believe in spirit communications, ghosts, etc.; when, according to this parable, the rich man could neither leave hell himself, nor by any means get spirit communication with his "five brethren" to warn them not to come to that place of torment! Blush and be ashamed, ye wise interpreters of the Word, who both expose your ignorance of Scripture and plain historic facts! I say, be ashamed for your incapacity, not only to explain the word of God, and clear your divine Lord and Master of so absurd doctrine, which is beyond the credulity of the human mind to believe, who will for an hour really reflect upon its absurdities; but who teach such to be the doctrine of Jesus Christ!

If this parable teaches the condition of the departed in death, why did not our Lord so instruct his own disciples? Instead of this, his instructions to them plainly contradict what is taught in this parable, as to the period of rewards. He invariably taught them that the dead were rewarded "at his coming," "at the last day," at "the day of judgment," and on "their resurrection from the dead"; and not at death. He declares that when the just shall be carried by angels to meet him in the air, and be conveyed to their place of final reward, it will be at his coming. "He shall send his angels with a great sound of a trumpet, and they shall gather together his elect from the four winds, from one end of heaven to the other."—Matt. 24: 30, 31. And that this is the epoch also for the consignment of the wicked to the "furnace of fire." Matt. 13.

4. The parable being addressed to the Pharisees, with no design or object to teach them doctrine respecting the intermediate state, we have reason to conclude that Jesus endeavors by it to impress upon their minds the conviction of other things; and that he made use of their own views of the condition of men in death, to illustrate and enforce them upon their attention. That this is the truth in the case is most evident from the following extract from Josephus, who himself was a Pharisee, contemporaneous with Christ, and which gives us the Pharisees' doctrine respecting the intermediate state between death and the resurrection. We will quote from this Jewish author on

"Now as to Hades, wherein the souls of the righteous and unrighteous are detained, it is necessary for me to speak. Hades is a place in the world not regularly finished—a subterraneous region, wherein the light of the world does not shine. This region is allotted as a place of custody of souls, in which angels are appointed as guardians to them, who distribute to them temporary punishments, agreeable to one's behavior and manners. In this region there is a certain place set apart as a lake of unquenchable fire, whereinto we suppose no one hath hitherto been cast; but it is prepared for a day afore determined by God, in which one righteous sentence shall be passed upon all men; when the unjust . . . . shall be adjudged to this everlasting punishment, as having been the causes of defilement; while the just shall obtain an incorruptible and never-fading kingdom. These are now confined in Hades, but not in the same place wherein the unjust are confined. For there is one descent into this region, at whose gate we believe there stands an Archangel with an host; which gate when these pass through that are conducted down by the angels appointed over souls, they do not go the same way; but the just are guided to the right hand, and are led with hymns, sung by the angels appointed over that place, unto a region of light, in which the just have dwelt from the beginning of the world, . . . where they wait for that rest and eternal new life in heaven which is to succeed this region. This place we call THE BOSOM OF ABRAHAM. But as to the unjust, they are dragged by force to the left hand by the angels allotted for punishment. . . . . Now these drag them into the neighborhood of hell itself. Who do not stand clear of the hot vapor itself, and in effect are punished thereby; and not only so, but where they SEE the place (or choir) of the FATHERS and of the just, even hereby are they punished; for a chaos deep and large is fixed between them; insomuch that a just man that hath compassion upon them cannot be admitted, nor can one that is unjust, if he were bold enough to attempt it, pass over it."

RESEMBLANCE.

Now no one can read this description of Hades by Josephus, and compare it with the parable under consideration, and not at once discover the similarity between the descriptions given of the state of the departed. Jesus employs the same terms with Josephus, concerning the condition and location of Lazarus and the rich man, thus: Josephus says, "The bosom of Abraham"; Christ, "Abraham's bosom." Josephus says: "A chaos deep and large is fixed between them; insomuch that a just man that hath compassion cannot be admitted, nor can one that is unjust, if he were bold enough to attempt it, pass over it"; Christ, "Between us and you there is a great gulf fixed; so that they which would pass hence to you cannot; neither can they pass to us that would come from thence." Josephus states: "They see the place (or choir) of the fathers," and of the just." Christ,—"The rich man died and seeth Abraham afar off." We might refer to other analogies between the parable and Josephus' description of hades, but these will suffice for our purpose. The matter is proved beyond refutation, that Jesus describes the state of the dead in that parable, as understood by the Pharisees. Their view is distinctly given. Therefore the conclusion, if Jesus teaches doctrine respecting the intermediate state in the parable, then he has taught us the doctrine held by the Pharisees of his time; and instructed us that "the place of the custody of souls" is "a place in the world not regularly finished; a subterraneous region, wherein the light of this world does not shine, where angels are appointed as guardians, who distribute temporary punishments, agreeable to one's behavior and manners."

Jesus was conversing with the Pharisees when he uttered the parable. He knew what their faith was; and the conclusion is inevitable that he taught the doctrine of the Pharisees, and has set his seal to it, if the design was to instruct us respecting the intermediate state of the just and unjust. Then forever let those, who contend that the souls of the righteous have been going to heaven above from the beginning of the world, abandon at once such faith, and become true Pharisees in faith and hope. You are bound to do this, if you would be honest and consistent. And if doctrine is taught respecting the departed wicked, their condition is most dreadful and afflicting; unsaved friends are in the torments of hell, wishing to communicate to the living the knowledge of their condition, that they come not to the same place of torment; and "just men that have compassion" are not allowed to go on this errand of mercy, nor to alleviate the sufferings of those they see in continual despair and agony! Horrible! And who will ascribe such doctrine to the compassionate Jesus? But from whence did the Pharisees obtain their doctrine of hades and its rewards and punishments? From heathen philosophers, who taught that "a suitable destiny hurls into tartarus the souls of the wicked; and that the spirits of just men are freed from hades and dwell in the upper parts of the earth."—Socrates. The heathen tartarus and hades are nearly the same with the Jewish place of custody for souls, the latter deriving their faith from heathen oracles. Hence we see the force of the Savior's admonition,—"Beware of the doctrine of the Pharisees." O. R. FASSETT.

CONSCIENCES.—There are five kinds of consciences in the world. First, the ignorant conscience, which neither sees nor says any thing—neither beholds the sin in a soul, nor reproves it. Second, the flattering conscience, whose speech is worse than silence itself, which, though seeing sin, soothes men in the committing thereof. Third, the seared conscience, which has neither sight, speech, nor sense in men that are past feeling.—Fourth, a wounded conscience, frightened with sin. The last and best is a quiet and clear conscience, pacified in Christ Jesus. Of these, the fourth is incomparably better than the three former, so that a wise man would not take a world to change with them. Yes, a wounded conscience is rather painful than sinful—an affliction, not an offense—and is the ready way, at the next remove, to be turned into a quiet.—Fuller.

For the World's Crisis.

"WE ALL DO FADE AS A LEAF."

If we understand the Scriptures of truth and the signs of the times, the consummation of this world's history is near at hand. Therefore we should not set our affections too much upon earth. A contemplation of our own mortality ought to wean us from earth and fix our meditation upon things above, things of a heavenly nature. We ought not to esteem too highly the things which pertain to the mortal; but we ought to set our affections upon those things which pertain to our immortal existence. The reason for this is obvious. The mortal, and every thing pertaining to it, must "fade as a leaf." Why are we so worldly, so wrapped up in our mortal concerns, and so negligent of our immortal interests? This is not right. Let us awake. Let us not live for this world alone, but for that noble destiny which awaits us; and be ready at any time to be released from this world.

How many of us stand uncondemned by the great tribunal? How many of us do really recognize the fact that "we all do fade as a leaf," and feel ourselves humbled by it? How many of us love our religion and our place of worship as our chief joy? How many of us can say with the Psalmist, "If I forget thee, O Jerusalem, let my right hand forget her cunning, . . . let my tongue cleave to the roof of my mouth."

How many of us feel our dependence upon God, which we must feel if we have any thing like a just sense of our own frailty, of our own mortality? Alas! few can take these questions home and answer them as they should be answered. And yet we cannot look out of our windows, we cannot walk the streets of our little villages, we cannot look upon a leaf, but we are reminded of our frailty. All nature is at this moment declaring to us our mortality, and yet we are indifferent to its warnings. But we shall come to ourselves by and by. We shall hear the winds howl around us; we shall see the leaves as they fall before us; then we shall not walk in the midst of decay and be unmindful of our mortality. Lay us upon the bed of death, surround us with our weeping friends, fill our eyes with tears for past follies and neglects, wring our hearts with bitter anguish, and let the cold thoughts of death creep over us; and then we shall have come to ourselves; then we shall wish that we had thought of death before; then we shall regret that we have neglected these things so long. Our present neglect will sting our hearts bitterly.

Not so with those who have walked and lived and listened to the voice of the God of nature. Not so with those who have lived in view of the frailty of man, and have regulated themselves thereby. Let us then set our affections upon things above; let us never forget that we do fade as a leaf. All this is no fiction; it is not a work of imagination. In consideration of which, is it not high time for us to look about ourselves and prepare for a better world, where nothing shall fade, where nothing shall trouble us in giving sorrow or pain?

"Teach me the measure of my days,
Thou Maker of my frame!
I would survey life's narrow space,
And learn how frail I am.

A span is all that we can boast,
An inch or two of time;
Man is but vanity and dust,
In all his flow'r and prime.

May we forbid each carnal hope,
Our fond desires recal;
And give our mortal int'rest up,
And make our God our all."

Fisherville, N. H. J. ELKINS.

For the World's Crisis.

"THE POOR HAVE THE GOSPEL PREACHED TO THEM."

As the preaching of the gospel to the poor was offered as an evidence that Jesus was the Christ, this is the field in which I have prepared to labor. But owing to our long controversy on the subject of Chronology, I have for about twelve months been deprived of this privilege.

In returning to my labor among those who can claim the blessing of being "poor," we found a place where I am told they had some preaching before "the war," but since which time, if I am correctly informed, their only spiritual instruction has been that received through the agency of two so-called "mediums," which is a modification of the harsher or more unpopular term—"witch," by which they were known in the days of our fathers; or, if we may give the true scriptural term, they are persons "possessed with the devil."

One of them was a noted (as they term it) "trance medium," well known in Boston and other places among those through whom "the spirits of devils working miracles" (Rev. 16: 14) are heading up the full development of "that man of sin" "who opposeth and exalteth himself above all that is called God"; and though it is well known that as soon as the enemy of souls obtains the complete control over those so-called "mediums," they become the most abandoned characters on earth; we are happy to say that, either because they had not yet taken the "black veil" of his diabolic power, or for some other praiseworthy cause, these two at least exhibited the most open, honest willingness to know the truth as to the agency by which they had been enabled to perform such wonderful miracles; and on discovering the truth, they did not only exhibit a willingness to embrace the religion of Jesus, but became two of the most active aids in our meeting; indeed, at the first meeting that one of them attended after her conversion, she became the chief speaker in exhortation, prayer, and loud exclamations of "glory to God."

The other one (the genuineness of whose conversion no one doubts), has thrown open her doors to the people of God, saying, "Come in and worship with me, for my house shall be a house of prayer." We enjoyed the privilege of meeting in a religious assembly under her roof, and the first prayer-meeting after we left was appointed to be held there.

But as it is doubted whether one can be reclaimed who has thus been employed by the adversary of souls, through whom to "show great signs and wonders, insomuch that, if it were possible, they shall deceive the very elect," many will be watching for their halting. Therefore we hope they will have the prayers, the sympathy and encouragement of all who know them; for whether they stand or fall, it will require no ordinary effort on their part to obtain an entire release from the influence of that satanic power which had well nigh proven their everlasting ruin.

Having no churches (I mean houses) in which to preach, our meetings were held in school-houses and private dwellings, to which the people came flocking from every direction, some in sleighs drawn by horses, others in wood sleds drawn by oxen, while yet others would come wading through the snow about two feet deep. In speaking from Isaiah 8: 19, 20, I believe we satisfied all that we must either reject the Bible or cease to "seek unto them that have familiar spirits." Our meetings were continued day and evening. The first night our light was that of a large log fire burning in an old-fashioned fireplace.

At first my only aid, even in prayer meeting, was our zealous brother, John Perkins, and his whole-hearted companion, whose words flowed from the depth of the heart; and even those who came for sport could not withhold their tears from sympathy, and before we left we had not less than twelve who could by singing, prayer and exhortation aid in a prayer meeting. We hope they will continue them until much good shall be accomplished in the name of the Lord.

Notwithstanding the many disadvantages under which we labored, some ten or twelve, including both backsliders and new converts, came out and decided for Christ. Others asked an interest in the prayers of God's people. Others were melted down. A deep solemnity pervaded the entire congregation. Those who at first much annoyed our meetings were now found in tears, expressing an anxiety to become christians. But our time having expired, we could tarry no longer. Since they have commenced a prayer meeting, the history of the real good to be accomplished remains to be told at the appearing of Christ.

All the expense was borne by Bro. Perkins, one of the most liberal hearted christians I have ever known. Were all others only half as much so, there would be no necessity for encumbering ministers of the gospel with gold and silver, for in every christian's house they could find a home, as they did eighteen hundred years ago; and then they would find it as profitable to preach to the poor as to those who have thousands of money; and then ceasing to preach for money, the one only object would be the salvation of men.

WM. C. THURMAN.

WALK IN THE SPIRIT.

It requires very close living with God in order to walk in the light as he is in the light; in order to understand the leadings of his Spirit. The promise to us is: "When he, the Spirit of truth is come, he will guide you into all truth." But the Spirit speaks so gently, that, unless the soul is in a state of entire quietude it fails to understand. If there is, in any degree, an undue anxiety, carefulness or fearfulness, it brings confusion into the soul, which greatly impedes our spiritual progress. A person sitting for the purpose of having his photograph taken, understands that should he move so much as to turn his eye, a blur is brought upon the picture, which spoils the whole.

Just so in our spiritual life; while we look with a single eye, steadily to Jesus, he enstamps his own image upon us, but soon as we turn to look in another direction the work is spoiled. To regain our position, we must repent, have the knowledge of forgiveness, and have the blood anew applied which makes all clean within. Glory to Jesus! Then he puts his stamp upon us and we bear the image of the heavenly. The reason why so few walk in the clear light is because they allow so much indefiniteness in their experience. The falling into a slight error occasions a mist which prevents a perfect intercourse with God. It is of the utmost necessity at such a time to come directly to God for the light of the Spirit to show the course. It is unsafe to rest with a clear understanding of his will. The injunction of God's word is, "Be not unwise, but understanding what the will of the Lord is." He has also promised to lead us in a plain path. When we cease from our own works, depending alone upon the guidance of the Spirit, every step we take will be plain. Then will our efforts to advance the work of God become effectual. Our labor will not be as one who beateth the air.

It is when we cease from self, and wait for the Spirit to go before, preparing our way and impelling us forward, that we are permitted to feel that our labor is not in vain in the Lord. Five words spoken in the Spirit, will accomplish what scores of sermons fail to without its aid. Should the ministers of the gospel take this stand, should they never attempt to preach without the anointing of the Holy Ghost—should they never deliver a message to the people unless it was given them from above, there would then be such a fire kindled in our pulpits as we seldom see at the present day.

Should the members of the church take this stand, should they tarry before the throne for the baptism of the Spirit, and not go to the place of worship without it, we should oftener hear the cry: "Men and brethren, what shall we do to be saved?" It is the faith and power which the prophets and apostles had that is now required, to cause a shaking among the dry bones and awake the dead to life. A few already are awake to this truth and are earnestly asking after the old paths. Bless the Lord! Walking fully in the Spirit cannot fail to lead us back to apostolical religion from which will follow like manifestations of the power of God. My soul cries out;

"Shorten these delaying days,
And bring the promised hour."

We have enough preaching, exhorting and praying, but oh! not enough of the Spirit. The blessed word declares,—"It is not by might, nor by power, but by my Spirit, saith the Lord." O for the energy divine to be breathed upon the people!

"Oh, for that flame of living fire,
Which shone so bright in saints of old."

His grace is full and mighty now as when Elijah felt its power. It is coming! I hear its distant thunderings. Hallelujah! "As many as are led by the Spirit of God, they are the sons of God."—Earnest Christian.

For the World's Crisis.

A SHORT SERMON.

"Teach me thy way, O Lord; I will walk in thy truth: unite my heart to fear thy name."—PSA. 86: 11.

In the verses previous to our text, the Psalmist, in a most magnificent manner, acknowledges the greatness of that blessed Being with whom we have to do, and in his language exalts him above all. When we meditate upon the being and dignity of the Supreme Ruler of the universe, we launch out into a boundless ocean, and are lost in wonder, love and praise. Let all the powers of your intellect take the utmost stretch of thought, meditate upon the boundless goodness and mercy of God to fallen man, and remember the ten thousand blessings he in mercy has conferred upon you, and all who have ever become his servants; and we, like the Psalmist, would be led to cry out, "Teach me thy way, O Lord." "I will walk in thy truth." "Unite my heart to fear thy name."

But we will consider briefly the three beautiful divisions in our text. First, the Psalmist asks his heavenly Father for the most important instruction that ever was sought by man; and thus shows his desire and willingness to be a humble pupil before the great Jehovah, who has said, "Ask, and ye shall receive;" and also, "He that lacks wisdom, let him ask of God, who giveth to all men liberally, and upbraideth not." Let us think deeply upon this subject, and make it one of the most important points in our daily prayers, that our Father would lead us by his Spirit, that we may be the true children of God, and heirs of the kingdom; and that we may have an abundance of that wisdom which is from above, and is pure, peaceable, gentle, easy to be entreated, and full of good works, sowing the fruit of righteousness wherever we are.

Second, "I will walk in thy truth." Here the Psalmist,—in connection with his fervent desire to be taught of God,—firmly resolves, that, under the influence of those heavenly instructions, he will walk in God's truth. This is a very safe and sure way for every child of God; first, to look to God for instruction, and then firmly promise the Lord that you will walk in the truth, trusting in his divine assistance. This would be in unison with the divine command, "Walk before me, and be thou perfect."

This brings fresh to my mind the affecting scenes passed through forty-three years ago, when it seemed to me a voice spake unto me, saying, "Go to yonder grove (after six months' deep conviction), and there dedicate yourself to the Lord, and firmly promise, in his strength, that you will never turn your back upon the cause of Christ; and the dear Savior will meet you there, and pardon your sins, and take you under his protecting care." And I was not disobedient to the heavenly message, but dropped all and went. There, on my knees, I pleaded with God, for Christ's sake, to forgive my sins; and at the same time I firmly covenanted with the Lord that I would, in his strength, walk in his truth all the days of my life; and, behold, the great blessing of sins forgiven came like a shower upon the thirsty earth, and my prayer was soon changed to praise and thanksgiving, and I was led to cry out with emphasis, Now the great Redeemer is my Savior beyond the grave. And it seems to me that the last, or third division of my text,—"Unite my heart to fear thy name,"—has been my prayer ever since I was converted in the spring of 1822.

Here I would ask the question, what is a profession of religion without the whole heart is in the work? and if we have been really converted to God, and his love is shed abroad in our hearts by the Holy Ghost, shall we not fear God with that filial fear, and have such love for this truth, and the cause of religion, that we shall dread the thought of doing wrong? and would it not be a supreme delight to do all we could to please God? It seems to me it would. If you had a near and dear friend, who had done every possible kindness to you, and conferred upon you thousands of blessings, would you not ever avoid offending that dear friend? Certainly you would.

And surely there can be no earthly friend who can bear any comparison with our heavenly Father, who giveth us all things richly to enjoy; and, as God is an inexhaustible fountain of goodness and mercy, and can supply all wants, therefore his friendship is of more value than the friendship of thousands of earthly friends, and justly deserves our most earnest seeking and highest regard. The dear Redeemer has bought all our love, our regard, and our devotion; and therefore let us dedicate ourselves, soul, body and spirit, to the Lord. Thus we may be his jewels when he comes to set up his everlasting kingdom on the earth. Amen. B. PERMAN.

BEAR AND FORBEAR.

If we would have our life move on smoothly, we must learn to bear and forbear. We must indulge the friend we love in the little peculiarities of saying and doing things which may be important to him, but of little moment to us. Like children we must suffer each one to build his house his own way, and not quarrel with him because he does not think our way the best. All usefulness and all comfort may be prevented by an unkind, a sour, a crabbed temper of mind—a mind that can bear with no difference of opinion or temperament.

A spirit of fault-finding, an unsatisfied temper, a constant irritability, little inequalities in the look, the temper or the manner; a brow cloudy and dissatisfied—your husband or your wife cannot tell why—will more than neutralize all the good you can do, and render life any thing but a blessing. It is in such gentle and quiet virtues as meekness and forbearance, that the happiness and usefulness of life consist, far more than brilliant eloquence, in splendid talent, or illustrious deeds, that shall send the name to future times. It is the babbling spring which flows gently, the little rivulet which glides through the meadow, and which runs along day and night by the farm-house, that is useful, rather than the swollen flood or the roaring cataract. Niagara excites our wonder, and we stand amazed at the power and greatness of God there, as he "pours it from his hollow hand." But one Niagara is enough for a continent, or a world; while that same world needs thousands and tens of thousands of silver fountains and gentle flowing rivulets, which shall water every farm, and every meadow and every garden, and that shall flow on every day and every night with their gentle and quiet beauty. So with the acts of our lives.

It is not by great deeds only, like those of Howard—not by great sufferings only, like those of the martyrs—that good is to be done; it is by the daily and quiet virtues of life—the christian temper, the meek forbearance, the spirit of forgiveness in the husband, the wife, the father, the mother, the brother, the sister, the friend, the neighbor, that good is to be done; and in all this you may be useful.—Ex.

NEARING HOME.

Yes, we are nearing home. The long dark night of sorrow and trial is passing away,—the morning will soon dawn when the toil-worn and weary pilgrims will find rest—sweet rest, in the kingdom. As we near the harbor perils and dangers thicken around us.

The angry billows rise high, the dark waves foam and dash against our little bark, and threaten to overwhelm us. We sink for a moment beneath the dark waters, then we rise above the billows and, behold! Jesus is at the helm. How it cheers our hearts and revives our drooping spirits. With a firmer grasp we cling to the ship, knowing it will anchor safe on the other shore.

Then the reward will be given to the faithful; the richness and blessedness of which will far exceed any thing which could be bestowed on mortal man. A crown of glory more beautiful than ever decked a monarch's brow will be placed upon our heads. We shall be inhabitants of the new earth blooming in all its Eden beauty, pluck rich fruit from life's fair tree, and drink from the crystal river. There we shall greet the loved of earth, and never part again. O, blessed morn! With joy we hail thy bright beams. The Sun will soon arise.

The trials of earth are thickening around
The saints of God, that are homeward bound;
Tho' fall'n amid perils and dangers unseen,
On the arm of the Lord we confidingly lean.

He'll guide our frail bark o'er billows and foam,
And anchor us safe in our heavenly home;
Then cling to the ship, 'twill land us at last
Safe in the harbor, with all dangers past.

O, then, we'll be glad and rejoice in that day,
The enemy conquered, we'll join in the lay—
In the song of redemption, on that happy shore,
Where all the redeemed shall live evermore.

Our trials are ended, we've reached that blest shore,
Where the saints shall unite to be parted no more;
Then cling to the ship, 'mid billows and foam,
We'll anchor in safety, no longer to roam.

TO WHOM SHALL WE GO?

"Then Simon Peter answered him, Lord, to whom shall we go? thou hast the words of eternal life."—JOHN 6: 68.

This is the best possible reply we can make to every temptation to apostasy, from whatever quarter it may arise. Does infidelity tempt us to desert the standard of the cross, what has she to offer? Nothing but an awful blank to every christian hope; eternal sleep instead of eternal bliss, and annihilation instead of endless glory and happiness in the kingdom of God. Does the world tempt us to desert our Savior for its wealth, its splendor, or its joy? Alas! they are uncertain, unsubstantial; they pass away like a rising vapor or the fleeting clouds of summer.

Where, or to whom, then, can we go? Thou, Lord, and thou alone, hast the words of eternal life. Through him we can receive joys and pleasures that are lasting; obtain wealth where neither moth nor rust doth corrupt, nor thieves break through and steal; receive splendor and honor which the world cannot give; and, what is still better, it will endure forever.

Dear reader, have you found this Jesus to be precious to your soul? Then cling to him with such tenacity that it will be impossible for Satan to loosen your grasp. If you have not found him, seek him at once, while he may be found. CHAS. H. SWEET.

For the World's Crisis.

"BEHOLD, I COME QUICKLY."

"Behold He cometh in the clouds,
And every eye shall see";
Dark mystery no longer shrouds
The word of prophecy.
Ye waiting saints, your heads lift up,
Your blest redemption's nigh;
The promised land, your glorious hope,
Soon, soon shall greet your eye.

A glorious crown of righteousness,
Laid up in heaven above,
He'll bring his faithful saints to bless,
"That his appearing love."
"All that ye have, dear friends, hold fast,
That no man take the crown";
Soon in Christ's kingdom, home at last,
With joy ye shall sit down.

He that shall come, will quickly come,
And shall not tarry long;
He'll raise to youth's immortal bloom
His holy, ransomed throng.
All shall not sleep, all shall not die;
To an immortal state,
Changed in the twinkling of an eye,
His living saints that wait.

"Behold, I come; I quickly come,
And my reward with me,
To give to every man the sum
Just as his works shall be."
Amen. Our heart cries even so,
Lord Jesus, quickly come,
And in thy kingdom here below,
O! bring thy dear saints home.

THE DOCTRINE OF THE PHARISEES AND OF THE SADDUCEES DEFINED.

And an Explanation of the Parable of the Rich Man and Lazarus.

"E'en adders hear,
But turn, and dart into the dark again."
"He is a slave who fears to be
In the right with two or three."

THE DOCTRINE OF THE PHARISEES AND OF THE SADDUCEES.

"Then said Jesus unto them, Take heed and beware of the leaven of the Pharisees and of the Sadducees... Then understood they how that He bade them not beware of the leaven of bread, but of the doctrine of the Pharisees and of the Sadducees."—MATT. 16: 6-12.

Having now considered what was "the doctrine of the Sadducees," and what "the doctrine of the Pharisees," relating to a future life, one of which denied the scriptural doctrine of the resurrection, and the other nullified or destroyed it by their traditions; we are prepared to explain "the parable of the Rich Man and Lazarus"; and thus come to the stronghold, wherein the defenders of man's conscious existence in death, and rewards in the intermediate state, between death and the resurrection, have taken refuge with a great degree of certainty that they have the truth, though not altogether without fear that they may be entrenched in error.

THE PARABLE.

"There was a certain rich man, which was clothed in purple and fine linen, and fared sumptuously every day: and there was a certain beggar named Lazarus, which was laid at his gate, full of sores, and desiring to be fed with the crumbs which fell from the rich man's table: moreover the dogs came and licked his sores. And it came to pass, that the beggar died, and was carried by the angels into Abraham's bosom: the rich man also died, and was buried; and in hell he lift up his eyes, being in torments, and seeth Abraham afar off, and Lazarus in his bosom. And he cried and said, Father Abraham, have mercy on me, and send Lazarus, that he may dip the tip of his finger in water, and cool my tongue; for I am tormented in this flame. But Abraham said, Son, remember that thou in thy lifetime receivedst thy good things, and likewise Lazarus evil things: but now he is comforted, and thou art tormented. And beside all this, between us and you there is a great gulf fixed: so that they which would pass from hence to you cannot; neither can they pass to us that would come from thence. Then he said, I pray thee therefore, father, that thou wouldest send him to my father's house: for I have five brethren; that he may testify unto them, lest they also come into this place of torment. Abraham saith unto him, They have Moses and the prophets; let them hear them. And he said, Nay, father Abraham: but if one went unto them from the dead, they will repent. And he said unto him, If they hear not Moses and the prophets, neither will they be persuaded, though one rose from the dead."—Luke 16: 19-31.

Let us now critically observe, and most carefully consider this parable.

1. This parable was addressed to the Pharisees:—"And the Pharisees heard all these things, and they derided him."—Verse 14. That it was a parable, is evident from its structure and the moral it contains, together with the fact that "without a parable spake he not unto them."—Matt. 13: 34.

2. Parables are illustrations of certain facts or truths, and not designed always to teach doctrine. Every part or limb of a parable is by no means to be regarded as illustrating the truth or fact to be made plain; hence the saying, "A parable should not be made to go on all fours." Nor is truth, or the subject to be illustrated, made perfectly plain by a parable; for it is said, "The legs of a parable are not equal"; that is, the thing illustrated by a parable cannot be made to appear so perfectly, or without halting. These facts not having been observed as general rules, there has been too much fancy and speculation in the interpretation of this and other parables uttered by our Lord.

3. The object of this parable is not to teach the doctrine of the soul's immortality, or the conscious existence of the soul or spirit in death, or the character or condition of the righteous and wicked in an intermediate state, or the place of the custody of souls or spirits in the state of the dead. None of these themes were the subjects of conversation or controversy between Christ and the Pharisees, at the time of the giving of this parable, as can be seen from the record. Besides, if Jesus by this parable designed to teach the doctrine of the immortality of the soul, and the character of the intermediate state, he certainly taught what he on no other occasion did teach, either to his own disciples, or the multitude; and he would be made to teach contradictory doctrine to what he taught his disciples, and also the most absurd and ridiculous nonsense respecting the intermediate state, not worthy of the Great Teacher from heaven, or of the credence of any reflective, intelligent mind, especially enlightened by the gospel.

Suppose we interpret the parable as instructing us concerning the intermediate state, both of the just and unjust, thus: "Lazarus died, and was carried by angels" literally and bodily to "Abraham's" literal "bosom." This would be the literal interpretation of the parable concerning the state of Lazarus! But that will not do. Let us then spiritualise the parable thus: Lazarus died, and his soul—an "infinitesimal" part of him, "ten thousand times less than a mite," is conveyed by angels to Abraham's spirit bosom, where the rich man sees him "afar off," possessing an organized body; and who makes petition to Abraham, that Lazarus might "dip the tip of his" infinitesimal "finger," which must be a million times less than a millionth part of his whole soul, "in water," a drop of which is ten million times larger than Lazarus and the rich man's soul together, to "cool" his "tongue," which of course no fire could find to burn or water to cool! Now to palm off upon the Son of God such nonsense as this, or any other interpretation that can be given by spiritualizing the parable, as his sublime doctrine of a future state after death, is to betray the greatest ignorance of scriptural knowledge and historic facts, which should put to the blush any man attempting to do it, or believe it.

Again. It is said also, "The rich man died, and was buried; and in hell he lifted up his eyes, being in torment." Thus, after he "died, and was buried," he finds himself in "hell," etc. Suppose we go to the grave of a rich miser, and examine and see if he has fallen through, and gone down into the interior of the earth, and to perdition below, where he awakes to his sad fate! No, he is still in his grave. What then? We must spiritualize him. The rich man's soul, which is "ten thousand times less" than any thing he can conceive of, has gone down into hell, where he "lifts up his eyes," which must be a millionth less than his whole soul, and with them he sees "Lazarus" and "Abraham" "afar off," and prays father Abraham to send Lazarus to "cool" his "tongue" with "water"! Think of the tongue of an immaterial soul being cooled with material water! This is said to be Jesus' doctrine of the intermediate state! a doctrine teaching the invocation and prayers to saints hereafter from those in hell, and they refusing to heed their most earnest entreaties in the least degree! And yet this is believed, and is pretended to be the faith of those who believe in spirit communications, ghosts, etc.; when, according to this parable, the rich man could neither leave hell himself, nor by any means get spirit communication with his "five brethren" to warn them not to come to that place of torment! Blush and be ashamed, ye wise interpreters of the Word, who both expose your ignorance of Scripture and plain historic facts! I say, be ashamed for your incapacity, not only to explain the word of God, and clear your divine Lord and Master of so absurd doctrine, which is beyond the credulity of the human mind to believe, who will for an hour really reflect upon its absurdities; but who teach such to be the doctrine of Jesus Christ!

If this parable teaches the condition of the departed in death, why did not our Lord so instruct his own disciples? Instead of this, his instructions to them plainly contradict what is taught in this parable, as to the period of rewards. He invariably taught them that the dead were rewarded "at his coming," "at the last day," at "the day of judgment," and on "their resurrection from the dead"; and not at death. He declares that when the just shall be carried by angels to meet him in the air, and be conveyed to their place of final reward, it will be at his coming. "He shall send his angels with a great sound of a trumpet, and they shall gather together his elect from the four winds, from one end of heaven to the other."—Matt. 24: 30, 31. And that this is the epoch also for the consignment of the wicked to the "furnace of fire." Matt. 13.

4. The parable being addressed to the Pharisees, with no design or object to teach them doctrine respecting the intermediate state, we have reason to conclude that Jesus endeavors by it to impress upon their minds the conviction of other things; and that he made use of their own views of the condition of men in death, to illustrate and enforce them upon their attention. That this is the truth in the case is most evident from the following extract from Josephus, who himself was a Pharisee, contemporaneous with Christ, and which gives us the Pharisees' doctrine respecting the intermediate state between death and the resurrection. We will quote from this Jewish author on

HADES.

"Now as to Hades, wherein the souls of the righteous and unrighteous are detained, it is necessary for me to speak. Hades is a place in the world not regularly finished—a subterraneous region, wherein the light of the world does not shine. This region is allotted as a place of custody of souls, in which angels are appointed as guardians to them, who distribute to them temporary punishments, agreeable to one's behavior and manners. In this region there is a certain place set apart as a lake of unquenchable fire, whereinto we suppose no one hath hitherto been cast; but it is prepared for a day afore determined by God, in which one righteous sentence shall be passed upon all men; when the unjust . . . . shall be adjudged to this everlasting punishment, as having been the causes of defilement; while the just shall obtain an incorruptible and never-fading kingdom. These are now confined in Hades, but not in the same place wherein the unjust are confined. For there is one descent into this region, at whose gate we believe there stands an Archangel with an host; which gate when these pass through that are conducted down by the angels appointed over souls, they do not go the same way; but the just are guided to the right hand, and are led with hymns, sung by the angels appointed over that place, unto a region of light, in which the just have dwelt from the beginning of the world, . . . where they wait for that rest and eternal new life in heaven which is to succeed this region. This place we call THE BOSOM OF ABRAHAM. But as to the unjust, they are dragged by force to the left hand by the angels allotted for punishment. . . . . Now these drag them into the neighborhood of hell itself. Who do not stand clear of the hot vapor itself, and in effect are punished thereby; and not only so, but where they SEE the place (or choir) of the FATHERS and of the just, even hereby are they punished; for a chaos deep and large is fixed between them; insomuch that a just man that hath compassion upon them cannot be admitted, nor can one that is unjust, if he were bold enough to attempt it, pass over it."

RESEMBLANCE.

Now no one can read this description of Hades by Josephus, and compare it with the parable under consideration, and not at once discover the similarity between the descriptions given of the state of the departed. Jesus employs the same terms with Josephus, concerning the condition and location of Lazarus and the rich man, thus: Josephus says, "The bosom of Abraham"; Christ, "Abraham's bosom." Josephus says: "A chaos deep and large is fixed between them; insomuch that a just man that hath compassion cannot be admitted, nor can one that is unjust, if he were bold enough to attempt it, pass over it"; Christ, "Between us and you there is a great gulf fixed; so that they which would pass hence to you cannot; neither can they pass to us that would come from thence." Josephus states: "They see the place (or choir) of the fathers," and of the just." Christ,—"The rich man died and seeth Abraham afar off." We might refer to other analogies between the parable and Josephus' description of hades, but these will suffice for our purpose. The matter is proved beyond refutation, that Jesus describes the state of the dead in that parable, as understood by the Pharisees. Their view is distinctly given. Therefore the conclusion, if Jesus teaches doctrine respecting the intermediate state in the parable, then he has taught us the doctrine held by the Pharisees of his time; and instructed us that "the place of the custody of souls" is "a place in the world not regularly finished; a subterraneous region, wherein the light of this world does not shine, where angels are appointed as guardians, who distribute temporary punishments, agreeable to one's behavior and manners."

Jesus was conversing with the Pharisees when he uttered the parable. He knew what their faith was; and the conclusion is inevitable that he taught the doctrine of the Pharisees, and has set his seal to it, if the design was to instruct us respecting the intermediate state of the just and unjust. Then forever let those, who contend that the souls of the righteous have been going to heaven above from the beginning of the world, abandon at once such faith, and become true Pharisees in faith and hope. You are bound to do this, if you would be honest and consistent. And if doctrine is taught respecting the departed wicked, their condition is most dreadful and afflicting; unsaved friends are in the torments of hell, wishing to communicate to the living the knowledge of their condition, that they come not to the same place of torment; and "just men that have compassion" are not allowed to go on this errand of mercy, nor to alleviate the sufferings of those they see in continual despair and agony! Horrible! And who will ascribe such doctrine to the compassionate Jesus? But from whence did the Pharisees obtain their doctrine of hades and its rewards and punishments? From heathen philosophers, who taught that "a suitable destiny hurls into tartarus the souls of the wicked; and that the spirits of just men are freed from hades and dwell in the upper parts of the earth."—Socrates. The heathen tartarus and hades are nearly the same with the Jewish place of custody for souls, the latter deriving their faith from heathen oracles. Hence we see the force of the Savior's admonition,—"Beware of the doctrine of the Pharisees."

O. R. FASSETT.

CONSCIENCES.—There are five kinds of consciences in the world. First, the ignorant conscience, which neither sees nor says any thing—neither beholds the sin in a soul, nor reproves it. Second, the flattering conscience, whose speech is worse than silence itself, which, though seeing sin, soothes men in the committing thereof. Third, the seared conscience, which has neither sight, speech, nor sense in men that are past feeling.—Fourth, a wounded conscience, frightened with sin. The last and best is a quiet and clear conscience, pacified in Christ Jesus. Of these, the fourth is incomparably better than the three former, so that a wise man would not take a world to change with them. Yes, a wounded conscience is rather painful than sinful—an affliction, not an offense—and is the ready way, at the next remove, to be turned into a quiet.—Fuller.

For the World's Crisis.

"WE ALL DO FADE AS A LEAF."

If we understand the Scriptures of truth and the signs of the times, the consummation of this world's history is near at hand. Therefore we should not set our affections too much upon earth. A contemplation of our own mortality ought to wean us from earth and fix our meditation upon things above, things of a heavenly nature. We ought not to esteem too highly the things which pertain to the mortal; but we ought to set our affections upon those things which pertain to our immortal existence. The reason for this is obvious. The mortal, and every thing pertaining to it, must "fade as a leaf." Why are we so worldly, so wrapped up in our mortal concerns, and so negligent of our immortal interests? This is not right. Let us awake. Let us not live for this world alone, but for that noble destiny which awaits us; and be ready at any time to be released from this world.

How many of us stand uncondemned by the great tribunal? How many of us do really recognize the fact that "we all do fade as a leaf," and feel ourselves humbled by it? How many of us love our religion and our place of worship as our chief joy? How many of us can say with the Psalmist, "If I forget thee, O Jerusalem, let my right hand forget her cunning, . . . let my tongue cleave to the roof of my mouth."

How many of us feel our dependence upon God, which we must feel if we have any thing like a just sense of our own frailty, of our own mortality? Alas! few can take these questions home and answer them as they should be answered. And yet we cannot look out of our windows, we cannot walk the streets of our little villages, we cannot look upon a leaf, but we are reminded of our frailty. All nature is at this moment declaring to us our mortality, and yet we are indifferent to its warnings. But we shall come to ourselves by and by. We shall hear the winds howl around us; we shall see the leaves as they fall before us; then we shall not walk in the midst of decay and be unmindful of our mortality. Lay us upon the bed of death, surround us with our weeping friends, fill our eyes with tears for past follies and neglects, wring our hearts with bitter anguish, and let the cold thoughts of death creep over us; and then we shall have come to ourselves; then we shall wish that we had thought of death before; then we shall regret that we have neglected these things so long. Our present neglect will sting our hearts bitterly.

Not so with those who have walked and lived and listened to the voice of the God of nature. Not so with those who have lived in view of the frailty of man, and have regulated themselves thereby. Let us then set our affections upon things above; let us never forget that we do fade as a leaf. All this is no fiction; it is not a work of imagination. In consideration of which, is it not high time for us to look about ourselves and prepare for a better world, where nothing shall fade, where nothing shall trouble us in giving sorrow or pain?

"Teach me the measure of my days,
Thou Maker of my frame!
I would survey life's narrow space,
And learn how frail I am.

A span is all that we can boast,
An inch or two of time;
Man is but vanity and dust,
In all his flow'r and prime.

May we forbid each carnal hope,
Our fond desires recal;
And give our mortal int'rest up,
And make our God our all."

Fisherville, N. H. J. ELKINS.

For the World's Crisis.

"THE POOR HAVE THE GOSPEL PREACHED TO THEM."

As the preaching of the gospel to the poor was offered as an evidence that Jesus was the Christ, this is the field in which I have prepared to labor. But owing to our long controversy on the subject of Chronology, I have for about twelve months been deprived of this privilege.

In returning to my labor among those who can claim the blessing of being "poor," we found a place where I am told they had some preaching before "the war," but since which time, if I am correctly informed, their only spiritual instruction has been that received through the agency of two so-called "mediums," which is a modification of the harsher or more unpopular term—"witch," by which they were known in the days of our fathers; or, if we may give the true scriptural term, they are persons "possessed with the devil."

One of them was a noted (as they term it) "trance medium," well known in Boston and other places among those through whom "the spirits of devils working miracles" (Rev. 16: 14) are heading up the full development of "that man of sin" "who opposeth and exalteth himself above all that is called God"; and though it is well known that as soon as the enemy of souls obtains the complete control over those so-called "mediums," they become the most abandoned characters on earth; we are happy to say that, either because they had not yet taken the "black veil" of his diabolic power, or for some other praiseworthy cause, these two at least exhibited the most open, honest willingness to know the truth as to the agency by which they had been enabled to perform such wonderful miracles; and on discovering the truth, they did not only exhibit a willingness to embrace the religion of Jesus, but became two of the most active aids in our meeting; indeed, at the first meeting that one of them attended after her conversion, she became the chief speaker in exhortation, prayer, and loud exclamations of "glory to God."

The other one (the genuineness of whose conversion no one doubts), has thrown open her doors to the people of God, saying, "Come in and worship with me, for my house shall be a house of prayer." We enjoyed the privilege of meeting in a religious assembly under her roof, and the first prayer-meeting after we left was appointed to be held there.

But as it is doubted whether one can be reclaimed who has thus been employed by the adversary of souls, through whom to "show great signs and wonders, insomuch that, if it were possible, they shall deceive the very elect," many will be watching for their halting. Therefore we hope they will have the prayers, the sympathy and encouragement of all who know them; for whether they stand or fall, it will require no ordinary effort on their part to obtain an entire release from the influence of that satanic power which had well nigh proven their everlasting ruin.

Having no churches (I mean houses) in which to preach, our meetings were held in school-houses and private dwellings, to which the people came flocking from every direction, some in sleighs drawn by horses, others in wood sleds drawn by oxen, while yet others would come wading through the snow about two feet deep. In speaking from Isaiah 8: 19, 20, I believe we satisfied all that we must either reject the Bible or cease to "seek unto them that have familiar spirits." Our meetings were continued day and evening. The first night our light was that of a large log fire burning in an old-fashioned fireplace.

At first my only aid, even in prayer meeting, was our zealous brother, John Perkins, and his whole-hearted companion, whose words flowed from the depth of the heart; and even those who came for sport could not withhold their tears from sympathy, and before we left we had not less than twelve who could by singing, prayer and exhortation aid in a prayer meeting. We hope they will continue them until much good shall be accomplished in the name of the Lord.

Notwithstanding the many disadvantages under which we labored, some ten or twelve, including both backsliders and new converts, came out and decided for Christ. Others asked an interest in the prayers of God's people. Others were melted down. A deep solemnity pervaded the entire congregation. Those who at first much annoyed our meetings were now found in tears, expressing an anxiety to become christians. But our time having expired, we could tarry no longer. Since they have commenced a prayer meeting, the history of the real good to be accomplished remains to be told at the appearing of Christ.

All the expense was borne by Bro. Perkins, one of the most liberal hearted christians I have ever known. Were all others only half as much so, there would be no necessity for encumbering ministers of the gospel with gold and silver, for in every christian's house they could find a home, as they did eighteen hundred years ago; and then they would find it as profitable to preach to the poor as to those who have thousands of money; and then ceasing to preach for money, the one only object would be the salvation of men.

WM. C. THURMAN.

WALK IN THE SPIRIT.

It requires very close living with God in order to walk in the light as he is in the light; in order to understand the leadings of his Spirit. The promise to us is: "When he, the Spirit of truth is come, he will guide you into all truth." But the Spirit speaks so gently, that, unless the soul is in a state of entire quietude it fails to understand. If there is, in any degree, an undue anxiety, carefulness or fearfulness, it brings confusion into the soul, which greatly impedes our spiritual progress. A person sitting for the purpose of having his photograph taken, understands that should he move so much as to turn his eye, a blur is brought upon the picture, which spoils the whole.

Just so in our spiritual life; while we look with a single eye, steadily to Jesus, he enstamps his own image upon us, but soon as we turn to look in another direction the work is spoiled. To regain our position, we must repent, have the knowledge of forgiveness, and have the blood anew applied which makes all clean within. Glory to Jesus! Then he puts his stamp upon us and we bear the image of the heavenly. The reason why so few walk in the clear light is because they allow so much indefiniteness in their experience. The falling into a slight error occasions a mist which prevents a perfect intercourse with God. It is of the utmost necessity at such a time to come directly to God for the light of the Spirit to show the course. It is unsafe to rest with a clear understanding of his will. The injunction of God's word is, "Be not unwise, but understanding what the will of the Lord is." He has also promised to lead us in a plain path. When we cease from our own works, depending alone upon the guidance of the Spirit, every step we take will be plain. Then will our efforts to advance the work of God become effectual. Our labor will not be as one who beateth the air.

It is when we cease from self, and wait for the Spirit to go before, preparing our way and impelling us forward, that we are permitted to feel that our labor is not in vain in the Lord. Five words spoken in the Spirit, will accomplish what scores of sermons fail to without its aid. Should the ministers of the gospel take this stand, should they never attempt to preach without the anointing of the Holy Ghost—should they never deliver a message to the people unless it was given them from above, there would then be such a fire kindled in our pulpits as we seldom see at the present day.

Should the members of the church take this stand, should they tarry before the throne for the baptism of the Spirit, and not go to the place of worship without it, we should oftener hear the cry: "Men and brethren, what shall we do to be saved?" It is the faith and power which the prophets and apostles had that is now required, to cause a shaking among the dry bones and awake the dead to life. A few already are awake to this truth and are earnestly asking after the old paths. Bless the Lord! Walking fully in the Spirit cannot fail to lead us back to apostolical religion from which will follow like manifestations of the power of God. My soul cries out:

"Shorten these delaying days,
And bring the promised hour."

We have enough preaching, exhorting and praying, but oh! not enough of the Spirit. The blessed word declares,—"It is not by might, nor by power, but by my Spirit, saith the Lord." O for the energy divine to be breathed upon the people!

"Oh, for that flame of living fire,
Which shone so bright in saints of old."

His grace is full and mighty now as when Elijah felt its power. It is coming! I hear its distant thunderings. Hallelujah! "As many as are led by the Spirit of God, they are the sons of God."—Earnest Christian.

For the World's Crisis

A SHORT SERMON.

"Teach me thy way, O Lord; I will walk in thy truth: unite my heart to fear thy name."—PSA. 86: 11.

In the verses previous to our text, the Psalmist, in a most magnificent manner, acknowledges the greatness of that blessed Being with whom we have to do, and in his language exalts him above all. When we meditate upon the being and dignity of the Supreme Ruler of the universe, we launch out into a boundless ocean, and are lost in wonder, love and praise. Let all the powers of your intellect take the utmost stretch of thought, meditate upon the boundless goodness and mercy of God to fallen man, and remember the ten thousand blessings he in mercy has conferred upon you, and all who have ever become his servants; and we, like the Psalmist, would be led to cry out, "Teach me thy way, O Lord." "I will walk in thy truth." "Unite my heart to fear thy name."

But we will consider briefly the three beautiful divisions in our text. First, the Psalmist asks his heavenly Father for the most important instruction that ever was sought by man; and thus shows his desire and willingness to be a humble pupil before the great Jehovah, who has said, "Ask, and ye shall receive;" and also, "He that lacks wisdom, let him ask of God, who giveth to all men liberally, and upbraideth not." Let us think deeply upon this subject, and make it one of the most important points in our daily prayers, that our Father would lead us by his Spirit, that we may be the true children of God, and heirs of the kingdom; and that we may have an abundance of that wisdom which is from above, and is pure, peaceable, gentle, easy to be entreated, and full of good works, sowing the fruit of righteousness wherever we are.

Second, "I will walk in thy truth." Here the Psalmist,—in connection with his fervent desire to be taught of God,—firmly resolves, that, under the influence of those heavenly instructions, he will walk in God's truth. This is a very safe and sure way for every child of God; first, to look to God for instruction, and then firmly promise the Lord that you will walk in the truth, trusting in his divine assistance. This would be in unison with the divine command, "Walk before me, and be thou perfect."

This brings fresh to my mind the affecting scenes passed through forty-three years ago, when it seemed to me a voice spake unto me, saying, "Go to yonder grove (after six months' deep conviction), and there dedicate yourself to the Lord, and firmly promise, in his strength, that you will never turn your back upon the cause of Christ; and the dear Savior will meet you there, and pardon your sins, and take you under his protecting care." And I was not disobedient to the heavenly message, but dropped all and went. There, on my knees, I pleaded with God, for Christ's sake, to forgive my sins; and at the same time I firmly covenanted with the Lord that I would, in his strength, walk in his truth all the days of my life; and, behold, the great blessing of sins forgiven came like a shower upon the thirsty earth, and my prayer was soon changed to praise and thanksgiving, and I was led to cry out with emphasis, Now the great Redeemer is my Savior beyond the grave. And it seems to me that the last, or third division of my text,—"Unite my heart to fear thy name,"—has been my prayer ever since I was converted in the spring of 1822.

Here I would ask the question, what is a profession of religion without the whole heart is in the work? and if we have been really converted to God, and his love is shed abroad in our hearts by the Holy Ghost, shall we not fear God with that filial fear, and have such love for this truth, and the cause of religion, that we shall dread the thought of doing wrong? and would it not be a supreme delight to do all we could to please God? It seems to me it would. If you had a near and dear friend, who had done every possible kindness to you, and conferred upon you thousands of blessings, would you not ever avoid offending that dear friend? Certainly you would.

And surely there can be no earthly friend who can bear any comparison with our heavenly Father, who giveth us all things richly to enjoy; and, as God is an inexhaustible fountain of goodness and mercy, and can supply all wants, therefore his friendship is of more value than the friendship of thousands of earthly friends, and justly deserves our most earnest seeking and highest regard. The dear Redeemer has bought all our love, our regard, and our devotion; and therefore let us dedicate ourselves, soul, body and spirit, to the Lord. Thus we may be his jewels when he comes to set up his everlasting kingdom on the earth. Amen. B. PERRARD.

BEAR AND FORBEAR.

If we would have our life move on smoothly, we must learn to bear and forbear. We must indulge the friend we love in the little peculiarities of saying and doing things which may be important to him, but of little moment to us. Like children we must suffer each one to build his house his own way, and not quarrel with him because he does not think our way the best. All usefulness and all comfort may be prevented by an unkind, a sour, a crabbed temper of mind—a mind that can bear with no difference of opinion or temperament.

A spirit of fault-finding, an unsatisfied temper, a constant irritability, little inequalities in the look, the temper or the manner; a brow cloudy and dissatisfied—your husband or your wife cannot tell why—will more than neutralize all the good you can do, and render life any thing but a blessing. It is in such gentle and quiet virtues as meekness and forbearance, that the happiness and usefulness of life consist, far more than brilliant eloquence, in splendid talent, or illustrious deeds, that shall send the name to future times. It is the bubbling spring which flows gently, the little rivulet which glides through the meadow, and which runs along day and night by the farm-house, that is useful, rather than the swollen flood or the roaring cataract. Niagara excites our wonder, and we stand amazed at the power and greatness of God there, as he "pours it from his hollow hand." But one Niagara is enough for a continent, or a world; while that same world needs thousands and tens of thousands of silver fountains and gentle flowing rivulets, which shall water every farm, and every meadow and every garden, and that shall flow on every day and every night with their gentle and quiet beauty. So with the acts of our lives.

It is not by great deeds only, like those of Howard—not by great sufferings only, like those of the martyrs—that good is to be done; it is by the daily and quiet virtues of life—the christian temper, the meek forbearance, the spirit of forgiveness in the husband, the wife, the father, the mother, the brother, the sister, the friend, the neighbor, that good is to be done; and in all this you may be useful.—Ex.

NEARING HOME.

Yes, we are nearing home. The long dark night of sorrow and trial is passing away,—the morning will soon dawn when the toil-worn and weary pilgrims will find rest—sweet rest, in the kingdom. As we near the harbor perils and dangers thicken around us.

The angry billows rise high, the dark waves foam and dash against our little bark, and threaten to overwhelm us. We sink for a moment beneath the dark waters, then we rise above the billows and, behold! Jesus is at the helm. How it cheers our hearts and revives our drooping spirits. With a firmer grasp we cling to the ship, knowing it will anchor safe on the other shore.

Then the reward will be given to the faithful; the richness and blessedness of which will far exceed any thing which could be bestowed on mortal man. A crown of glory more beautiful than ever decked a monarch's brow will be placed upon our heads. We shall be inhabitants of the new earth blooming in all its Eden beauty, pluck rich fruit from life's fair tree, and drink from the crystal river. There we shall greet the loved of earth, and never part again. O, blessed morn! With joy we hail thy bright beams. The Sun will soon arise.

The trials of earth are thickening around
The saints of God, that are homeward bound;
Tho' fall'n amid perils and dangers unseen,
On the arm of the Lord we confidingly lean.

He'll guide our frail bark o'er billows and foam,
And anchor us safe in our heavenly home;
Then cling to the ship, 'twill land us at last
Safe in the harbor, with all dangers past.

O, then, we'll be glad and rejoice in that day,
The enemy conquered, we'll join in the lay—
In the song of redemption, on that happy shore,
Where all the redeemed shall live evermore.

Our trials are ended, we've reached that blest shore,
Where the saints shall unite to be parted no more;
Then cling to the ship, 'mid billows and foam,
We'll anchor in safety, no longer to roam.

TO WHOM SHALL WE GO?

"Then Simon Peter answered him, Lord, to whom shall we go? thou hast the words of eternal life."—JOHN 6: 68.

This is the best possible reply we can make to every temptation to apostasy, from whatever quarter it may arise. Does infidelity tempt us to desert the standard of the cross, what has she to offer? Nothing but an awful blank to every christian hope; eternal sleep instead of eternal bliss, and annihilation instead of endless glory and happiness in the kingdom of God. Does the world tempt us to desert our Savior for its wealth, its splendor, or its joy? Alas! they are uncertain, unsubstantial; they pass away like a rising vapor or the fleeting clouds of summer.

Where, or to whom, then, can we go? Thou, Lord, and thou alone, hast the words of eternal life. Through him we can receive joys and pleasures that are lasting; obtain wealth where neither moth nor rust doth corrupt, nor thieves break through and steal; receive splendor and honor which the world cannot give; and, what is still better, it will endure forever.

Dear reader, have you found this Jesus to be precious to your soul? Then cling to him with such tenacity that it will be impossible for Satan to loosen your grasp. If you have not found him, seek him at once, while he may be found. CHAS. H. SWEET.

THE SEWING MACHINES AND DICTIONARIES.

"A Webster's Dictionary is something that I very much want, and I should be glad if I could make up a list of ten subscribers, so as to obtain it. But those who sympathize with our views are so few here, that I shall be unable to get the number required. The five which I have sent are all I can get."

"With a large family to support, and no dependence but my needle, a Sewing Machine would be a great help to us; and if there were more of our faith in this place, or more who look upon it with favor, I should go to work with some hope of securing it. If the requisite number (32) were not so large, I think I could, as it is; but I must be content for the present, to go without what I so much need."

We have received a number of letters like the above, and to put the Sewing Machine and the Webster's Dictionary within the reach of all who are thus situated, we make the following offer:—

For every $5.00, with five new subscribers, and $2.50 from each for one year, one copy of WEBSTER'S ($12.00) UNABRIDGED DICTIONARY.

For every $20.00 with sixteen new subscribers, and $2.50 from each for one year, one of GROVER & BAKER'S ($55.00) SEWING MACHINES.

This offer, with the other, extends only till the 1st of June. All names for the Dictionaries or Machines must be sent in before that date.

Valuable Premiums for New Subscribers!

SEWING MACHINES AND DICTIONARIES.

To every one who shall, any time before the 1st of June, send us, with the money, THIRTY-TWO NEW SUBSCRIBERS for One Year, ($2.50 each), or Sixty-four for Six Months, ($1.25 each), we will send, by express or rail, a

Grover & Baker's
($55) SEWING MACHINE,

one of the simplest, most durable, completest and best, (in our opinion the very best), in the market. A great labor-saving machine and blessing, in the family and work room; and a gift of priceless value, which you can now, with a little effort, present to your thankful wife, sister, mother or daughter.

FOR TEN NEW SUBSCRIBERS, with the money for One Year, or Twenty for Six months, one copy of

Webster's ($12)
UNABRIDGED DICTIONARY,

containing 10,000 words and meanings not found in other Dictionaries, over 3000 fine Engravings, and more matter than any other single volume in the world. Invaluable to every student, minister, or general reader.

YOUNG PILGRIM FOR MARCH 1ST.

I have just seen the Pilgrim for March 1st. I think it a model number, and trust all the numbers for the year ensuing will be of the same stamp. All our young friends who have not subscribed for it, should do so immediately, if they wish to secure many little gems of truth at very little expense. Come, children, and grown folks, too, send on your half dollars to the Young Pilgrim, Boston, Mass., and have it sent to your address for one year.

C. GOODRICH.

New Subscribers.

Some 800 new subscribers have been received in the few months past, besides the $200 from one brother for 570 subscribers, to be sent as he directs. This is a very encouraging increase, for which we feel thankful and rejoice.

Many Sunday schools, discontinued through the winter, will commence again soon. Will the friends of the Pilgrim and the young continue the effort, then, to enlarge its circulation and usefulness, by obtaining subscribers and forming clubs? They can commence with the 1st of April, if they prefer, or with January, and have the back numbers sent. Are we doing all we can to feed the lambs?

THE SCHOOL IN ST. LOUIS.

FROM BRO. LESLIE.

DEAR BRO. HERRON:—We arrived here last night at midnight, and this morning went to Sister Prescott's. Found there that Bro. Himes was in town, having arrived last evening from Memphis. I sought him, and met him in the street. Was glad to see him, I assure you. . . .

We have just returned from a visit to our Mission School here taught by Sister Curtis. She has about thirty scholars, and the number is gradually increasing. It is a very interesting school, and a field for great and increasing usefulness. I trust it will be sustained. Sr. Curtis appears to be an excellent teacher, her heart being fully in the work. Bro. Himes took us to the school, and, on leaving, made some very encouraging remarks to the little dark faces. Sr. Butler and myself also gave the little ones a few words of cheer. God bless the teacher and scholars.

I have learned many things of interest from Bro. Himes with regard to Memphis, and shall write to you as soon as I get there. The Lord is blessing us in getting through, and by his help we hope to arrive at our place of destination. Yours in the path of duty,

I. L. LESLIE.

CLOSE OF THE VOLUME.

It will be observed that this is the last number of the 22nd volume; hence the time has come to send the advance pay for the next year. The present state of things in the world makes "our paper" more valuable than ever as a medium of communication with each other, that we may comfort, exhort, and edify one another during the closing struggle that is just before us. For this reason we think every reader should try to get his neighbor to read his paper, if he will not subscribe for it. Let us spare no effort that can be put forth to awaken our fellow men to the fact that Jesus is coming soon to set up his kingdom. We hope to make "our paper" more interesting and profitable than ever, as we approach the great day of the Lord.

We wish to continue it to all the poor especially; and for this reason, we hope all our paying subscribers will send in the money now due the office for the next year. Let none stop their paper at this interesting period. If any cannot pay now, please drop us a line informing us whether you wish the paper continued, and we will do the best we can. We hope to be favored with a hearty welcome from all our former friends, while we continue our weekly visits. We shall try to make them profitable and pleasant. Pray for us, that we may have heavenly wisdom and aid to do all to the glory of God.

WASHINGTON.

Our late visit to Washington was one of much interest, and we trust it has resulted in positive good. The Lord afforded special help, and gave the truth favor with the people.

We arrived in the city in a rain storm, on Monday evening, Feb. 19th, and remained till Mar. 5th. We found a good home at Bro. Fisher's, who is employed in the Quartermaster's Department. It was through the influence of this Bro. and his family that a way was opened for our visit to the city.

Washington is well called a "city of magnificent distances." It is the opposite of Boston in this respect. The latter city is much crowded, having many narrow streets and lanes; while the former has wide streets, and an abundance of room. It is rather noted for mud in wet weather, and dust in the dry season. If it were not for the government buildings, there would be but little of special interest in the city. The Capitol, containing the Senate Chamber and the hall for the House of Representatives, Supreme Court room, etc., is a magnificent edifice, built of very nice marble. The Rotunda, with its towering dome, is said to surpass anything of the kind in the world. It is ornamented with elegant paintings, and the one upon the concave surface of the dome, when viewed from the floor of the Rotunda, would make one think of a company of angels flying through the heavens, because of the appearance of some of the figures in the picture, and their dizzy height. The whole structure is marble and iron. The sight of it awakens feelings of sublimity, as when one gazes on the mighty torrent of the Niagara. This is in architecture what that is in nature,—a sight unsurpassed.

The Senate Chamber is one hundred and twelve feet long, eighty-two feet wide, and thirty-six feet high. It is surrounded by a cushioned gallery, capable of seating one thousand persons. It has the best arrangement for lighting we have ever seen in any hall. None of the gas burners are in sight, and the light is very soft and agreeable.

The Representatives' Hall is larger than the Senate Chamber. Its gallery will hold fifteen hundred persons. The hall is a hundred and thirty-nine feet long, ninety-three feet wide, and thirty-six feet high. The two wings of the Capitol are not yet finished, but it is intended to complete them this year. The grounds about the Capitol will be very pleasant when the rubbish arising from building materials is removed, and the banks are put in order.

The Patent Office and the Post Office are large and elegant marble buildings. The Treasury Department, the President's House, the War and Navy Departments, are also large and costly structures.

The Washington Monument was begun with very large proportions, and extended upward a hundred and seventy feet, when the funds fell short. It reminds one of a person who undertook to build without counting the cost. It was purposed to carry it to an elevation of some five hundred feet. An effort is to be made to renew the work upon it.

The Museum at the Smithsonian Institute, the U. S. Army Museum, and the Observatory, present objects of much interest. The U. S. Army Museum contains a large number of the various parts of the human system taken from diseased and wounded soldiers. It is purposed to fit up Ford's Theatre building, where President Lincoln was assassinated, for the U. S. Museum. The theatre is now being remodeled for this purpose.

We took occasion to go over into Virginia and visit Gen. Lee's residence, on Arlington Heights, which has been taken by the government, and a portion of his large farm appropriated for a soldier's burying ground, which has been tastefully fitted up for this purpose. The General's mansion shows the fruits of four years' neglect. Not far from the soldiers' cemetery, we found a company of poor freedmen digging up horse bones, where army horses were buried. They were doing this for the purpose of selling them to get a little food. The work was very unpleasant, but they were driven by necessity to do this or starve. We had the pleasure of gladdening their hearts a little. We talked to them of the "blessed hope," and found them very willing to hear. We find no class of persons so anxious to hear about the coming of our Savior as the poor Freedmen. They have suffered greatly during the past winter, but, thank the Lord, the hour of deliverance is at hand, when slavery and sin will come to an end.

We had the pleasure of preaching once to the Freedmen in Campbell Hospital, under the care of Capt. E. G. Townsend, who is a warm friend of the Freedmen, and ready to point them to the Savior. There are some hundreds under his care. We enjoyed our visit with them very much. They had "ears to hear." Their singing was soul-stirring. We found among them some warm friends of Jesus. Here we found that noted colored woman, Sojourner Truth. She is in this hospital as a superintendent and counselor. Though about eighty years of age, she appears as sprightly as ever. Her excellent knowledge of human nature, energy of character, and strong faith in the Lord, enable her to render valuable aid to the Freedmen. We have heard no other one propose a plan so consistent and practicable for the disposition of the Freedmen as the one which she explained to us. Our visit with her was a rich feast.

Here we also met Sr. Laura S. Haviland, the founder of the "Haviland Home" for Freedmen. She is from Adrian, Mich., and is a traveling agent for the Freedmen's Bureau. She followed the Union army during the late war, and was as a mother to the wounded and suffering soldiers. She was among them what Howard, the noted philanthropist, was among the inmates of prisons—a great comforter. Her whole heart is in the work, and her highest object is to glorify the Lord in caring for the poor and suffering, wherever they may be found. Whoever sends gifts to her, may be sure they will be well applied. The same is true of gifts sent to Sr. Sojourner Truth.

Having said thus much about things in general, in Washington, we will now speak more definitely of its

MORAL CONDITION.

It is very evident that vital godliness is not very abundant in the city; and all christians with whom we conversed on the subject expressed the same opinion. This heart of the nation is very corrupt, being full of pride, covetousness, and licentiousness. We have not seen in any other city such extravagance in dress as we witnessed there. The very sight of it was disgusting to our sight, and we felt like turning away with abhorrence and contempt. And although this was in what the world considers the highest society, yet the want of modesty in the dress was as conspicuous as the extravagance. This is what might be expected. We very much prefer the society of New England, if we were to choose either in relation to morals or the general intelligence of the people. Theatres, and other places of amusement, are well patronized, while prayer meetings are left to languish. We heard of some interest in a Methodist mission, in a retired part of the city; but, generally speaking, religion is at a very low ebb. It seemed to us like a second Montreal; only we found this difference: in Montreal, the people were very bigoted; and at Washington, very indifferent about religious matters. Had we not felt assured that it was the Lord's will we should hold some meetings there, our faith would have failed at the beginning. At the first meeting, we had out some ten or twelve; but the numbers continued to increase, till our hall was filled with some five hundred attentive listeners, who manifested a most lively interest. We have rarely, if ever, spoken to a more intelligent audience. The Treasury, War, and Naval Departments were represented in almost every meeting; and besides these were several professional men, some of whom took an active part, either by asking questions or endorsing what we said.

There was considerable excitement when we exposed Spiritualism. Some prominent Spiritualists were present. One intelligent gentlemen, Dr. Wright, who had been a Spiritualist, and, as he said, had "been behind the curtain," stood up nobly in the defense of our position. His remarks were weighty and to the point. He testified to what he had seen and known of its immoral and infidel tendency. One man became so enraged in his opposition to us, that a policeman was called, who took him out of the hall. That aroused some others whose sympathy was with the Spiritualists, so that we had quite an exciting time,—some crying one thing, and some another; but the truth prevailed. We challenged the Spiritualists to come forward and defend their position, but none accepted. One was heard giving advice to a speaker who had some thoughts of accepting our challenge, and he urged him not to do it. Mrs. Daniels, formerly Mrs. Cora Hatch, the noted trance-speaking medium, a Mr. Foster, another noted speaker, were giving lectures in the city at the time we were there. They have a strong hold on many minds, but some had their eyes opened to see the infernal tendency of Spiritualism.

During our stay in the city we preached three times in Dr. Garnet's church. Our last meeting there was on Lord's day evening, March 4th. The house was filled with a very attentive audience. We spoke on "the coming kingdom," showing that "the kingdom of God is nigh at hand." We felt no fetters. When we got through, Dr. Garnet, the pastor of the church, made some excellent remarks, fully endorsing what we said, and expressed regret that we could not continue our meetings in the same place. He manifested a true christian spirit, and expressed his faith in the speedy coming of Jesus. He said he felt anxious to have his people hear more on the subject. We were sorry that we could not have remained another week, but other appointments prevented.

Thus closed up our meetings in W. We made some interesting acquaintances, whom we hope to see in the kingdom. We have left an open door for more preaching on the "blessed hope." A church of ten members was formed, and a prayer meeting established. We trust that some of the seed sown will yet spring up and bear fruit to the glory of God.

REVOLUTION.

The signs of the times indicate that we are very near a great revolution in political matters. Many close observing men are now well convinced that a revolution of no ordinary character is at hand. But the student of prophecy sees the same marked upon the prophetical chart, and that the next important event which is to follow the approaching revolution is the coming of Christ. To the true bride of the Lamb, the immediate second personal appearing of our Lord is becoming more and more like a reality. Her doubts are being all removed about the matter. The omens are so bright, that she now feels warranted to lift up her head and rejoice, knowing that her redemption draweth nigh. We are truly living in an hour of thrilling interest. The Lord is at hand, and soon the dead will be raised and the kingdom of God set up.

The Great Issue and the Great Danger before the Country.

'Revolution!' said Henry Clay on an important occasion before Congress, 'we are in the midst of a revolution.' The remark was not inapplicable in his day; but it is a thousand times more applicable to our present political situation."

Is it not high time for all the friends of Jesus to arise and trim their lamps, and prepare to meet him? Let it be remembered that those who have a "grudge . . . against another," must "be condemned;" and that those who have "hatred, variance," or "strife" in their hearts, "shall not inherit the kingdom of God." Those who expect to be "ready" to go in to "the marriage of the Lamb" should examine their hearts most critically, to see if there is any evil thing therein that unfits them to meet the Lord in peace. We should be all ready, like a dying man, who has settled up all his affairs with this world, being at peace with all mankind. Those who are prepared for translation when the Savior comes, must be "pure in heart." We have had timely warning, so that if we are not ready, we shall have no excuse. Dear reader, are you prepared to welcome Jesus?

FENIAN WAR.

The Fenian movement is advancing rapidly, assuming gigantic proportions. England begins to tremble at the sight, and has suspended the habeas corpus act, and commenced arresting Irishmen in earnest, with a view to putting an end to the Fenian operations; but we think she is making an effort to put out a fire that will only spread the more rapidly with her labors to extinguish it. The friends of Ireland appear to have engaged in the work of freeing the Erin Isle, with a determination that will not be easily overcome. And as it is a known fact that Napoleon is acting in harmony with the Fenians, it is evident England has come to a period in her history of no ordinary interest. Her chances of success now look small. It was said by a member of Parliament, that England had no friends among the nations of the earth. Not so with Ireland. She has much sympathy from other governments.

The following report of the doings in the House of Lords, Feb. 16th, shows the state of feeling in that body.

"In the House of Lords on the 16th, Earl Russell said: I have to direct your lordship's attention to the affairs of Ireland. The Lord Lieutenant, on the advice of the Lord Chancellor of Ireland, the Chief Secretary, and other persons, has expressed the opinion that it is absolutely necessary, considering the present state of the country, to suspend the Habeas Corpus act. Her Majesty's government have therefore resolved to make the proposal to suspend the act, and the Secretary of State for the Home Department will do so to-morrow in the other House of Parliament. When a similar motion was last made, the bill was introduced on a Saturday and passed through all its stages in the course of that day. Your lordships will doubtless agree that, if the necessity for such a course exists, no time should be lost; and I must therefore ask your lordships to put yourselves to the inconvenience of meeting to-morrow at 4 o'clock, when the matter shall be laid before you.

The Earl of Derby—The proposal made by the noble lord indicates a very serious state of affairs. Of course it will be for her Majesty's government to justify to this and the other House of Parliament the course proposed; and if the other House should be so satisfied of the gravity of the occasion—and no doubt they will have sufficient evidence laid before them—as shall induce them to consent to take so strong a step as suspending all the Standing Orders for the purpose of passing the suspension of the habeas corpus act, I am quite sure your lordships will be of the unanimous opinion that in such a state of affairs it would be neither expedient, desirable, nor consistent with your duty to interpose a moment's delay. Therefore, my lords, as far as I am concerned, if the House of Commons should think fit to suspend all their Standing Orders for the purpose of passing a bill which I presume it is the intention of the government to lay before them during the morning sitting of to-morrow I should offer no opposition to it (hear, hear,) when it is laid before your lordships in company with a statement from her Majesty's government, and backed up by the authority of the House of Commons. And when I say I should be prepared to assent to the passing of the bill under the circumstances, I trust we shall have at the earliest possible opportunity such a statement from her Majesty's government as will justify us in having passed so strong a measure as that proposed."

Last Lord's day, March 4th, the Fenians had a great gathering at Jones' Wood, near New York City. It is said there were from one hundred to one hundred and twenty thousand present. They had stirring speeches from four different stands. The leading sentiment of the speakers was in favor of immediate action. It is reported that one hundred thousand dollars were raised in twenty minutes at the meeting. It was stated that there are three hundred thousand men in Ireland now ready for action; and that they are officered by able men from the American army. One report says there are eight hundred thousand Fenians in the United States. There is some evidence that Fenianism may come in collision with the American government. Much trouble may yet arise to this country through Fenianism. When in Washington we listened to several speeches in Congress. Said Senator Wilson, of Mass., "We are fallen on sad times." Said Senator E. Cowan, of Pa., "The political omens bode the coming of no common events." Said a member of the House, —"Let the republics take warning from the fate of Julius Cæsar."

DISCUSSION.

We are to have a discussion with J. G. Fish, in Opera Hall, Springfield, Mass., commencing Monday evening, Mar. 19th, to continue five evenings.

SUBJECT:—"Resolved, That man has a spirit which exists after the death of the body in a conscious state, and communicates with the inhabitants of earth."

☞ Many thanks to the friends who have aided us in the Washington Mission. We have had reason to rejoice in what the Lord has done in that city. There is now an open door for the truth.

☞ More about Spiritualism next week.

LIFE SKETCHES.

A new edition has just been issued, and those who have subscribed and paid, will be supplied just as soon as it can be ascertained who have been supplied, and who have not. As some copies have been sent directly from Boston during Mrs. Mussey's absence, it may be difficult to tell the whole number who are yet unsupplied. Will not those who are expecting copies, whether paid for or not, please send their names immediately, and money if they have not already paid, and they shall receive the books by return mail. Price $1.00, postpaid.

Quite a number have received copies which are not yet paid for. Will they not send in the money immediately? Sr. Mussey needs every cent due her to pay for the present edition. Now who will send in their names and money, or the names of their friends, and thus enable Sr. M. to dispose of the whole edition at once, pay her bills, and pay her for her trouble in the past?

Those sending money now due, address Mrs. ABIGAIL MUSSEY, Crisis Box, Boston, Mass.

Those who wish for books, address E. P. Woodward, (Crisis Box), Boston, Mass.

THE REVIVAL IN NEW BEDFORD AND FAIR HAVEN.

BRO. GRANT:—The good work of revival, attended with reformation, is still onward in this city, and across the river in Fair Haven. It is truly soul-cheering to see the wonderful work of our great God. Last Sunday morning, at our love feast, there were over one hundred and twenty testimonies for Jesus, and many prayers, many of which witnesses have lately found the love of God. It was truly a feast of fat things to the friends of Jesus.

Men and women still inquire, Men and brethren, what shall we do? The meetings seem to be free from that excitement which sometimes attends protracted meetings. Notwithstanding these meetings have continued about eight weeks in succession, they have been characterized by harmony and love, love to God and love to man. No railing of others, who do not fully agree with us in all things as yet, although the straight, plain truth of God's word has been fearlessly proclaimed in the name and spirit of the Lord. Many brethren and sisters of other denominations have been led to investigate the glorious truths of Jesus' second coming nigh at the door, the sleep of the dead, resurrection to immortality, and eternal life in the new heavens and new earth. Many who knew not the Bible hope previous to these meetings, yet were trying to live for God, are now "rejoicing in hope," and expecting it will soon be consummated. The impression is settling in the minds of the people that we are very near the Judgment.

The interest is so great to hear the word of the Lord in Fair Haven, the brethren have hired Phœnix Hall, the largest in the place, which is well filled with anxious listeners to this last invitation to the marriage supper of the Lamb. Great solemnity rests on the people. All seem to be satisfied that something of vast moment is soon to transpire. God grant to speed on the work of salvation. Wake up! brethren and sisters; the Lord is certainly coming. We are almost there. Come, Lord Jesus.

MEETING AT BROCKPORT, N. Y.

The quarterly conference held in Brockport, N. Y., March 3d to 5th, was an excellent meeting. The ordained ministers present were Elds. C. W. Low, C. F. Sweet, C. B. Turner, P. A. Smith, and F. Burr. Unordained, Benoni Stevens, M. R. Miles, and H. H. Brown. There was a good attendance of brethren from abroad, and the Spirit of the Lord was present to bless us.

A tract fund was talked of for the purpose of supplying the preaching brethren with tracts to scatter where they go. As it would take some time to make a permanent arrangement of the matter, it was postponed till the annual meeting in June next, when it will be carried into effect. We want to raise $500 a year, at least, to supply the preaching brethren with tracts for free distribution, and we think it can be done.

In the meantime, the brethren are invited to contribute money to furnish tracts to the preacher until the annual meeting. Twenty-two dollars and seventy-five cents were handed in for this purpose, which, being placed in my hands, enabled me to order tracts from the A. C. P. S. at Boston for the following brethren, viz: Elds. C. W. Low, C. F. Sweet, C. H. Williams, J. W. Taylor of Pa., C. B. Turner, and F. Burr.

Eld. F. Burr was appointed to make the opening address at the annual meeting.

At the love feast, Sunday morning, sixty-eight spoke in one hour, giving their testimony as looking for the Lord. We had the use of the meeting-house now occupied by the Free Methodists, and we trust that Bible truth has made some advance in Brockport, as the result of the meeting.

OUR SPECIAL WORK AMONG THE FREEDMEN.

BRO. GRANT:—I see in the Crisis of Jan. 31st, under the head of "The religious condition of London," a reference to the education of the Freedmen. You will allow me to say a few words to the friends of missions and schools on this subject.

We all agree that it is our duty to proclaim the gospel of the kingdom among the Freedmen to the widest extent in our power. Being on the ground, and knowing the condition of the southern field by observation and actual experience, I will make a brief statement respecting the field open to us, as I view it.

I remark, first, that at this time we cannot enter any field in safety except where the U. S. armies are stationed. All other posts of the South are under influences that would make it dangerous for a Northern man, and especially an Adventist, to go.

Second, even where the army is stationed, Northern men are shut out of all the congregations of Freedmen who are connected with the Southern church. The door is open only among the Freedmen who have independent organizations in the South. Of these independent organizations the white preachers and teachers of the North have much control; and having no faith in the doctrine of the speedy coming of Christ, they naturally shut the door against us. The Freedmen cannot therefore be reached by us at all where the white teachers or preachers have influence over them, and they prejudice them against us.

Again, it is next to impossible to get up an independent meeting to preach to them a course of sermons, unless their preachers recommend it. The Freedmen who attend church are the only portion that we can reach at all. The many who hang about saloons and places of debauch we cannot reach, except by individual effort.

The only field open to us thus far is among those who know us, or to whom we are favorably recommended, as in St. Louis and elsewhere. There we were recommended to three societies—the African Methodist, Wesleyan Methodist, and Baptist. The first two received us with open arms, on the ground that we had come to help them to education, and supply their poor with garments, and that we had some good things to say to them on the coming and kingdom of Christ.

But the Baptist church did not receive us at all. Why? I do not believe there was a member in that large church that would not have received us with joy but for the pastor, who was from the North. He told his people we were Adventists, and he did not hitch with us. And so, although we were a month in that city, and enjoying a good state of things in the two Methodist churches, not one of the Baptists, to my knowledge, attended.

The missionary who comes South to preach to the Freedmen, will have to speak out of doors, when allowed to do so, or go into some church, as we did in St. Louis; or else hire a place of worship. To hire is very expensive. All the halls seem to be taken up, or nearly so; and what remain to be let are from $10 to $20 a night. This, with board at from $8 to $12 per week, would be an expensive business. A transient visit among the Freedmen would be of little good, as the white teachers, both Northern and Southern, would pervert our work among them as soon as we were gone.

We can do but little at best, but what we do should be done well. The best and only plan I have in mind now, is to fix on a central location in this southern field, say Memphis, if you please; here put up a cheap yet substantial house of worship, with rooms in the rear for the Mission family. In this house let worship be had regularly, with a Sabbath School for the Freedmen. In connection with this, let there be a day and evening school. The pupils of these will pay a dollar per month, to meet the expenses of the teachers. This will give a rallying point—a Mission House in this dark field, with a place for all work.

From this point we can send out teachers and preachers to towns and plantations as they may hereafter be opened to us, and thus we may spread the light and truth, in connection with education, which the Freedmen will pay for themselves.

A building can be put up, such as I have spoken of, and furnished, for less than $600, on leased land; and it can be done in four weeks, and fit for use. As one that "speaks from actual observation," I can see no way to do anything effectual in the South, unless it be in some such way as suggested above.

To the suggestion that "the government and various societies" will educate the Freedmen, and that we should preach the gospel to them, etc., I would say that those societies who educate the Freedmen, take special pains to supply them with preaching and Sabbath Schools, and place them beyond our influence. If we get access to the Freedmen, and faithfully preach the gospel to them, it will be because we take them under our care, and educate them to read and understand the word of God.

I have thrown out these thoughts, not to criticise or oppose the views of others, so much as to give the results of my observation on this important subject. I know the time is short. But on this account we should do all the more, and should occupy till the Master comes.

In conclusion, I will add that some of the benevolent societies contemplate entering upon the plan proposed above, in order to secure the results of their labors and contributions, otherwise they will lose much of what they have done.

Such a mission can be got up and sustained while we have need of missions to prepare a people for Christ's coming. Shall we do it? An enterprise like this would make us independent in the South; and it would do more to prove our sincerity, and spread light and truth on the coming kingdom than any other one act we could do.

From this point we could send out the teachers now waiting to enter the field, as doors open for them, and who would be supported by the Freedmen. These would carry a knowledge of letters and the word of God to the ignorant and benighted.

Let us all ask for wisdom from on high, and act in this matter as God shall direct us. Yours for the Freedmen,

JOSHUA V. HIMES.

GOD WORKS IN FALMOUTH.

BRO. GRANT:—Our meetings commenced in Falmouth, Feb. 16th, with preaching in the evening. The next morning, in our social meeting, two voluntarily arose and confessed their sins, asking prayers. They soon found Christ their Savior. The next day one other came to Christ and found mercy. Backsliders broke down before God and were healed. God has since worked gloriously day after day. Seven or eight have found Christ.—Many wanderers have returned. The work goes on mightily. Four more came out for prayer last evening. Brn. Goud, York and Walker are with us in the work. Blessed be God for his mercy to this people.

From Bro. E. A. Shaw.

BRO. GRANT:—I would call attention to Oregon, when ministering brethren are traveling in search of new fields of labor. I do not know of a single brother of like faith in the state, but presume there are. I have seen none since I emigrated in 1862. We were plundered by Indians and nearly starved on our way here, and are just beginning life anew. We live seven miles west of Portland, which is our address. I find considerable inquiry and often much interest, when telling of my hope and its reasons. Were I able to do it, I should take pleasure in ordering books and selling and distributing them, but at present am obliged to labor steadily for the maintenance of my family, having been laid up nearly a year by sickness, and buried two children, since I reached this coast. Our experience has been a hard one, but we look for a better—a heavenly country.

I feel assured a good laborer would meet with much success in this neighborhood. Any brother coming this way will be gratefully received and entertained by your brother in Christ,

ELISUR A. SHAW.

Portland, Oregon.

From Bro. A. Sims.

BRO. GRANT:—A few weeks ago the Crisis contained an account of a visit of Bro. Blain to Canada West; that a small church was organized in that section of country, and that God's work is going forward. The friends of truth will be happy to hear that the Bible doctrine of the destruction of the wicked and the near coming of Christ is gaining ground here as well as in the United States. But while we have cause for rejoicing in the advancement of the cause of truth and that God is blessing the means of grace to some by enlightening their minds and uniting their hearts to himself, we are called to mourn in another respect. A dark cloud has been spread over us. Death has entered our little church and carried off a leading member, Deacon Fairly Milne.

The loss which the church has sustained in its present feeble state, cannot be estimated. Bro. Milne was a consistent christian, and a man of energy and decision. When he saw the truth he embraced it, although by doing so he would bring upon himself the reproach of men. He was independent in mind; he thought for himself in religious matters, as well as in other things. He belonged to a Baptist church near this place, of which he was a deacon, prior to the time he embraced the doctrine of the entire mortality of man, and the destruction of the wicked. The church acted on his case, and expelled him, his wife, and two others, for receiving and holding the above doctrine.

Bro. Milne was aged forty-three years. The circumstances attending his death were painful to his dear family. Business called him away a distance of thirty-five miles on

THE SEWING MACHINES AND DICTIONARIES.

"A Webster's Dictionary is something that I very much want, and I should be glad if I could make up a list of ten subscribers, so as to obtain it. But those who sympathize with our views are so few here, that I shall be unable to get the number required. The five which I have sent are all I can get."

"With a large family to support, and no dependence but my needle, a Sewing Machine would be a great help to us; and if there were more of our faith in this place, or more who look upon it with favor, I should go to work with some hope of securing it. If the requisite number (32) were not so large, I think I could, as it is; but I must be content for the present to go without what I so much need."

We have received a number of letters like the above, and to put the Sewing Machine and the Webster's Dictionary within the reach of all who are thus situated, we make the following offer:—

For every $5.00, with five new subscribers, and $2.50 from each for one year, one copy of WEBSTER'S ($12.00) UNABRIDGED DICTIONARY.

For every $20.00 with sixteen new subscribers, and $2.50 from each for one year, one of GROVER & BAKER'S ($55.00) SEWING MACHINES.

This offer, with the other, extends only till the 1st of June. All names for the Dictionaries or Machines must be sent in before that date.

one of the simplest, most durable, completest and best, (in our opinion the very best), in the market. A great labor-saving machine and blessing, in the family and work room; and a gift of priceless value, which you can now, with a little effort, present to your thankful wife, sister, mother or daughter.

FOR TEN NEW SUBSCRIBERS, with the money for One Year, or Twenty for Six months, one copy of

Webster's ($12)

UNABRIDGED DICTIONARY,

containing 10,000 words and meanings not found in other Dictionaries, over 3000 fine Engravings, and more matter than any other single volume in the world. Invaluable to every student, minister, or general reader.

FOR THREE NEW SUBSCRIBERS, with the money for One Year, or Six for Six Months, one copy, postpaid, of

or a Bible Dictionary; either and both of which are indispensable helps in the study of the Scriptures.

The names and monies can be sent in as fast as they are obtained, and when the full number is received, the Gift will be forwarded.

Come, brethren, a general rally from Maine to California! The Judge is at the door; and, with these gifts in view, and the greater reward yet to be given to all who do what they can to prepare a people for his coming, let us every one see what we can do.

YOUNG PILGRIM FOR MARCH 1ST.

I have just seen the Pilgrim for March 1st. I think it a model number, and trust all the numbers for the year ensuing will be of the same stamp. All our young friends who have not subscribed for it, should do so immediately, if they wish to secure many little gems of truth at very little expense. Come, children, and grown folks, too, send on your half dollars to the Young Pilgrim, Boston, Mass., and have it sent to your address for one year.

C. GOODRICH.

New Subscribers.

Some 800 new subscribers have been received in the few months past, besides the $200 from one brother for 570 subscribers, to be sent as he directs. This is a very encouraging increase, for which we feel thankful and rejoice.

Many Sunday schools, discontinued through the winter, will commence again soon. Will the friends of the Pilgrim and the young continue the effort, then, to enlarge its circulation and usefulness, by obtaining subscribers and forming clubs? They can commence with the 1st of April, if they prefer, or with January, and have the back numbers sent. Are we doing all we can to feed the lambs?

WILLIAM B. HERRON, Editor.

THE SCHOOL IN ST. LOUIS.

FROM BRO. LESLIE.

DEAR BRO. HERRON:—We arrived here last night at midnight, and this morning went to Sister Prescott's. Found there that Bro. Himes was in town, having arrived last evening from Memphis. I sought him, and met him in the street. Was glad to see him, I assure you. . . .

We have just returned from a visit to our Mission School here taught by Sister Curtis. She has about thirty scholars, and the number is gradually increasing. It is a very interesting school, and a field for great and increasing usefulness. I trust it will be sustained. Sr. Curtis appears to be an excellent teacher, her heart being fully in the work. Bro. Himes took us to the school, and, on leaving, made some very encouraging remarks to the little dark faces. Sr. Butler and myself also gave the little ones a few words of cheer. God bless the teacher and scholars.

I have learned many things of interest from Bro. Himes with regard to Memphis, and shall write to you as soon as I get there. The Lord is blessing us in getting through, and by his help we hope to arrive at our place of destination. Yours in the path of duty,

I. L. LESLIE.

The World's Crisis AND SECOND ADVENT MESSENGER.

Boston, Wednesday, March 14, 1866.

☞ Take Notice!

All subscriptions for the Crisis are payable in ADVANCE, at the rate of $2.50 a year; but if delayed six months beyond the time of payment, the price is $3.00 a year. Thus 50 cents a year is saved by paying in advance.

☞ Please Remember!

All remittances to this office, in the form of drafts, bank-checks and postal-money orders, should be made payable to the BUSINESS AGENT, GEO. T. ADAMS.

CLOSE OF THE VOLUME.

It will be observed that this is the last number of the 22nd volume; hence the time has come to send the advance pay for the next year. The present state of things in the world makes "our paper" more valuable than ever as a medium of communication with each other, that we may comfort, exhort, and edify one another during the closing struggle that is just before us. For this reason we think every reader should try to get his neighbor to read his paper, if he will not subscribe for it. Let us spare no effort that can be put forth to awaken our fellow men to the fact that Jesus is coming soon to set up his kingdom. We hope to make "our paper" more interesting and profitable than ever, as we approach the great day of the Lord.

We wish to continue it to all the poor especially; and for this reason, we hope all our paying subscribers will send in the money now due the office for the next year. Let none stop their paper at this interesting period. If any cannot pay now, please drop us a line informing us whether you wish the paper continued, and we will do the best we can. We hope to be favored with a hearty welcome from all our former friends, while we continue our weekly visits. We shall try to make them profitable and pleasant. Pray for us, that we may have heavenly wisdom and aid to do all to the glory of God.

WASHINGTON.

Our late visit to Washington was one of much interest, and we trust it has resulted in positive good. The Lord afforded special help, and gave the truth favor with the people.

We arrived in the city in a rain storm, on Monday evening, Feb. 19th, and remained till Mar. 5th. We found a good home at Bro. Fisher's, who is employed in the Quartermaster's Department. It was through the influence of this Bro. and his family that a way was opened for our visit to the city.

Washington is well called a "city of magnificent distances." It is the opposite of Boston in this respect. The latter city is much crowded, having many narrow streets and lanes; while the former has wide streets, and an abundance of room. It is rather noted for mud in wet weather, and dust in the dry season. If it were not for the government buildings, there would be but little of special interest in the city. The Capitol, containing the Senate Chamber and the hall for the House of Representatives, Supreme Court room, etc., is a magnificent edifice, built of very nice marble. The Rotunda, with its towering dome, is said to surpass anything of the kind in the world. It is ornamented with elegant paintings, and the one upon the concave surface of the dome, when viewed from the floor of the Rotunda, would make one think of a company of angels flying through the heavens, because of the appearance of some of the figures in the picture, and their dizzy height. The whole structure is marble and iron. The sight of it awakens feelings of sublimity, as when one gazes on the mighty torrent of the Niagara. This is in architecture what that is in nature,—a sight unsurpassed.

The Senate Chamber is one hundred and twelve feet long, eighty-two feet wide, and thirty-six feet high. It is surrounded by a cushioned gallery, capable of seating one thousand persons. It has the best arrangement for lighting we have ever seen in any hall. None of the gas burners are in sight, and the light is very soft and agreeable.

The Representatives' Hall is larger than the Senate Chamber. Its gallery will hold fifteen hundred persons. The hall is a hundred and thirty-nine feet long, ninety-three feet wide, and thirty-six feet high. The two wings of the Capitol are not yet finished, but it is intended to complete them this year. The grounds about the Capitol will be very pleasant when the rubbish arising from building materials is removed, and the banks are put in order.

The Patent Office and the Post Office are large and elegant marble buildings. The Treasury Department, the President's House, the War and Navy Departments, are also large and costly structures.

The Washington Monument was begun with very large proportions, and extended upward a hundred and seventy feet, when the funds fell short. It reminds one of a person who undertook to build without counting the cost. It was purposed to carry it to an elevation of some five hundred feet. An effort is to be made to renew the work upon it.

The Museum at the Smithsonian Institute, the U. S. Army Museum, and the Observatory, present objects of much interest. The U. S. Army Museum contains a large number of the various parts of the human system taken from diseased and wounded soldiers. It is purposed to fit up Ford's Theatre building, where President Lincoln was assassinated, for the U. S. Museum. The theatre is now being remodeled for this purpose.

We took occasion to go over into Virginia and visit Gen. Lee's residence, on Arlington Heights, which has been taken by the government, and a portion of his large farm appropriated for a soldier's burying ground, which has been tastefully fitted up for this purpose. The General's mansion shows the fruits of four years' neglect. Not far from the soldiers' cemetery, we found a company of poor freedmen digging up horse bones, where army horses were buried. They were doing this for the purpose of selling them to get a little food. The work was very unpleasant, but they were driven by necessity to do this or starve. We had the pleasure of gladdening their hearts a little. We talked to them of the "blessed hope," and found them very willing to hear. We find no class of persons so anxious to hear about the coming of our Savior as the poor Freedmen. They have suffered greatly during the past winter, but, thank the Lord, the hour of deliverance is at hand, when slavery and sin will come to an end.

We had the pleasure of preaching once to the Freedmen in Campbell Hospital, under the care of Capt. E. G. Townsend, who is a warm friend of the Freedmen, and ready to point them to the Savior. There are some hundreds under his care. We enjoyed our visit with them very much. They had "ears to hear." Their singing was soul-stirring. We found among them some warm friends of Jesus. Here we found that noted colored woman, Sojourner Truth. She is in this hospital as a superintendent and counselor. Though about eighty years of age, she appears as sprightly as ever. Her excellent knowledge of human nature, energy of character, and strong faith in the Lord, enable her to render valuable aid to the Freedmen. We have heard no other one propose a plan so consistent and practicable for the disposition of the Freedmen as the one which she explained to us. Our visit with her was a rich feast.

Here we also met Sr. Laura S. Haviland, the founder of the "Haviland Home" for Freedmen. She is from Adrian, Mich., and is a traveling agent for the Freedmen's Bureau. She followed the Union army during the late war, and was as a mother to the wounded and suffering soldiers. She was among them what Howard, the noted philanthropist, was among the inmates of prisons—a great comforter. Her whole heart is in the work, and her highest object is to glorify the Lord in caring for the poor and suffering, wherever they may be found. Whoever sends gifts to her, may be sure they will be well applied. The same is true of gifts sent to Sr. Sojourner Truth.

Having said thus much about things in general, in Washington, we will now speak more definitely of its

MORAL CONDITION.

It is very evident that vital godliness is not very abundant in the city; and all christians with whom we conversed on the subject expressed the same opinion. This heart of the nation is very corrupt, being full of pride, covetousness, and licentiousness. We have not seen in any other city such extravagance in dress as we witnessed there. The very sight of it was disgusting to our sight, and we felt like turning away with abhorrence and contempt. And although this was in what the world considers the highest society, yet the want of modesty in the dress was as conspicuous as the extravagance. This is what might be expected. We very much prefer the society of New England, if we were to choose either in relation to morals or the general intelligence of the people. Theatres, and other places of amusement, are well patronized, while prayer meetings are left to languish. We heard of some interest in a Methodist mission, in a retired part of the city; but, generally speaking, religion is at a very low ebb. It seemed to us like a second Montreal; only we found this difference: in Montreal, the people were very bigoted, and at Washington, very indifferent about religious matters. Had we not felt assured that it was the Lord's will we should hold some meetings there, our faith would have failed at the beginning. At the first meeting, we had out some ten or twelve; but the numbers continued to increase, till our hall was filled with some five hundred attentive listeners, who manifested a most lively interest. We have rarely, if ever, spoken to a more intelligent audience. The Treasury, War, and Naval Departments were represented in almost every meeting; and besides these were several professional men, some of whom took an active part, either by asking questions or endorsing what we said.

There was considerable excitement when we exposed Spiritualism. Some prominent Spiritualists were present. One intelligent gentlemen, Dr. Wright, who had been a Spiritualist, and, as he said, had "been behind the curtain," stood up nobly in the defense of our position. His remarks were weighty and to the point. He testified to what he had seen and known of its immoral and infidel tendency. One man became so enraged in his opposition to us, that a policeman was called, who took him out of the hall. That aroused some others whose sympathy was with the Spiritualists, so that we had quite an exciting time,—some crying one thing, and some another; but the truth prevailed. We challenged the Spiritualists to come forward and defend their position, but none accepted. One was heard giving advice to a speaker who had some thoughts of accepting our challenge, and he urged him not to do it. Mrs. Daniels, formerly Mrs. Cora Hatch, the noted trance-speaking medium, a Mr. Foster, another noted speaker, were giving lectures in the city at the time we were there. They have a strong hold on many minds, but some had their eyes opened to see the infernal tendency of Spiritualism.

During our stay in the city we preached three times in Dr. Garnet's church. Our last meeting there was on Lord's day evening, March 4th. The house was filled with a very attentive audience. We spoke on "the coming kingdom," showing that "the kingdom of God is nigh at hand." We felt the freedom. When we got through, Dr. Garnet, the pastor of the church, made some excellent remarks, fully endorsing what we said, and expressed regret that we could not continue our meetings in the same place. He manifested a true christian spirit, and expressed his faith in the speedy coming of Jesus. He said he felt anxious to have his people hear more on the subject. We were sorry that we could not have remained another week, but other appointments prevented.

Thus closed up our meetings in W. We made some interesting acquaintances, whom we hope to see in the kingdom. We have left an open door for more preaching on the "blessed hope." A church of ten members was formed, and a prayer meeting established. We trust that some of the seed sown will yet spring up and bear fruit to the glory of God.

REVOLUTION.

The signs of the times indicate that we are very near a great revolution in political matters. Many close observing men are now well convinced that a revolution of no ordinary character is at hand. But the student of prophecy sees the same marked upon the prophetical chart, and that the next important event which is to follow the approaching revolution is the coming of Christ. To the true bride of the Lamb, the immediate second personal appearing of our Lord is becoming more and more like a reality. Her doubts are being all removed about the matter. The omens are so bright, that she now feels warranted to lift up her head and rejoice, knowing that her redemption draweth nigh. We are truly living in an hour of thrilling interest. The Lord is at hand, and soon the dead will be raised and the kingdom of God set up.

The Great Issue and the Great Danger before the Country.

'Revolution!' said Henry Clay on an important occasion before Congress, 'we are in the midst of a revolution.' The remark was not inapplicable in his day; but it is a thousand times more applicable to our present political situation."

Is it not high time for all the friends of Jesus to arise and trim their lamps, and prepare to meet him? Let it be remembered that those who have a "grudge . . . against another," must "be condemned;" and that those who have "hatred, variance," or "strife" in their hearts, "shall not inherit the kingdom of God." Those who expect to be "ready" to go in to "the marriage of the Lamb" should examine their hearts most critically, to see if there is any evil thing therein that unfits them to meet the Lord in peace. We should be all ready, like a dying man, who has settled up all his affairs with this world, being at peace with all mankind. Those who are prepared for translation when the Savior comes, must be "pure in heart." We have had timely warning, so that if we are not ready, we shall have no excuse. Dear reader, are you prepared to welcome Jesus?

FENIAN WAR.

The Fenian movement is advancing rapidly, assuming gigantic proportions. England begins to tremble at the sight, and has suspended the habeas corpus act, and commenced arresting Irishmen in earnest, with a view to putting an end to the Fenian operations; but we think she is making an effort to put out a fire that will only spread the more rapidly with her labors to extinguish it. The friends of Ireland appear to have engaged in the work of freeing the Erin Isle, with a determination that will not be easily overcome. And as it is a known fact that Napoleon is acting in harmony with the Fenians, it is evident England has come to a period in her history of no ordinary interest. Her chances of success now look small. It was said by a member of Parliament, that England had no friends among the nations of the earth. Not so with Ireland. She has much sympathy from other governments.

The following report of the doings in the House of Lords, Feb. 16th, shows the state of feeling in that body.

"In the House of Lords on the 16th, Earl Russell said: I have to direct your lordship's attention to the affairs of Ireland. The Lord Lieutenant, on the advice of the Lord Chancellor of Ireland, the Chief Secretary, and other persons, has expressed the opinion that it is absolutely necessary, considering the present state of the country, to suspend the Habeas Corpus act. Her Majesty's government have therefore resolved to make the proposal to suspend the act, and the Secretary of State for the Home Department will do so to-morrow in the other House of Parliament. When a similar motion was last made, the bill was introduced on a Saturday and passed through all its stages in the course of that day. Your lordships will doubtless agree that, if the necessity for such a course exists, no time should be lost; and I must therefore ask your lordships to put yourselves to the inconvenience of meeting to-morrow at 4 o'clock, when the matter shall be laid before you.

The Earl of Derby—The proposal made by the noble lord indicates a very serious state of affairs. Of course it will be for her Majesty's government to justify to this and the other House of Parliament the course proposed; and if the other House should be so satisfied of the gravity of the occasion—and no doubt they will have sufficient evidence laid before them—as shall induce them to consent to take so strong a step as suspending all the Standing Orders for the purpose of passing the suspension of the habeas corpus act, I am quite sure your lordships will be of the unanimous opinion that in such a state of affairs it would be neither expedient, desirable, nor consistent with your duty to interpose a moment's delay. Therefore, my lords, as far as I am concerned, if the House of Commons should think fit to suspend all their Standing Orders for the purpose of passing a bill which I presume it is the intention of the government to lay before them during the morning sitting of to-morrow I should offer no opposition to it (hear, hear,) when it is laid before your lordships in company with a statement from her Majesty's government, and backed up by the authority of the House of Commons. And when I say I should be prepared to assent to the passing of the bill under the circumstances, I trust we shall have at the earliest possible opportunity such a statement from her Majesty's government as will justify us in having passed so strong a measure as that proposed."

Last Sunday, March 4th, the Fenians had a great gathering at Jones' Wood, near New York City. It is said there were from one hundred to one hundred and twenty thousand present. They had stirring speeches from four different stands. The leading sentiment of the speakers was in favor of immediate action. It is reported that one hundred thousand dollars were raised in twenty minutes at the meeting. It was stated that there are three hundred thousand men in Ireland now ready for action, and that they are officered by able men from the American army. One report says there are eight hundred thousand Fenians in the United States. There is some evidence that Fenianism may come in collision with the American government. Much trouble may yet arise to this country through Fenianism. When in Washington we listened to several speeches in Congress. Said Senator Wilson, of Mass., "We are fallen on sad times." Said Senator E. Cowan, of Pa., "The political omens bode the coming of no common events." Said a member of the House, —"Let the republics take warning from the fate of Julius Cæsar."

DISCUSSION.

We are to have a discussion with J. G. Fish, in Opera Hall, Springfield, Mass., commencing Monday evening, Mar. 19th, to continue five evenings.

SUBJECT:—"Resolved, That man has a spirit which exists after the death of the body in a conscious state, and communicates with the inhabitants of earth."

☞ Many thanks to the friends who have aided us in the Washington Mission. We have had reason to rejoice in what the Lord has done in that city. There is now an open door for the truth.

☞ More about Spiritualism next week.

LIFE SKETCHES.

A new edition has just been issued, and those who have subscribed and paid, will be supplied just as soon as it can be ascertained who have been supplied, and who have not. As some copies have been sent directly from Boston during Mrs. Mussey's absence, it may be difficult to tell the whole number who are yet unsupplied. Will not those who are expecting copies, whether paid for or not, please send their names immediately, and money if they have not already paid, and they shall receive the books by return mail. Price $1 00, postpaid.

Quite a number have received copies which are not yet paid for. Will they not send in the money immediately? Sr. Mussey needs every cent due her to pay for the present edition. Now who will send in their names and money, or the names of their friends, and thus enable Sr. M. to dispose of the whole edition at once, pay her bills, and pay her for her trouble in the past?

Those sending money now due, address Mrs. ABIGAIL MUSSEY, Crisis Box, Boston, Mass.

Those who wish for books, address E. P. Woodward, (Crisis Box), Boston, Mass.

THE REVIVAL IN NEW BEDFORD AND FAIR HAVEN.

BRO. GRANT:—The good work of revival, attended with reformation, is still onward in this city, and across the river in Fair Haven. It is truly soul-cheering to see the wonderful work of our great God. Last Sunday morning, at our love feast, there were over one hundred and twenty testimonies for Jesus, and many prayers, many of which witnesses have lately found the love of God. It was truly a feast of fat things to the friends of Jesus.

Men and women still inquire, Men and brethren, what shall we do? The meetings seem to be free from that excitement which sometimes attends protracted meetings. Notwithstanding these meetings have continued about eight weeks in succession, they have been characterized by harmony and love, love to God and love to man. No railing of others, who do not fully agree with us in all things as yet, although the straight, plain truth of God's word has been fearlessly proclaimed in the name and spirit of the Lord. Many brethren and sisters of other denominations have been led to investigate the glorious truths of Jesus' second coming nigh at the door, the sleep of the dead, resurrection to immortality, and eternal life in the new heavens and new earth. Many who knew not the Bible hope previous to these meetings, yet were trying to live for God, are now "rejoicing in hope," and expecting it will soon be consummated. The impression is settling in the minds of the people that we are very near the Judgment.

The interest is so great to hear the word of the Lord in Fair Haven, the brethren have hired Phœnix Hall, the largest in the place, which is well filled with anxious listeners to this last invitation to the marriage supper of the Lamb. Great solemnity rests on the people. All seem to be satisfied that something of vast moment is soon to transpire. God grant to speed on the work of salvation. Wake up! brethren and sisters; the Lord is certainly coming. We are almost there. Come, Lord Jesus.

MEETING AT BROCKPORT, N. Y.

The quarterly conference held in Brockport, N. Y., March 3d to 5th, was an excellent meeting. The ordained ministers present were Elds. C. W. Low, C. F. Sweat, C. B. Turner, P. A. Smith, and F. Burr. Unordained, Benoni Stevens, M. R. Miles, and H. H. Brown. There was a good attendance of brethren from abroad, and the Spirit of the Lord was present to bless us.

A tract fund was talked of for the purpose of supplying the preaching brethren with tracts to scatter where they go. As it would take some time to make a permanent arrangement of the matter, it was postponed till the annual meeting in June next, when it will be carried into effect. We want to raise $500 a year, at least, to supply the preaching brethren with tracts for free distribution, and we think it can be done.

In the meantime, the brethren are invited to contribute money to furnish tracts to the preacher until the annual meeting. Twenty-two dollars and seventy-five cents were handed in for this purpose, which, being placed in my hands, enabled me to order tracts from the A. C. P. S. at Boston for the following brethren, viz: Elds. C. W. Low, C. F. Sweat, C. H. Williams, J. W. Taylor of Pa., C. B. Turner, and F. Burr.

Eld. F. Burr was appointed to make the opening address at the annual meeting.

At the love feast, Sunday morning, sixty-eight spoke in one hour, giving their testimony as looking for the Lord. We had the use of the meeting-house now occupied by the Free Methodists, and we trust that Bible truth has made some advance in Brockport, as the result of the meeting.

OUR SPECIAL WORK AMONG THE FREEDMEN.

BRO. GRANT:—I see in the Crisis of Jan. 31st, under the head of "The religious condition of London," a reference to the education of the Freedmen. You will allow me to say a few words to the friends of missions and schools on this subject.

We all agree that it is our duty to proclaim the gospel of the kingdom among the Freedmen to the widest extent in our power. Being on the ground, and knowing the condition of the southern field by observation and actual experience, I will make a brief statement respecting the field open to us, as I view it.

I remark, first, that at this time we cannot enter any field in safety except where the U. S. armies are stationed. All other posts of the South are under influences that would make it dangerous for a Northern man, and especially an Adventist, to go.

Second, even where the army is stationed, Northern men are shut out of all the congregations of Freedmen who are connected with the Southern church. The door is open only among the Freedmen who have independent organizations in the South. Of these independent organizations the white preachers and teachers of the North have much control; and having no faith in the doctrine of the speedy coming of Christ, they naturally shut the door against us. The Freedmen cannot therefore be reached by us at all where the white teachers or preachers have influence over them, and they prejudice them against us.

Again, it is next to impossible to get up an independent meeting to preach to them a course of sermons, unless their preachers recommend it. The Freedmen who attend church are the only portion that we can reach at all. The many who hang about saloons and places of debauch we cannot reach, except by individual effort.

The only field open to us thus far is among those who know us, or to whom we are favorably recommended, as in St. Louis and elsewhere. There we were recommended to three societies—the African Methodist, Wesleyan Methodist, and Baptist. The first two received us with open arms, on the ground that we had come to help them to education, and supply their poor with garments, and that we had some good things to say to them on the coming and kingdom of Christ.

But the Baptist church did not receive us at all. Why? I do not believe there was a member in that large church that would not have received us with joy but for the pastor, who was from the North. He told his people we were Adventists, and he did not hitch with us. And so, although we were a month in that city, and enjoying a good state of things in the two Methodist churches, not one of the Baptists, to my knowledge, attended.

The missionary who comes South to preach to the Freedmen, will have to speak out of doors, when allowed to do so, or go into some church, as we did in St. Louis; or else hire a place of worship. To hire is very expensive. All the halls seem to be taken up, or nearly so; and what remain to be let are from $10 to $20 a night. This, with board at from $8 to $12 per week, would be an expensive business. A transient visit among the Freedmen would be of little good, as the white teachers, both Northern and Southern, would pervert our work among them as soon as we were gone.

We can do but little at best, but what we do should be done well. The best and only plan I have in mind now, is to fix on a central location in this southern field, say Memphis, if you please; here put up a cheap yet substantial house of worship, with rooms in the rear for the Mission family. In this house let worship be had regularly, with a Sabbath School for the Freedmen. In connection with this, let there be a day and evening school. The pupils of these will pay a dollar per month, to meet the expenses of the teachers. This will give a rallying point—a Mission House in this dark field, with a place for all work.

From this point we can send out teachers and preachers to towns and plantations as they may hereafter be opened to us, and thus we may spread the light and truth, in connection with education, which the Freedmen will pay for themselves.

A building can be put up, such as I have spoken of, and furnished, for less than $600, on leased land; and it can be done in four weeks, and fit for use. As one that "speaks from actual observation," I can see no way to do anything effectual in the South, unless it be in some such way as suggested above.

To the suggestion that "the government and various societies" will educate the Freedmen, and that we should preach the gospel to them, etc., I would say that those societies who educate the Freedmen, take special pains to supply them with preaching and Sabbath Schools, and place them beyond our influence. If we get access to the Freedmen, and faithfully preach the gospel to them, it will be because we take them under our care, and educate them to read and understand the word of God.

I have thrown out these thoughts, not to criticise or oppose the views of others, so much as to give the results of my observation on this important subject. I know the time is short. But on this account we should do all the more, and should occupy till the Master comes.

In conclusion, I will add that some of the benevolent societies contemplate entering upon the plan proposed above, in order to secure the results of their labors and contributions; otherwise they will lose much of what they have done.

Such a mission can be got up and sustained while we have need of missions to prepare a people for Christ's coming. Shall we do it? An enterprise like this would make us independent in the South; and it would do more to prove our sincerity, and spread light and truth on the coming kingdom than any other one act we could do.

From this point we could send out the teachers now waiting to enter the field, as doors open for them, and who would be supported by the Freedmen. These would carry a knowledge of letters and the word of God to the ignorant and benighted.

Let us all ask for wisdom from on high, and act in this matter as God shall direct us. Yours for the Freedmen,

JOSHUA V. HIMES.

GOD WORKS IN FALMOUTH.

BRO. GRANT:—Our meetings commenced in Falmouth, Feb. 16th, with preaching in the evening. The next morning, in our social meeting, two voluntarily arose and confessed their sins, asking prayers. They soon found Christ their Savior. The next day one other came to Christ and found mercy. Backsliders broke down before God and were healed. God has since worked gloriously day after day. Seven or eight have found Christ.—Many wanderers have returned. The work goes on mightily. Four more came out for prayer last evening. Bro. Goud, York and Walker are with us in the work. Blessed be God for his mercy to this people.

Correspondence.

From Bro. E. A. Shaw.

BRO. GRANT:—I would call attention to Oregon, when ministering brethren are traveling in search of new fields of labor. I do not know of a single brother of like faith in the state, but presume there are. I have seen none since I emigrated in 1862. We were plundered by Indians and nearly starved on our way here, and are just beginning life anew. We live seven miles west of Portland, which is our address. I find considerable inquiry and often much interest, when telling of my hope and its reasons. Were I able to do it, I should take pleasure in ordering books and selling and distributing them, but at present am obliged to labor steadily for the maintenance of my family, having been laid up nearly a year by sickness, and buried two children, since I reached this coast. Our experience has been a hard one, but we look for a better—a heavenly country.

I feel assured a good laborer would meet with much success in this neighborhood. Any brother coming this way will be gratefully received and entertained by your brother in Christ,

ELIZUR A. SHAW.

Portland, Oregon.

From Bro. A. Sims.

BRO. GRANT:—A few weeks ago the Crisis contained an account of a visit of Bro. Blain to Canada West; that a small church was organized in that section of country, and that God's work is going forward. The friends of truth will be happy to hear that the Bible doctrine of the destruction of the wicked and the near coming of Christ is gaining ground here as well as in the United States. But while we have cause for rejoicing in the advancement of the cause of truth and that God is blessing the means of grace to some by enlightening their minds and uniting their hearts to himself, we are called to mourn in another respect. A dark cloud has been spread over us. Death has entered our little church and carried off a leading member, Deacon Fairly Milne.

The loss which the church has sustained in its present feeble state, cannot be estimated. Bro. Milne was a consistent christian, and a man of energy and decision. When he saw the truth he embraced it, although by doing so he would bring upon himself the reproach of men. He was independent in mind; he thought for himself in religious matters, as well as in other things. He belonged to a Baptist church near this place, of which he was a deacon, prior to the time he embraced the doctrine of the entire mortality of man, and the destruction of the wicked. The church acted on his case, and expelled him, his wife, and two others, for receiving and holding the above doctrine.

Bro. Milne was aged forty-three years. The circumstances attending his death were painful to his dear family. Business called him away a distance of thirty-five miles on horseback, on the 2d of this month, and his family never again saw him in life. He died on the 7th, at the house of near relations. He was surrounded by kind christian friends and relatives, but holding different views from our dear brother. He could not, therefore, enjoy the same liberty to converse on religious subjects as with his own family and the members of the church. Notwithstanding, peace reigned within; there was no wavering; he looked forward to the near coming of Christ, and a resurrection to a glorious immortality.

The sorrow of his family is deep, and likewise of the church; but we sorrow not as those who have no hope. The Lord rules, and will overrule this sad providence to his own glory and the good of his cause, although unseen to us now. His promise is that all things shall work together for good to them that love God. What now seems dark to us in the providence of God will ere long be made plain, and his righteous government will be justified by all his creatures.

Hawick, Dec. 26th, 1866. N. Sims.

From Bro. J. T. Jordan.

Bro. Grant:—Having received letters from many who wished to know the particulars about my lameness, and how I am getting along, I will take this means of informing them through the Crisis.

About the middle of last October a singular looking sore made its appearance on my right thigh, quite small at first, but increasing quite rapidly in size, with red fibres running from it half way round the leg. As many felt alarmed about it, I was advised to have it attended to at once, which I did, applying to Dr S. Lombard, of Standish, Me., who had had an experience of twenty-five years in doctoring cancers. He pronounced it the most stubborn kind of cancer, yet he thought it might be drawn out if attended to strictly, as I had taken it so soon after it made its appearance.

I have now been under his treatment seven weeks. The fibrous appearance has disappeared, and I feel quite confident that the means used, with the blessing of God, will effect a cure.

I hardly know how to confine myself at home, having appointments out, also feeling that my family needed my labor. But I was obliged to do it, or lose my life. I have done it, trusting in God, for I have proved him and his word too many times to distrust him in these last hours of time.

For twenty-three years I have believed and preached that Jesus would come back to earth again before the generation should pass away that beheld the signs given by Christ. I have labored mostly in new places, wherever the door has been opened. I have seen many brought to a knowledge of the truth and made happy in God. I have endeavored to do what I could with an eye single to the glory of God. For all this the Lord has sustained me. I have been blessed with good health until my present sickness, and now that I am afflicted for a time, I feel that the Lord has not forsaken me.

While I have had the prayers of God's people in my behalf, they have also rendered me material aid, for which they have my heartfelt thanks. To those who have thus assisted me I would say, Your letters have been cheering and comforting to me, and your aid most acceptable; for which I desire to feel abundantly thankful. I feel that the Lord will reward you, for I remember that Christ has said, "Inasmuch as ye have done it unto one of the least of these my brethren, ye have done it unto me."

Your brother, looking for Jesus very soon.

West Poland, Mar. 1st. J. T. Jordan.

From Sr. L. R. Gilman.

Bro. Grant:—I am trying to do what I can in the name of the Lord in scattering tracts and conversing with people to give them warning of their coming doom, if unprepared to meet the Lord. I believe with all my heart that our King is soon coming; and how important that we work while the day lasts, for the night of this poor wicked world is at hand, but, thank God, the morning to the saint is soon to dawn.

May the Lord help us to be faithful till He appears whose likeness we hope to reflect if good. Your sister in hope,

Long Point, Ill. Laura R. Gilman.

From Bro. L. Butler.

Bro. Grant:—The Lord has been doing a good work near here in Madison, through the labors of Brn. Woodruff and Hitchcock. About twenty have resolved to serve the Lord and prepare for his soon coming. To the Lord be all the glory. L. Butler.

For the World's Crisis.

TRUE COMFORT.

How sweet it is, when weighed down by the trials and sorrows of earth, to call to remembrance the blessed promise, "I will not leave you comfortless; I will come to you." O how these promises have cheered me when passing through fiery trials, so deep, so heavy, and so severe, that it has seemed as if I must sink beneath the weight of them; but this blessed promise would come into my heart like healing balm, and has caused me to rejoice even in the midst of the fiery furnace.

I praise the Lord that the above promise was ever written for us poor worms of the dust; incapable of doing any thing well pleasing in his sight without his help. The blessed Savior knew just what we should need to enable us to buffet against the tide of persecution, trials and sorrows of earth. I do praise the Lord to-day, that it is the privilege of the child of God to have the Comforter abide with him, to help him along in this weary world of sin and pain. I am glad that the Lord knows just what we are, and just what we need, and that he in his infinite wisdom and goodness has left such precious promises upon record, to help us above the trials of the way.

My heart overflows with praise to God for all he has done for me, a poor, lost sinner, saved only by grace, no good works of my own. Lord help me to be so good, so meek, so God-like, so Christ-like, that others may know whereof I am. Ever give me the blessed Spirit, the Comforter. Leave me not comfortless in these last days of time. We need more of it now than ever, to bear the trials of the way without giving up, when we are so near the home of the faithful.

L. B. Weaver.

Eclipse.—There will be a total eclipse of the moon on the night of March 30. It begins at fifty-three minutes past 9 o'clock, is at its total at fifty-nine minutes past 10, and begins to disappear at thirty-nine minutes past 12. It is visible throughout the United States.

Obituaries.

Kidder. Died in Bristol, N. H., Feb. 1st, 1866, of diphtheria, after a patient suffering of ten days, Rosetta Kidder, only child of Albert H. and Emeline Kidder, aged three years, nine months and four days.

> "So fades the lovely, blooming flower,
> Frail smiling solace of an hour;
> So soon our transient comforts fly,
> Earth's pleasures only bloom to die."

Rosy was a very promising, intelligent, and active child; a bright and lovely flower, blighted by early frost. Fond parents are left in solitude to mourn, yet not without the blissful hope of the resurrection near. Not the delusive hope that their loved one has gone to heaven: no; we tenderly laid the beautiful form away in the grave to sleep quietly the sleep of death, till Jesus, who is the resurrection and the life, comes again, when the cruel tyrant must yield its prey. Then we expect to see her again, not sick and dying, but clothed in immortal bloom, and there to enjoy her society for ever, in a world of undying splendor, where no flowers fade, and death will never enter. O hasten that bright morn! D. N. Kidder.

Mabey. Fell asleep in Jesus, in South Westerlo, Feb. 24th, 1866, at the residence of my father, Laura Etta, daughter of L. C. and S. E. Mabey, after an illness of three weeks, aged six years and three months.

In vain were the efforts of kind friends and medical skill to save our darling one. Death had his commission, and with unceasing tread marched on until the loved one was torn from our fond embrace, and we are left to mourn her loss. Yet we sorrow not as others who have no hope; for we believe that them which sleep in Jesus will God bring with him. Eld. J. P. Teats spoke words of comfort at the funeral, from 1 Cor. 15: 21. We are grateful to God that in our hour of affliction, and away from our home, we had the sympathy of dear friends, and the hope buoys us up, that soon Etta, with all those little ones, shall come again from the enemy's land to their own border, the new earth.

> "Asleep in Jesus! far from thee
> Thy kindred and their graves may be,
> But thine is still a blessed sleep,
> From which none ever wake to weep."

L. C. and S. E. Mabey.

Raymond. Died in Savoy, Mass., Feb. 5th., 1866, Mary E., aged two years, nine months, and twenty-five days.

Also, Feb. 6th, Alida M., aged five years, eleven months, and eighteen days, daughters of Jonathan and Louisa Raymond.

Funeral services were attended by Eld. H. G. M'Cullock, of Illinois.

> Our lovely ones in Jesus sleep,
> Their sufferings are all o'er,
> O may we meet beyond death's sleep,
> Where partings are no more.
> We gazed upon their features,
> In death so calm and still,
> With thoughts of bitter anguish,
> That parting scenes do fill.
> We weep, but not distrusting,
> The hand that laid them low
> Will call them from their slumbers,
> When Life's sweet morn shall glow.
> Farewell, then, dearest children;
> Farewell, till we shall meet
> And be united, ever
> To chant the triumph sweet.

E. M'Cullock.

Hays. In West Stoneham, Feb. 18th, 1866, Sister Lizzie P. Hays, daughter of Joseph and Louisa Palls, aged twenty-six years, three months, and twenty days.

She has been a follower of Christ for several years, and loved Christ with all her heart. She possessed strong faith in the promises, and was a bright and shining light in the world. She died believing she would have a part in the resurrection of the just. Her parents, with brothers and sisters, and a large circle of friends, mourn their loss; but she sleeps in Christ. A discourse was delivered by the writer, from John 12: 26.

Summary of News.

FOREIGN.

Queenstown 22d.

The suspension of the habeas corpus in Ireland was received with universal approbation in England and very general satisfaction in Ireland. At first the effect there was uneasiness and depression, but the vigor shown by the Government restored confidence and had a favorable effect. The act authorizes the arrest and detention in custody until the 1st of March, 1867, of any person suspected of conspiracy.

The chief object of the measure is believed to be to enable the authorities to deal with numerous Fenian emissaries from America, who are represented as scattering in all directions. The police are acting vigorously and are making a large number of arrests. The military force in Ireland is being strongly reinforced. It is reported that Sir Hugh Rose, the Commander in Ireland, has demanded further instructions from the government. Four sergeants of a regiment at Limerick have been placed under arrest. Among the latest arrests is that of Gen. John H. Gleeson, brother of Joseph Gleeson, of the Federal army. The police were fired on from a house in Tipperary, where it was supposed that drilling was in progress. One officer was severely wounded. Some of the men were arrested. P. J. McDonald, the supposed Head Centre in Dublin, had been arrested. Order continued to be maintained.

A bill has passed the House of Lords authorizing the Irish Government to take possession of the telegraph wires, if necessary.

The Government bill regarding the cattle plague has passed both Houses of Parliament.

It is stated that recruiting in Austria to fill up the Austrian corps in Mexico will commence in a few days.

Austria, without recognising the kingdom of Italy, is negotiating for improvements in the consular and commercial relations of the two countries.

It is asserted that Prussia is about to send a note to Austria declaring that the personal union of the Duchies with Prussia is the only solution of the Schleswig Holstein question.

The Paris Patrie says certain proposals have emanated from Maximilian which may render possible the return of 5000 troops from Mexico by the end of May.

THREE DAYS LATER.

The Irish police continue active in arresting suspected Fenians, and troops continue to be sent to Ireland.

The cattle plague is still increasing. The latest weekly returns show 11,000 cases, the largest yet.

A revolution had occurred in Romania. The Prince Conesa was taken prisoner by the army and forced to sign his abdication. The Legislature unanimously proclaimed Count Flanders Hospodar amidst general satisfaction. Much excitement prevailed in the neighboring principalities.

Liverpool Feb. 28, Queenstown March 1st.

The condition of Fenian affairs is unchanged. Arrests continue plentiful in all directions and arms and ammunition were frequently seized. The provisions of the Peace Act have been further extended.

The London Star has reason to know that the relations of Austria and Prussia relative to the Duchies is very critical. It even hints at the possibility of war.

Dublin, Feb. 28—P. M. A policeman of Castletown Roche, in the county of Cork, and another from the neighborhood of Fermoy, in the same county, have been arrested on a charge of Fenianism.

DOMESTIC.

Washington, March 5. The Commissioner of the Freedman's Bureau has issued a circular directing each Assistant Commissioner to consult the State laws with regard to marriage and divorce of white persons and embody them for the benefit of the freedmen.

A important treaty between the Creek nation of Indians and the United States was signed Saturday afternoon. The Creeks, among other important stipulations, cede the west half of their domain, admit their emancipated negroes to equal civil rights, grant the right of way for the construction of a railroad through their country, and agree to such legislation on the part of Congress as may be necessary to establish a judicial system in the Indian Territories, and a general council, with definite legislative powers, composed of delegates from each nation.

New York, March 6. One of the Valparaiso newspapers states that instructions to prevent the bombardment of that city, if it should be attempted by the Spaniards, have been given by the English Government to its Minister in Chili.

Advices from Rio Janeiro are important. War preparations continued. An iron-clad had been despatched to the Platte. Another was to follow, with some bomb vessels. The Brazilian Government was firm in demanding the expulsion of Lopez as the first basis of any peace negotiations.

It is reported that Archbishop McCloskey will soon take action in regard to the violation of his admonitory circular, and that it will be announced that no absolution will be granted any member of the Fenian organization.

Montreal, Canada, March 9. The call for 10,000 Canadian militia for active duty was enthusiastically responded to. Early on Thursday morning news was received from all parts of the country that their quotas were ready for active service at a moment's notice. No doubt three times the number could be had at a day's notice. The whole volunteer force of this city paraded last evening. Strong guards are posted in all the alleys and patrols moved through the city all night. Every preparation is being made to guard against any Fenian surprise.

☞ The Georgia Senate has passed a bill giving to the freedmen all the rights in the courts enjoyed by white men.

CASH RECEIPTS FOR THE CRISIS.

To find how your account stands.

The present No. of the Crisis is 545. The No. which follows your name is the No. to which you have paid. If the No. paid to, is greater than the present No., the difference shows how many weeks you have paid for in advance. If the No. paid to, is less than the present No., the difference shows for how many weeks you owe. For every week of indebtedness before No. 468, (if any), charge four cents; for every week since No. 468, if less than 26 weeks, five cents; if over 26 weeks, six cents a week (or $3.12 for the year.) From the sum deduct four cents for every dollar, and you have the exact amount due.

horseback, on the 2d of this month, and his family never again saw him in life. He died on the 7th, at the house of near relations. He was surrounded by kind christian friends and relatives, but holding different views from our dear brother. He could not, therefore, enjoy the same liberty to converse on religious subjects as with his own family and the members of the church. Notwithstanding, peace reigned within; there was no wavering; he looked forward to the near coming of Christ, and a resurrection to a glorious immortality.

The sorrow of his family is deep, and likewise of the church; but we sorrow not as those who have no hope. The Lord rules, and will overrule this sad providence to his own glory and the good of his cause, although unseen to us now. His promise is that all things shall work together for good to them that love God. What now seems dark to us in the providence of God will ere long be made plain, and his righteous government will be justified by all his creatures.

Hawick, Dec. 26th, 1866. N. SIMS.

From Bro. J. T. Jordan.

BRO. GRANT:—Having received letters from many who wished to know the particulars about my lameness, and how I am getting along, I will take this means of informing them through the Crisis.

About the middle of last October a singular looking sore made its appearance on my right thigh, quite small at first, but increasing quite rapidly in size, with red fibres running from it half way round the leg. As many felt alarmed about it, I was advised to have it attended to at once, which I did, applying to Dr. S. Lombard, of Standish, Me., who had had an experience of twenty-five years in doctoring cancers. He pronounced it the most stubborn kind of cancer, yet he thought it might be drawn out if attended to strictly, as I had taken it so soon after it made its appearance.

I have now been under his treatment seven weeks. The fibrous appearance has disappeared, and I feel quite confident that the means used, with the blessing of God, will effect a cure.

I hardly know how to confine myself at home, having appointments out, also feeling that my family needed my labor. But I was obliged to do it, or lose my life. I have done it, trusting in God, for I have proved him and his word too many times to distrust him in these last hours of time.

For twenty-three years I have believed and preached that Jesus would come back to earth again before the generation should pass away that beheld the signs given by Christ. I have labored mostly in new places, wherever the door has been opened. I have seen many brought to a knowledge of the truth and made happy in God. I have endeavored to do what I could with an eye single to the glory of God. For all this the Lord has sustained me. I have been blessed with good health until my present sickness, and now that I am afflicted for a time, I feel that the Lord has not forsaken me.

While I have had the prayers of God's people in my behalf, they have also rendered me material aid, for which they have my heartfelt thanks. To those who have thus assisted me I would say, Your letters have been cheering and comforting to me, and your aid most acceptable; for which I desire to feel abundantly thankful. I feel that the Lord will reward you, for I remember that Christ has said, "Inasmuch as ye have done it unto one of the least of these my brethren, ye have done it unto me."

Your brother, looking for Jesus very soon,
West Poland, Mar. 1st. J. T. JORDAN.

From Sr. L. R. Gilman.

BRO. GRANT:—I am trying to do what I can in the name of the Lord in scattering tracts and conversing with people to give them warning of their coming doom, if unprepared to meet the Lord. I believe with all my heart that our King is soon coming; and how important that we work while the day lasts, for the night of this poor wicked world is at hand, but, thank God, the morning to the saint is soon to dawn.

May the Lord help us to be faithful till He appears whose likeness we hope to reflect if good. Your sister in hope,
Long Point, Ill. LAURA R. GILMAN.

From Bro. L. Butler.

BRO. GRANT:—The Lord has been doing a good work near here in Madison, through the labors of Brn. Woodruff and Hitchcock. About twenty have resolved to serve the Lord and prepare for his soon coming. To the Lord be all the glory. L. BUTLER.

For the World's Crisis.

TRUE COMFORT.

How sweet it is, when weighed down by the trials and sorrows of earth, to call to remembrance the blessed promise, "I will not leave you comfortless; I will come to you." O how these promises have cheered me when passing through fiery trials, so deep, so heavy, and so severe, that it has seemed as if I must sink beneath the weight of them; but this blessed promise would come into my heart like healing balm, and has caused me to rejoice even in the midst of the fiery furnace.

I praise the Lord that the above promise was ever written for us poor worms of the dust; incapable of doing any thing well pleasing in his sight without his help. The blessed Savior knew just what we should need to enable us to buffet against the tide of persecution, trials and sorrows of earth. I do praise the Lord to-day, that it is the privilege of the child of God to have the Comforter abide with him, to help him along in this weary world of sin and pain. I am glad that the Lord knows just what we are, and just what we need, and that he in his infinite wisdom and goodness has left such precious promises upon record, to help us above the trials of the way.

My heart overflows with praise to God for all he has done for me, a poor, lost sinner, saved only by grace, no good works of my own. Lord help me to be so good, so meek, so God-like, so Christ-like, that others may know whereof I am. Ever give me the blessed Spirit, the Comforter. Leave me not comfortless in these last days of time. We need more of it now than ever, to bear the trials of the way without giving up, when we are so near the home of the faithful.

L. B. WEAVER.

ECLIPSE.—There will be a total eclipse of the moon on the night of March 30. It begins at fifty-three minutes past 9 o'clock, is at its total at fifty-nine minutes past 10, and begins to disappear at thirty-nine minutes past 12. It is visible throughout the United States.

Obituaries.

KIDDER. Died in Bristol, N. H., Feb. 1st, 1866, of diphtheria, after a patient suffering of ten days, Rosetta Kidder, only child of Albert H. and Emeline Kidder, aged three years, nine months and four days.

"So fades the lovely, blooming flower,
Frail smiling solace of an hour;
So soon our transient comforts fly,
Earth's pleasures only bloom to die."

Rosy was a very promising, intelligent, and active child; a bright and lovely flower, blighted by early frost. Fond parents are left in solitude to mourn, yet not without the blissful hope of the resurrection near. Not the delusive hope that their loved one has gone to heaven: no; we tenderly laid the beautiful form away in the grave to sleep quietly the sleep of death, till Jesus, who is the resurrection and the life, comes again, when the cruel tyrant must yield its prey. Then we expect to see her again, not sick and dying, but clothed in immortal bloom, and there to enjoy her society for ever, in a world of undying splendor, where no flowers fade, and death will never enter. O hasten that bright morn! D. N. KIDDER.

MABEY. Fell asleep in Jesus, in South Westerlo, Feb. 24th, 1866, at the residence of my father, Laura Etta, daughter of L. C. and S. E. Mabey, after an illness of three weeks, aged six years and three months.

In vain were the efforts of kind friends and medical skill to save our darling one. Death had his commission, and with unceasing tread marched on until the loved one was torn from our fond embrace, and we are left to mourn her loss. Yet we sorrow not as others who have no hope; for we believe that them which sleep in Jesus will God bring with him. Eld. J. P. Teats spoke words of comfort at the funeral, from 1 Cor. 15 : 21. We are grateful to God that in our hour of affliction, and away from our home, we had the sympathy of dear friends, and the hope buoys us up, that soon Etta, with all those little ones, shall come again from the enemy's land to their own border, the new earth.

"Asleep in Jesus! far from thee
Thy kindred and their graves may be;
But thine is still a blessed sleep,
From which none ever wake to weep."

L. C. AND S. E. MABEY.

RAYMOND. Died in Savoy, Mass., Feb. 5th., 1866, Mary E., aged two years, nine months, and twenty-five days.

Also, Feb. 8th, Alida M., aged five years, eleven months, and eighteen days, daughters of Jonathan and Louisa Raymond.

Funeral services were attended by Eld. H. G. M'Culloch, of Illinois.

Our lovely ones in Jesus sleep,
Their sufferings are all o'er,
O may we meet beyond death's sleep,
Where partings are no more.

We gazed upon their features,
In death so calm and still,
With thoughts of bitter anguish,
That parting scenes do fill.

We weep, but not distrusting,
The hand that laid them low
Will call them from their slumbers,
When Life's sweet morn shall glow.

Farewell, then, dearest children;
Farewell, till we shall meet
And be united, ever
To chant the triumph sweet.

E. M'CULLOCK.

HAYS. In West Stoneham, Feb. 18th, 1866, Sister Lizzie P. Hays, daughter of Joseph and Louisa Palls, aged twenty-six years, three months, and twenty days.

She has been a follower of Christ for several years, and loved Christ with all her heart. She possessed strong faith in the promises, and was a bright and shining light in the world. She died believing she would have a part in the resurrection of the just. Her parents, with brothers and sisters, and a large circle of friends, mourn their loss; but she sleeps in Christ. A discourse was delivered by the writer, from John 12 : 26.

Summary of News.

FOREIGN.

Queenstown 22d.

The suspension of the habeas corpus in Ireland was received with universal approbation in England and very general satisfaction in Ireland. At first the effect there was uneasiness and depression, but the vigor shown by the Government restored confidence and had a favorable effect. The act authorizes the arrest and detention in custody until the 1st of March, 1867, of any person suspected of conspiracy.

The chief object of the measure is believed to be to enable the authorities to deal with numerous Fenian emissaries from America, who are represented as scattering in all directions. The police are acting vigorously and are making a large number of arrests. The military force in Ireland is being strongly reinforced. It is reported that Sir Hugh Rose, the Commander in Ireland, has demanded further instructions from the government. Four sergeants of a regiment at Limerick have been placed under arrest. Among the latest arrests is that of Gen. John H. Gleeson, brother of Joseph Gleeson, of the Federal army. The police were fired on from a house in Tipperary, where it was supposed that drilling was in progress. One officer was severely wounded. Some of the men were arrested. P. J. McDonald, the supposed Head Centre in Dublin, had been arrested. Order continued to be maintained.

A bill has passed the House of Lords authorising the Irish Government to take possession of the telegraph wires, if necessary.

The Government bill regarding the cattle plague has passed both Houses of Parliament.

It is stated that recruiting in Austria to fill up the Austrian corps in Mexico will commence in a few days.

Austria, without recognizing the kingdom of Italy, is negotiating for improvements in the consular and commercial relations of the two countries.

It is asserted that Prussia is about to send a note to Austria declaring that the personal union of the Duchies with Prussia is the only solution of the Schleswig Holstein question.

The Paris Patrie says certain proposals have emanated from Maximilian which may render possible the return of 5000 troops from Mexico by the end of May.

THREE DAYS LATER.

The Irish police continue active in arresting suspected Fenians, and troops continue to be sent to Ireland.

The cattle plague is still increasing. The latest weekly returns show 13,000 cases, the largest yet.

A revolution had occurred in Romania. The Prince Conses was taken prisoner by the army and forced to sign his abdication. The Legislature unanimously proclaimed Count Flanders Hospodar amidst general satisfaction. Much excitement prevailed in the neighboring principalities.

Liverpool Feb. 28, Queenstown March 1st.

The condition of Fenian affairs is unchanged. Arrests continue plentiful in all directions and arms and ammunition were frequently seized. The provisions of the Peace Act have been further extended.

The London Star has reason to know that the relations of Austria and Prussia relative to the Duchies is very critical. It even hints at the possibility of war.

Dublin, Feb. 28—P. M. A policeman of Castletown Roche, in the county of Cork, and another from the neighborhood of Fermoy, in the same county, have been arrested on a charge of Fenianism.

DOMESTIC.

Washington, March 5. The Commissioner of the Freedmen's Bureau has issued a circular directing each Assistant Commissioner to consult the State laws with regard to marriage and divorce of white persons and embody them for the benefit of the freedmen.

A important treaty between the Creek nation of Indians and the United States was signed Saturday afternoon. The Creeks, among other important stipulations, cede the west half of their domain, admit their emancipated negroes to equal civil rights, grant the right of way for the construction of a railroad through their country, and agree to such legislation on the part of Congress as may be necessary to establish a judicial system in the Indian Territories, and a general council, with definite legislative powers, composed of delegates from each nation.

New York, March 6. One of the Valparaiso newspapers states that instructions to prevent the bombardment of that city, if it should be attempted by the Spaniards, have been given by the English Government to its Minister in Chili.

Advices from Rio Janeiro are important. War preparations continued. An ironclad had been despatched to the Platte. Another was to follow, with some bomb vessels. The Brazilian Government was firm in demanding the expulsion of Lopez as the first basis of any peace negotiations.

It is reported that Archbishop McCloskey will soon take action in regard to the violation of his admonitory circular, and that it will be announced that no absolution will be granted any member of the Fenian organization.

Montreal, Canada, March 9. The call for 10,000 Canadian militia for active duty was enthusiastically responded to. Early on Thursday morning news was received from all parts of the country that their quotas were ready for active service at a moment's notice. No doubt three times the number could be had at a day's notice. The whole volunteer force of this city paraded last evening. Strong guards are posted in all the alleys and patrols moved through the city all night. Every preparation is being made to guard against any Fenian surprise.

☞ The Georgia Senate has passed a bill giving to the freedmen all the rights in the courts enjoyed by white men.

HEART LONGINGS.

I long to see my Savior, and hear his blessed voice;
I have given all for Jesus, and he is now my choice;
I once was lost in darkness, and hardly knew my way,
But oh! the blessed Savior has turned my night to day.

I love to think of Jesus while sickness is my lot;
The peace he daily gives me can never be forgot;
He's promised to go with me through death's dark, narrow way,
And cheer me in the valley, and point to endless day.

I lean upon my Savior; he's gentle, meek and mild,
He is my loving Savior, the "Father's only child";
I'll cast my care on Jesus, he ever cares for me,
And in that blessed morning his face I then shall see.

O! what a precious Savior; he ever is my all,
He'll bend to his listen when on him I do call;
I'll trust my all on Jesus, and when he comes again,
He'll say, "afflicted daughter, with me, you e'er shall reign."

MISSION LETTERS FROM SWITZERLAND.

NUMBER FIVE.

BRO. GRANT:—Hoping that some of your readers are still interested in my labors in this part of the Lord's vineyard, and would like to read a letter occasionally from this little Swiss Republic, I again take my pen to address you, and them, through the medium of the Crisis.

To me the present is a time of great interest in the world's history, and my heart is filled with gratitude to God that I live in this age, and am permitted to be a humble worker in this time of "preparation." It seems to me that God in his providence is arranging every thing in this world to the end that people may understand its destiny, that they may be warned of what is soon coming, the great and terrible day of the Lord, and the year of his redeemed, that they may be without excuse, if found unprepared. There has been a governmental movement in this Republic recently, very interesting to me.

Notwithstanding its professions of liberty, there has been heretofore but little religious liberty in Switzerland, except in a few cantons. The national church, the Roman Catholic, and Jews, being the only sects tolerated by law, but there has recently been a great movement in all the cantons, which resulted in a change of the constitution in that as well as some other important respects, the 14th of January. Now the word of God may be preached freely in all parts of this Republic. May the Lord also open the way for the spread of truth in other European countries now darkened by intolerance and superstition, is my prayer.

It is a great satisfaction to one who believes in God and his immutable laws, which sooner or later must be recognized, to see any approximation to them on the part of worldly governments; and we especially, who watch the signs of the times, and believe that God is directing all events to the merciful end, that all who will may be saved, must look upon the movements of the present with great interest and satisfaction.

After writing my last letter to you, just after the opening of the year, I remained at home most of the time for two weeks, as little could be done publicly at that season, every one being busy his secular affairs. Jan. 17th I left home for Bullet, one of the flourishing villages of Mont Jura, some three hours' walk from Grandson. I delivered there four lectures in the college to good and attentive congregations.

From there I was invited to Buttes, a larger village, some three hours' distant. The large National Temple was tendered me for lectures, and the excellent pastor, Mr Evard, gave me the kind hospitalities of his house. I lectured four times, and was listened to very attentively by a very large congregation, which filled the Temple. At their close, the venerable pastor expressed his gratitude that I had visited them to warn them of the near approach of the coming and kingdom of Christ, and exhorted them to heed the warning and prepare for what was soon coming on the earth. Several ministers, men of much intelligence and pretty well educated in Hebrew and Greek, attended the lectures, and spent much time with me in private, discussing those great Bible truths of particular importance at the present time, and acknowledged their force.

From Buttes I was invited to the little city of Fleurier (twenty minutes walk from there), by Mr. Coulon, pastor of its National church, where I spent a week laboring as God gave me ability, privately through the day, and publicly evenings. It was a season of great solemnity, and the blessing of God was manifested in power. At the close of my lectures, I listened to an excellent sermon on the signs of the times, by the pastor of the church.

I returned home the 5th inst., impressed deeply with a sense of the mercy of God, and the importance of his work. In the three places where I lectured, God was with me to assist in the presentation of his truth, and sent it home with power to the hearts of the hearers.

Dear brethren and sisters, I feel increased confidence wherever I present these great Bible truths, that God is in this work, and that it will go forward. However Satan, through his agents, may clog the wheels, so that for a time it may seem to be retarded, yet it will not be stopped. The coming and kingdom of Christ must be preached, and if those who have long professed faith in these great truths do not carry forward the work, God will raise up others to do it. Christ said, "if these should hold their peace the stones would immediately cry out."—Luke 19: 40.

The field that I have visited between Lake Neuchatel and France is very rich and interesting. The large and flourishing villages among the Jura mountains are inhabited by a very intelligent people, who, through industry and economy, live in comfort and elegance. Such people are capable of understanding and appreciating truth. May God give many of them a heart also to obey it. The 7th inst., I buried two in baptism in the beautiful lake of Neuchatel, one of them a lady of much intelligence and influence, the first fruits of my labor in Fleurier. [illegible] Being somewhat exhausted in strength, I felt the need of a few days' rest, and am now at home, but expect in a few days to go again to public labors. We receive frequent and excellent letters from Florence, Pisa, Turin, La Tour, etc., Italy. Our friends there are very firm and faithful. Glory be to God. [illegible] I was finishing this letter, I had the pleasure of receiving a very kind christian letter from Bro. W. B. Herrick, inclosing a draft for 345 francs, a contribution from dear [illegible] European Mission. May God reward them for their kindness. Yours, [illegible] in the hope of the [illegible] B. NUMBER TWENTY-FIVE.

THE DEATH OF SAUL AND JONATHAN.

A sad change had been wrought in the destiny of Israel, since that eventful night when the maidens sang the victory of David over the fallen foe. The power of Saul had waned in the changing years. He had driven forth the youthful hero, David, who might have been a tower of strength to his throne, because he was jealous of his growing favor with the people.

But anon the days of darkness came, and the stubborn Saul was left alone in his weakness, a prey to doubt and despair. The proud Philistines, the old foes of his kingdom, were preparing war again, and had assembled their thousands for the invasion of Israel. Saul gathered his forces and encamped upon the heights of Gilboa. As he surveyed the valley of Jezreel, swarming with the heathen hosts, his heart, once so valiant, died within him, for his coming doom seemed to cast its shadow before his appalled vision. He had madly strayed from the path of wisdom marked out by the prophet Samuel, and followed his own inclinations; and when in the adversity of his expiring reign he would fain inquire of the Lord, he received no answer, "Neither by dreams, nor by Urim, nor by prophets." Then in the depth of his despair, he bethought him of the witch who lived in distant Endor, and, as a last resort, he determined to visit her, and learn his doom.

That night, as the darkening shadows stole over the heights of Gilboa, and shrouded the lesser hills and vales of Manasseh in gloom, three solitary horsemen might have been seen wending their way over the rugged hills to the far off Endor. Night had far advanced ere the king and his followers reached the cave of the sorceress. Being assured of protection the hag performed her incantations, and pronounced the destiny of the trembling king.

The dark revelation was too much for Saul, and he fell senseless to the earth. Recovering at last, he turned from the mysterious rites of Endor, and with a sad heart sought the camp of his warriors. The morning star was paling in the east as he neared the tents of Israel, wan and dejected, with the burden of the future weighing heavily upon him. With all the energy that despair had left him, he prepared for the conflict, vainly warring against his destiny.

As the morning sun bathed the craggy brow of Gilboa with its wealth of golden light, and drank up the dew from the mountain flowers, the Philistine began to climb the heights and press the battle. Saul, the warrior, who had triumphed in so many battles, fought with all the daring of dark despair, but it availed not. His sons fell in the onset of the conflict, and the valiant men of Judah fled before the conquering Philistines, or stumbled upon the high places of the mountains to rise no more.

When the ill-starred Saul saw that all was lost, that the glory of his house had departed, and that the terrible foe were pressing close upon him, he called upon his servant to slay him, but he would not; then Saul fell upon his own sword, and died with the slain of Israel on that memorable day. Then the triumphant foe carried the bodies of Saul and his sons, and fastened them in defiance to the walls of Beth-shan, and embellished the throne of Ashtaroth with their captured armor.

Thus faded the glory of the house of Saul in one day of conflict, and Israel was put to shame before the foe that once had fled in dismay before the heroic valor of a youth.

But where was the hero David, who turned the tide of war in other days? The years had changed his destiny, he was no longer the favored one of Saul, whose morose and jealous spirit had driven him out into the wild places of Judea, to subsist upon his own resources. Yet an undying friendship, the most beautiful and touching in all history, had grown up between David and Jonathan, the son of Saul. And when the cloud of Saul's displeasure lowered upon the path of David, Jonathan stood between him and the angry king. Their friendship was pure, noble, and unselfish. The vicissitudes of all the years changed it not, but added to its strength, and when Saul would fain have destroyed David and his party, Jonathan divulged all his father's plans, and warned him of the impending danger.

But all this while the star of Saul was hastening to the horizon, to set in the night of overthrow, and that of David was rising in the luminous orient.

David was encamped at Ziklag when the news of the last act in the tragedy reached him. He did not rejoice in the overthrow of his old foe, but generously forgot the enmity of the king in his sorrow for the death of his beloved friend Jonathan. All the scenes of the past, the many endearing words, the vows of undying friendship, came rushing back from the distant years, like smiling dreams of boyhood. He forgot the dangers he had escaped, the hardships endured in that moment of agony, when he realized that his friend was no more. Then he gave utterance to a lamentation that has never been surpassed in any language for its pathetic beauty. He lamented alike the foe and friend; he praised the father and son, and chanted for them a requiem, whose mournful music must have touched each heart, and thrilled each ear that listened.

"The beauty of Israel is slain upon thy high places; how are the mighty fallen. Tell it not in Gath, publish it not in the streets of Askelon; lest the daughters of the Philistines rejoice, lest the daughters of the uncircumcised triumph. Ye mountains of Gilboa, let there be no dew, neither let there be rain upon you, nor fields of offerings; for there the shield of the mighty is vilely cast away, the shield of Saul as though he had not been anointed with oil. From the blood of the slain, from the fat of the mighty, the bow of Jonathan turned not back, and the sword of Saul returned not empty. Saul and Jonathan were lovely and pleasant in their lives, and in their death they are not divided; they were swifter than eagles, they were stronger than lions. Ye daughters of Israel, weep over Saul, who clothed you in scarlet, with other delights; who put ornaments of gold upon you apparel. How are the mighty fallen in the midst of battle! O Jonathan, thou wast slain in thine high places. [illegible]

The dynasty of Saul was ended. The way was opened for David to ascend the throne to which he had been anointed by the holy [illegible] about to open for Israel, that was to eclipse the glories of the surrounding nations. David was to be the founder of a long line of illustrious kings, whose deeds would live through the ages. ORRIN P. ALLEN.

For the World's Crisis.

LONG ARTICLES, SERMONS, AND PRAYERS.

If it were possible to make people see under what disadvantages they labor through a long sermon, there would be a reform in this respect. People now-a-days will not sit as patiently as formerly under such inflictions. They know more about preaching, and comprehend faster. Said a brother to me,—

"I wish you would tell us who to send for to come and preach."

After proposing two or three, he said,—

"They preach so long we cannot stand it. When he was here he preached half the people out of the house, or to sleep, and [illegible] had to sum up, and wind up, and finish, and varnish, to have it look well. We do not like him."

Probably two-thirds of our preachers are in the habit of preaching too long. If they knew how much complaint there is about long preaching, they would reform, unless they are willful.

Preachers wonder they have so few invitations to preach. If I should call the names of those with whom the brethren are dissatisfied on this account, you would be astonished.

A sermon over one hour is lost, two times out of ten. Crowd down too much, and you lose the whole. One half of the subject or an hour ought to be condensed into forty-five minutes. Some are guilty of holding the people one hour and a half, and some two hours or over. Such ought to have sore throats, and God or nature thinks so, and gives it to them. They do not so much more than others, because they preach so much longer.

Such generally write long articles, which are not read but by few. We want short, pointed articles of interest, of reformations, and those that feed the church down here, instead of those long, prosy ones, which must needs crowd out four or five short ones, either of which is worth more to the flock. One editor said the men that had the longest articles were the most difficult to suit. Perhaps all the editors might say Amen to this.

Long prayers are a great sign of a religion with no saving power in it. It is generally formal, dry, and pharisaical. It is generally understood by reformationists that the prayer which God answers and the people feel, in all ages, will not exceed from one to three minutes. That is longer than the Lord's prayer. His sermon on the Mount, which you will find in Matt 5, 6, and 7, the whole three chapters, would be a sermon of about thirty-five to forty minutes. His public prayers were in proportion. Those who pray publicly fifteen to twenty minutes, and preach one hour and a half to two hours, never learned it of Jesus, nor of the apostles.

Secret prayer, through which we can draw near to God, is not limited nor interrupted by other influences, as in public. It has been remarked that those who pray the longest in public pray the least in secret. The world is getting full of the form of godliness, let us shun it, and contend for the power, if we are unpopular and but few, God will give such the kingdom. H. MUNGER.

For the World's Crisis.

HOLD ON.

A raft with several men upon it was floating down the Ohio river. The current of the river was strong and swift, and the channel narrow. An island lay directly in the way, and there was great danger that the raft might be dashed to pieces in attempting to pass between it and the shore.

One of the passengers, but little accustomed to the river, became much frightened. A tall, stout Indian, wearing a broad, leather belt, was steering the raft. He told the man to hold on to his belt and he would take care of him.

"But we are in great danger."

"Hold on to my belt."

"I am afraid the raft will go to pieces."

"Hold on to my belt, and I will take care of you."

"But I cannot swim."

"Hold on to my belt, and I will swim ashore with you."

The Indian guided the raft safely through the narrow pass, and none on board were harmed.

Our life is like a passage down a rapid river. Temptations lie before us, and destruction is around us. We are in danger of being wrecked and lost. But there is One that can save us. Jesus Christ is sitting at the helm and steering the course. In his strength and judgment we may safely confide. He is "mighty to save." He bids us hold on to him and trust in him.

"But the danger is great," we say.

"I, the Lord thy God, will hold thy right hand. Fear not; I will help thee."—Isa. 41: 13.

"But I am afraid I shall be lost. I cannot resist my temptations to sin."

"Fear thou not, for I am with thee; be not dismayed, for I am thy God; I will strengthen thee; yea, I will help thee; yea, I will uphold thee with the right hand of my righteousness."—Isa. 41: 10. "God is faithful, who will not suffer you to be tempted above that ye are able, but will with the temptation also make a way to escape."—1 Cor. 10: 13.

"But I cannot swim; I should sink beneath the waters, like Peter, and perish."

"Thus saith the Lord that created thee,—Fear not: for I have redeemed thee, I have called thee by my name; thou art mine. When thou passest through the waters I will be with thee; and through the rivers, they shall not overflow thee. When thou walkest through the fire, thou shalt not be burned; neither shall the flame kindle upon thee."—Isa. 43: 1, 2.

Wandering, doubting, trembling soul, come to Christ; believe in Christ; hold on to Christ. He is "girded about with strength." Righteousness is the girdle of his loins, and faithfulness the girdle of his reins. Cling to him, and you will be safe. No human strength is equal to uphold you, and to guide you amid the dangers and temptations of your life. Jesus Christ alone can help you. But even He cannot aid you unless you hold on to him. You must prove your faith in him by doing as he bids you. And he will prove faithful to you. He will safely conduct you through [illegible] of your way, and bring you at last, unharmed and in peace, to rest in his salvation.

Reader, have you a hold on this Christ? Have you committed your soul to his keeping? Is he your pilot, your friend, your safety, and your trust? Are you grasping his strength, and clinging to his righteousness, and holding on to his truth?

Are you young, and do temptations beset you on every side? Do vain thoughts, and foolish ambitions, and childish vanities, and youthful lusts allure to deceive and ruin you? There is no safety for you but in holding on to Christ. You cannot breast the current alone. But he is sufficient for all things. Give up to him, and he will give you "a wise and an understanding heart, that you may know to refuse the evil and choose the good."

Or, are you aged? Has the light and gladness of early days faded before your dim eyes? Have you lived to see earthly hopes fall, and earthly friends die? Has the "bitterness of sorrow, and the blight of sickness, taught you that "all is vanity and vexation of spirit"? Has your sun set, and your day of toil ended, and is the damp and chill and darkness and desolation of the night of death creeping upon you? Hold on to Christ. What else can you cling to? He alone can comfort or sustain you. When thou walkest through the valley of the shadow of death he will be with thee: his rod and his staff will comfort thee.

God grant that we "remember and hold fast," and at last be found among the "righteous who have held on their way, and grown stronger and stronger." E. A. ANNABLE.

For the World's Crisis.

THE PILGRIM'S TRIALS.

Says one, "I am almost discouraged, my trials are so severe. While I was in the world, I used to get along well enough; but since I have been trying to serve the Lord, and have been waiting for his coming, trials have increased tenfold. I might about as well give up, for I can now scarcely keep my head above water, and my trials keep increasing."

Indeed! and how will they all look beside the deep humiliation, reproach and suffering of the crucified One? Have you ever experienced any trial which was sufficient to make a bloody sweat issue from the pores of your body? O! my brother, my sister, think not of your own petty trials; they are scarcely worth noticing, when you consider the boundless, unfathomable love and condescension of the dear Lamb of God! And he endured all this, not for his own sake, but for yours. And now are you unwilling to bear that which this same loving Redeemer sees necessary and best that you should bear?

Again, how will these trials of yours compare with those of your brethren—your "companions in tribulation," who have lived in by-gone days? Read the Book of Martyrs, and see what those holy men and women were willing to endure for Christ's sake, and well may you be ashamed when you remember your own little trials, and how you have shrunk from them.

Constrained by the love of Jesus they yielded themselves the victims to the most shocking cruelty and barbarity which the ingenuity of men and devils could invent. They had their bodies most terribly mangled and tortured, their eyes dug out, their tongues drawn out by the roots, their toes and other members pulled off with pincers, red hot irons applied to the most tender parts of their bodies, were starved to death; were locked in a large pan, and baked to death over a slow fire, were almost drawn asunder, their limbs from their bodies, then suffered to recover, and again subjected to the same inhuman treatment, and this process several times repeated. But these are but few of the numberless ways in which millions on millions have sealed their testimony with their blood. Thousands on thousands have been tortured upon the rack, and time would fail me (were I able) to enumerate the black catalogue of tortures invented in that terrible engine of cruelty—The Inquisition.

What think you, my brother, of trials like these? Do not any longer brood over that pigmy trial of yours, but rather let your heart be filled with joy, gratitude, and praise, that though "they without us will not be made perfect," but, on the contrary, we shall with them receive an everlasting crown, that still your trials are so light comparatively.

"Must I be carried to the skies
On flowery beds of ease,
Whilst others fought to win the prize,
And sailed through bloody seas?"

But suppose your trials are terribl severe, have you forgotten what the great apostle Paul says? and surely he made no mistake, but "reckoned" correctly. Hear him. "For I reckon that the sufferings of this present time are not worthy to be compared with the glory which shall be revealed in us."—Rom. 8: 18. Paul (if I mistake not) had an opportunity of judging and forming a comparison, such as neither you or I ever had. You know he "was caught up [in vision] into Paradise, and heard unspeakable words, which it is not possible [margin] for a man to utter." (Probably the language, "I knew a man in Christ," etc., refers to what he had himself actually passed through.)

"But," say you, "I can scarcely bear up now, and my trials keep increasing; it seems to me that I cannot hold out much longer." Yes, dear tried one; and does not the grace of God in your heart, and your ability to bear trials, increase also? This is the very object for which trials are sent, or permitted; that you may "grow in grace"—have more faith in God.

"Let those that sow in sadness wait
Till the fair harvest come,
They shall confess their sheaves are great,
And shout the blessing home."

Did you ever consider that your trials, afflictions and sorrows are an indication of the love and favor of God toward you? Saith the apostle, "Whom the Lord loveth, them he chasteneth, and scourgeth every son whom he receiveth." But woe to that professor of religion who is left to sail along without them! For the Master continues, "But if ye be without chastisement, whereof all are partakers, then are ye bastards, and not sons." Then, my brethren, "think it not strange concerning the fiery trial which is to try you, as though some strange thing happened unto you; but rejoice, inasmuch as ye are partakers of Christ's sufferings; that when his glory shall be revealed, ye may be glad with exceeding joy."

Northfield, Mass. H. P. S[illegible].

☞ Dr. Doddridge said: "I never advanced well in human learning without prayer, and that he always made most proficiency in his studies when he prayed with the greatest fervency."

PAY YOUR PREACHERS.

"Even so hath the Lord ordained, that they which preach the gospel should live of the gospel."—1 Cor. 9: 14.

I would like to say a few words in behalf of those who preach. Although not a preacher myself, I know something about the state of things existing at the present time.

How does the text look to you, who have your thousands? I think it is a hard text to spiritualize. In the course of my christian life I have heard and known of some rather hard and trying circumstances that some of the servants of Christ have had to pass through, yet they may not complain. But what if they do not? Does that excuse those who have an abundance of this world's goods? Think you of these things, with your fine houses and lands? And you who have no houses or lands, you whom God has prospered with good health, so that you can work? Think for a moment of some God has called to go out into the world to proclaim his gospel. How is it with them? Perhaps they once worked by your side, could do as well as you, had as many of the comforts of life. Methinks it is not so with some of them now. Think of him as he goes from place to place. How is it when he returns to his home after being absent one, two, three weeks, or more, preaching and studying, we being blessed by his labors. Think of his family, not having enough food in the house to last one day. The meal most gone in the barrel, and the oil in the cruise. Where is the money to buy more? So they are compelled to go to work and pay up, then start again, with the words of the apostle resting on them—"Woe is me, if I preach not the gospel."

Is this right? I think not. "Thou shalt not muzzle the mouth of the ox that treadeth out the corn. Doth God take care for oxen? Or saith he it altogether for our sakes? For our sakes, no doubt, this is written. Again, "If (they) have sown unto (us) spiritual things, is it a great thing if (they) reap (our) carnal things?" Thus teaches the word of God. May God help us all to think these things over, and see if all is right, asking the good Lord to lead and guide us. I pray God to pardon me where I have come short in these things, and help me to do my part in the future. May we all realize that our time of giving will soon be over, and so live and give that in that great day the Master will say unto us, "Inasmuch as ye have done it unto one of the least of these my brethren, ye have done it unto me." Let us remember, also, he said, "The workman is worthy of his hire."

Perhaps not all the servants of Christ are needy, but some are. Should they happen to come to you, and you are aware of the fact, will you remember them and try to help them along by giving what the Lord requires at your hand, remembering God has said, "Cast thy bread upon the waters, for thou shalt find it after many days."

More might be said on this subject, but we hope a word to the wise may be sufficient. Perhaps some may say, If God has called them to preach his gospel, he will take care of them. So he will, but does he require anything at our hands? I think he does.

I do not think they should call on the ungodly for their support. It is our duty to see that they do not suffer. May the Lord help us to do it.

I will close by asking you to remember in your prayers the preachers, remember their wives and little ones at home, remember the servants everywhere, remember the poor and needy, the afflicted, the sorrowing, those that are mourning the loss of near and dear friends. Remember the cross of Christ. Remember the trials and sufferings he passed through. Remember his commandments. Remember to have an eye single to the glory of God. Remember to deny self, and take up the cross and follow him. Finally, dear brethren and sisters, let us remember each other in our prayers, and be patent in all things.

Concord, N. H. JOHN T. KIMBALL.

THE DUTY OF REPROVING.

Reproving is one of those "weapons" which the apostle speaks of as not being "carnal, but mighty through God to the pulling down of strong holds." 2 Cor. 10. It is one of those "daily crosses" which Christ has commanded us to bear, if we would be his followers. It is evident that if we love God with all our heart, we will hate sin in the same proportion; and if we love our neighbors as ourselves, we will feel as deeply interested in their soul's salvation as our own, and consequently we will not suffer sin upon them. Those who profess to love God, and can bear to hear his name profaned, and see his holy Sabbath polluted, without reproving the offenders, are still "in the gall of bitterness, and in the bond of iniquity." It is impossible to be a child of God and neglect this duty; for the command is, "Thou shalt not hate thy brother in thine heart; thou shalt in anywise rebuke thy neighbor, and not suffer sin upon him." Lev. 19: 17.

Mr. Wesley says, "Let us consider, first, what is the duty that is here enjoined? What is it we are to rebuke or reprove? And what is it to reprove? To tell any one of his faults, as clearly appears from the following words: "Thou shalt not suffer sin upon him." Sin is, therefore, the thing we are called to reprove, or rather, him that commits sin. We are to do all that in us lies, to convince him of his fault, and lead him into the right way. Love indeed requires us to warn him, not only of sin, (although of this chiefly), but likewise of any error, which, if it were persisted in, would naturally lead to sin. If we do not 'hate him in our heart,' if we love our neighbor as ourselves, this will be our constant endeavor: to warn him of every evil way, and of every mistake which tends to evil.

But if we desire not to lose our labor, we should rarely reprove any one for any thing that is of a disputable nature; that will bear much to be said on both sides. A thing may possibly appear evil to me; therefore I scruple the doing of it: and if I were to do it while that scruple remains, I should be a sinner before God; but another is not to be judged by my conscience; to his own Master he standeth or falleth. Therefore I would not reprove him but for what is clearly and undeniably evil. Such, for instance, is profane cursing and swearing, which even those who practice it most will not often venture to defend. [illegible] persist to do it, if you look them steadily in the face, and appeal to their own conscience in the sight of God.

Let me, in the second place, consider who are those that we are called to reprove? It is the more needful to consider this, because it is affirmed, by many serious persons that there are sinners whom the Scriptures themselves forbid us to reprove. This sense has been put on that solemn caution of our Lord, in his sermon on the Mount: "Cast not your pearls before swine, lest they trample them under foot, and turn again and rend you." But the plain meaning of these words is, do not offer the pearls, the sublime doctrines or mysteries of the gospel, to those whom you know to be brutish men, immersed in sins, and having no fear of God before their eyes. This would expose the precious jewel to contempt, and yourselves to injurious treatment. But even those whom we know to be, in the Lord's sense, dogs and swine, if we saw them do, or heard them speak, what they themselves know to be evil, we ought in any wise to reprove; else we "hate our brother in our heart." The persons intended by our "neighbor" are, every child of man; every one that breathes the vital air; all that have souls to be saved. And if we refrain from performing this office of love to any, because they are sinners above other men, they may persist in iniquity, but their blood will God require at our hands. . . . .

Again Mr. Wesley says, "I never heard or read of any considerable revival of religion, which was not attended with a spirit of reproving. I believe it cannot be otherwise; for what is faith unless it worketh by love? Thus it was in every part of England, when the present revival of religion began, about fifty years ago; all the subjects of that revival, all the Methodists, so called in every place, were reprovers of outward sin." And indeed, so are all that "being justified by faith, have peace with God through Jesus Christ." Such they are at first; and if they use that precious gift, it will never be taken away. Come, brethren, in the name of God, let us begin again! Rich or poor, let us all arise as one man! And in anywise, let every man "rebuke his neighbor and not suffer sin upon him."—Ex.

ALCOHOLIC MEDICATION.

How does alcohol act? Mark you, there is no basis, nor pretended basis, for its employment as a medicine, except the hypothesis that, in some peculiar manner, it acts on some one or more of the tissues, structures, parts or organs of the living system, and that such action maintains or supports the vital powers, under various depressing influences, and in numerous conditions of disease.

Now, the proposition that alcohol acts on the living system is either true or false. There is no compromise, like rum and sugar, no "half-and-half," like milk and whiskey, about it. And thus we have, again, a direct issue—a simple Yes or No. And on these two little but now mighty monosyllables—Yes, No—I predicate my whole argument for teetotal Temperance and against Alcoholic Medication.

If the proposition be true that alcohol does, in some way, even though no one can tell how, really act on the living system, the presumption may be reasonable, that such action may possibly be useful. But, suppose that we can prove the proposition to be untrue? Where, then, will be the basis for Alcoholic Medication?

Now I deny that alcohol acts on the living system at all. I deny that alcohol has a "special affinity" for the brain, or any affinity for any living tissue. The relation is the contrary—that of antagonism.

The modus operandi of medicines, as assumed in medical schools is, and always has been, a pernicious and most disastrous error—a fatal mistake. The popular medical doctrine just reverses the order of nature. It has given us a false medical philosophy, and an unsuccessful Healing Art. Its first premise is wrong. Its fundamental principle is a mistake. Its basis is a physiological fallacy.

And so is the popular idea or theory of the nature of disease. On this subject, also, the medical profession teaches a false doctrine. It confounds the causes of disease with the disease itself, it makes the "vis medicatrix naturæ" for an entity at war upon it. And in attempting to subdue or counteract, or neutralize or destroy the imaginary enemy, it is really warring upon the vitality of the patient.

In the relations between living and dead matter, the dead matter does not act on the living, although this is the doctrine of medical books. But on the contrary, the living matter acts on the dead. This is the law of Nature.

Alcohol is no part of any living thing. It belongs to the inorganic world. It is in no sense vital, nor vitalizing. Its properties are chemical not vital; and there is no chemistry in living structures. In its relation to living structures, alcohol is dead, inert, passive, as are all other inorganic substances. And this remark is true of all medicines and all poisons.

Tell me not that learned men, that great and good men, have always taught the contrary. That is not our question. We are not discussing what learned men have taught, but what Nature does teach. What is truth? This is our subject.

The medical profession will tell us, if it argues this point, that alcohol produces or occasions certain effects. Granted. And you may ask, "What is the difference whether alcohol acts itself or superinduces an action, so long as action in some way results? It is all difference. It is just the difference between life and death. The gist of our controversy lies in the kind of action. And the kind and quality of the action, and the good or evil of it, can only be determined by the solution of the primary question, whether the alcohol acts on the living system, or the living system on the alcohol.

The knowledge of what acts, and how, when living and dead matter come in contact, is the vital prerequisite to an understanding of the rationale of the effects of such action.

It makes all difference, in understanding the problems connected with the several subjects, whether external objects act on the mind or body, or the mind or body on them;—whether a man eats his dinner, or his dinner eats him; whether the earth revolves around the sun, or the sun around the earth; whether the horse draws the cart, or the cart pushes the horse; in a word, whether the whale swallowed Jonah, or whether Jonah swallowed the whale!

How can we know whether the actions or the effects of alcohol are useful or injurious, unless we can understand the mode, manner, wherefore—the rationale of such actions or effects; and how can we comprehend the rationale unless we know which is the acting and which the passive agent?

Medical men tell us that alcohol first acts on [illegible] from whence no traveler returns." He was "kept up" as the London Lancet informed us, for six days, by alcoholic stimulants, and on the seventh day his system refused any longer to respond, and he died. It was said that he died of typhoid fever. The real disease was alcoholism.

If it is the living system only which acts, as I contend, when alcohol, or any other poison, or any non-usable substance, is brought in contact with its structures, then the question arises, What is the nature of the action?

Those who contend that the alcohol acts, have never been able to explain the nature of its action; nor have they ever explained, nor can they explain, the rationale of a single one of its acknowledged effects, on the theory that it acts on the living system. But, on the theory which I advocate, that it is the living system only which acts, all of its effects are intelligible and explainable. I repeat, then, the gist of the whole argument is, the rationale of its effects.—Dr. Trall.

THE RAW PORK DISEASE.

We have on more than one occasion lately pointed out some of the discoveries that are constantly going on in regard to classes of Entozoa; that is, those microscopic insects which breed and live only within man or other animals, many of which produce the most fatal consequences. The importance of the practical study of this subject may be seen by the fact that in one little town or village in the environs of Magdeburg, called Ederslebeu, upwards of a hundred adults have died since Christmas, and three hundred more were in the middle of January at the point of death, of "trichonosis," a disease so called because produced by trichinæ. This is a species of spiral worm, not the thickness of a hair, the eggs of which are taken into the system in diseased pork imperfectly cooked, and multiply by millions, sometimes producing death almost immediately as if by cholera, and at other times penetrating to the most remote parts of the body, the eggs being carried round in the blood, and lodging, and breeding and feeding on every part of the human organization, producing agonizing pains, constitutional disturbance, and death in a thousand ways.

There are some kinds of entozoa that seem to seek out the muscles and develop there, burrowing instinctively into the flesh, but others penetrate the nervous system, and especially the brain, entering even into the fluids of the eye itself, and there living. In fact, a man's foes become those of his own household, of his own body. At Berlin, a meeting of the town councillors, butchers, doctors, and a sprinkling of the general public, was held about Christmas, and Professor Virchow produced a piece of smoked sausage and pork, which he had examined with the microscope and pronounced highly trichinous. A Dr. Urban, a veterinary practitioner, got up and said that the trichinæ were the most innocent animals in the world and harmless, and that it was only doctors without practice that made a fuss about them, to create occupation for themselves. The Professors of the Medical school, in great excitement, demanded an apology and retraction, and finally that, if this was refused, Dr. Urban should eat some of the diseased sausage. After making every possible excuse, he at length seized the sausage and bit a piece off and ate it, but immediately left the room. One account says that he instantly took a strong emetic that made him sick. But another says that five days later he was confined to his bed and his arms paralyzed, but whether from an emetic or from the sausage there was some dispute. The impression was that it was the latter. The Berlin butchers now have all pork meat examined under a microscope, without which the people will not buy or eat it. Large quantities of pork are, however, exported to England. But there the more thorough process of cooking seems to destroy most of the danger. Such meat, however, is not absolutely safe as food until the whole has been subjected to a heat of 200 degrees Fahrenheit.

It is said that a case has recently been distinctly traced in Indiana, where a young lady died in great agony from this disease. There is no doubt but that the Mosaic and Mohammedan prohibition of pork was founded on its great likelihood of producing this very disease. The hog is a filthy feeder where food is scarce, and often on the excrements of other animals. Now the law of existence for these entozoa seems to be that they can only come to life in the intestines of one animal where they deposit their eggs, which never come to anything until vitalized in some way by the gastric juice of the stomach. Hence this tendency of the hog makes it the most dangerous of all animals for producing this disease.

Of course this suggests care in the feeding of hogs designed for human food. It is the careless, over economical habits of the feeders of this class of animals that render their meat in some cases unwholesome. The acorns of the American forests never produce this class of diseases, but in overcrowded populations, by want of care to guard against this danger, one diseased animal may infect a whole drove and decimate a town or village. Pork not well cooked, the history of which is unknown, has always more or less of danger and should be avoided. Well-boiled ham is safe enough, but raw ham and sausages are not safe merely because they have been salted and smoked. Pigs and rabbits seem to be the chief depositories of trichinæ. Richard Owen first discovered them with the microscope in 1855.

HEART LONGINGS.

I long to see my Savior, and hear his blessed voice;
I have given all for Jesus, and he is now my choice;
I once was lost in darkness, and hardly knew my way,
But oh! the blessed Savior has turned my night to day.

I love to think of Jesus while sickness is my lot;
The peace he daily gives me can never be forgot;
He's promised to go with me through death's dark, narrow way,
And cheer me in the valley, and point to endless day.

I lean upon my Savior; he's gentle, meek and mild,
He is my loving Savior, the "Father's only child";
I'll cast my care on Jesus, he ever cares for me,
And in that blessed morning his face I then shall see.

Oh what a precious Savior; he ever is my all,
He'll ever to me listen when on him I do call;
I'll trust my all on Jesus, and when he comes again,
He'll say, "afflicted daughter, with me you e'er shall reign."

MISSION LETTERS FROM SWITZERLAND.

NUMBER FIVE.

BRO GRANT:—Hoping that some of your readers are still interested in my labors in this part of the Lord's vineyard, and would like to read a letter occasionally from this little Swiss Republic, I again take my pen to address you, and them, through the medium of the Crisis

To me the present is a time of great interest in the world's history, and my heart is filled with gratitude to God that I live in this age, and am permitted to be a humble worker in this time of "preparation." It seems to me that God in his providence is arranging every thing in this world to the end that people may understand its destiny, that they may be warned of what is soon coming, the great and terrible day of the Lord, and the year of his redeemed, that they may be without excuse, if found unprepared. There has been a governmental movement in this Republic recently, very interesting to me

Notwithstanding its professions of liberty, there has been heretofore but little religious liberty in Switzerland, except in a few cantons. The national church, the Roman Catholic, and Jews, being the only sects tolerated by law, but there has recently been a great movement in all the cantons, which resulted in a change of the constitution in that as well as some other important respects, the 14th of January Now the word of God may be preached freely in all parts of this Republic. May the Lord also open the way for the spread of truth in other European countries now darkened by intolerance and superstition, is my prayer.

It is a great satisfaction to one who believes in God and his immutable laws, which sooner or later must be recognized, to see any approximation to them on the part of worldly governments; and we especially, who watch the signs of the times, and believe that God is directing all events to the merciful end, that all who will may be saved, must look upon the movements of the present with great interest and satisfaction.

After writing my last letter to you, just after the opening of the year, I remained at home most of the time for two weeks, as little could be done publicly at that season, every one being busy his secular affairs. Jan. 17th I left home for Bullet, one of the flourishing villages of Mont Jura, some three hours' walk from Grandson I delivered there four lectures in the college to good and attentive congregations.

From there I was invited to Buttes, a larger village, some three hours' distant The large National Temple was tendered me for lectures, and the excellent pastor, Mr Evard, gave me the kind hospitalities of his house I lectured four times, and was listened to very attentively by a very large congregation, which filled the Temple At their close, the venerable pastor expressed his gratitude that I had visited them to warn them of the near approach of the coming and kingdom of Christ, and exhorted them to heed the warning and prepare for what was soon coming on the earth. Several ministers, men of much intelligence and pretty well educated in Hebrew and Greek, attended the lectures, and spent much time with me in private, discussing those great Bible truths of particular importance at the present time, and acknowledged their force.

From Buttes I was invited to the little city of Fleurier (twenty minutes walk from there), by Mr. Coulon, pastor of its National church, where I spent a week laboring as God gave me ability, privately through the day, and publicly evenings. It was a season of great solemnity, and the blessing of God was manifested in power. At the close of my lectures, I listened to an excellent sermon on the signs of the times, by the pastor of the church

I returned home the 5th inst, impressed deeply with a sense of the mercy of God, and the importance of his work In the three places where I lectured, God was with me to assist in the presentation of his truth, and sent it home with power to the hearts of the hearers.

Dear brethren and sisters, I feel increased confidence wherever I present these great Bible truths, that God is in this work, and that it will go forward. However Satan, through his agents, may clog the wheels, so that for a time it may seem to be retarded, yet it will not be stopped. The coming and kingdom of Christ must be preached, and if those who have long professed faith in these great truths do not carry forward the work, God will raise up others to do it. Christ said, "if these should hold their peace the stones would immediately cry out."—Luke 19: 40.

The field that I have visited between Lake Neuchatel and France is very rich and interesting. The large and flourishing villages among the Jura mountains are inhabited by a very intelligent people, who, through industry and economy, live in comfort and elegance. Such people are capable of understanding and appreciating truth. May God give many of their hearts to obey it. The 7th inst., I buried two in baptism in the beautiful lake of Neuchatel, one of them a lady of much intelligence and influence, the first fruits of my labor in Fleurier.

Being somewhat exhausted in strength, I felt the need of a few days' rest, and am now at home, but expect in a few days to go again to public labors. We receive frequent and excellent letters from Florence, Pisa, Turin, La Tour, etc., Italy. Our friends there are very firm and faithful. Glory be to God.

Just as I [illegible] I had the [illegible] of very kind christian letter from Bro. W. B. Hargo, enclosing a draft for 542 francs, a contribution from dear American [illegible] Mission. May God reward them for their kindness. Your brother in the hope of the gospel. M. B. CZECHOWSKI.

NUMBER TWENTY-FIVE.

THE DEATH OF SAUL AND JONATHAN.

A sad change had been wrought in the destiny of Israel, since that eventful night when the maidens sang the victory of David over the fallen foe. The power of Saul had waned in the changing years. He had driven forth the youthful hero, David, who might have been a tower of strength to his throne, because he was jealous of his growing favor with the people.

But soon the days of darkness came, and the stubborn Saul was left alone in his weakness, a prey to doubts and despair. The proud Philistines, the old foes of his kingdom, were preparing war again, and had assembled their thousands for the invasion of Israel. Saul gathered his forces and encamped upon the heights of Gilboa. As he surveyed the valley of Jezreel, swarming with the heathen hosts, his heart, once so valiant, died within him, for his coming doom seemed to cast its shadow before his appalled vision. He had madly strayed from the path of wisdom marked out by the prophet Samuel, and followed his own inclinations; and when in the adversity of his expiring reign he would fain inquire of the Lord, he received no answer, "Neither by dreams, nor by Urim, nor by prophets." Then in the depth of his despair, he bethought him of the witch who lived in distant Endor, and, as a last resort, he determined to visit her, and learn his doom.

That night, as the darkening shadows stole over the heights of Gilboa, and shrouded the lesser hills and vales of Manasseh in gloom, three solitary horsemen might have been seen wending their way over the rugged hills to the far off Endor. Night had far advanced ere the king and his followers reached the cave of the sorceress. Being assured of protection the hag performed her incantations, and pronounced the destiny of the trembling king

The dark revelation was too much for Saul, and he fell senseless to the earth. Recovering at last, he turned from the mysterious rites of Endor, and with a sad heart sought the camp of his warriors The morning star was paling in the east as he neared the tents of Israel, wan and dejected, with the burden of the future weighing heavily upon him With all the energy that despair had left him, he prepared for the conflict, vainly warring against his destiny

As the morning sun bathed the craggy brow of Gilboa with its wealth of golden light, and drank up the dew from the mountain flowers, the Philistine began to climb the heights and press the battle Saul, the warrior, who had triumphed in so many battles, fought with all the daring of dark despair, but it availed not His sons fell in the onset of the conflict, and the valiant men of Judah fled before the conquering Philistines, or stumbled upon the high places of the mountains to rise no more.

When the ill-starred Saul saw that all was lost, that the glory of his house had departed, and that the terrible foe were pressing close upon him, he called upon his servant to slay him, but he would not, then Saul fell upon his own sword, and died with the slain of Israel on that memorable day Then the triumphant foe carried the bodies of Saul and his sons, and fastened them in defiance to the walls of Beth-shan, and embellished the throne of Ashtaroth with their captured armor

Thus faded the glory of the house of Saul in one day of conflict, and Israel was put to shame before the foe that once had fled in dismay before the heroic valor of a youth

But where was the hero David, who turned the tide of war in other days? The years had changed his destiny, he was no longer the favored one of Saul, whose morose and jealous spirit had driven him out into the wild places of Judea, to subsist upon his own resources Yet an undying friendship, the most beautiful and touching in all history, had grown up between David and Jonathan, the son of Saul And when the cloud of Saul's displeasure lowered upon the path of David, Jonathan stood between him and the angry king Their friendship was pure, noble, and unselfish The vicissitudes of all the years changed it not, but added to its strength, and when Saul would fain have destroyed David and his party, Jonathan divulged all his father's plans, and warned him of the impending danger

But all this while the star of Saul was hastening to the horizon, to set in the night of overthrow, and that of David was rising in the luminous orient

David was encamped at Ziklag when the news of the last act in the tragedy reached him He did not rejoice in the overthrow of his old foe but generously forgot the enmity of the king in his sorrow for the death of his beloved friend Jonathan All the scenes of the past, the many endearing words, the vows of undying friendship, came rushing back from the distant years, like smiling dreams of boyhood. He forgot the dangers he had escaped, the hardships endured in that moment of agony, when he realized that his friend was no more. Then he gave utterance to a lamentation that has never been surpassed in any language for its pathetic beauty He lamented alike the foe and friend, he praised the father and son, and chanted for them a requiem, whose mournful music must have touched each heart, and thrilled each ear that listened

"The beauty of Israel is slain upon thy high places, how are the mighty fallen. Tell it not in Gath, publish it not in the streets of Askelon; lest the daughters of the Philistines rejoice, lest the daughters of the uncircumcised triumph. Ye mountains of Gilboa, let there be no dew, neither let there be rain upon you, nor fields of offerings; for there the shield of the mighty is vilely cast away, the shield of Saul as though he had not been anointed with oil. From the blood of the slain, from the fat of the mighty, the bow of Jonathan turned not back, and the sword of Saul returned not empty. Saul and Jonathan were lovely and pleasant in their lives, and in their death they are not divided; they were swifter than eagles, they were stronger than lions. Ye daughters of Israel, weep over Saul, who clothed you in scarlet, with other delights; who put on ornaments of gold upon you apparel. How are the mighty fallen in the midst of battle! O Jonathan, thou wast slain in thine high places. I am distressed for thee, my brother Jonathan; very pleasant hast thou been unto me; thy love to me was wonderful, passing the love of women. How are the mighty fallen, and the weapons of war perished."

The dynasty of Saul was ended. The way was opened for David to ascend the throne for which he had been anointed by the holy seer, Samuel. A new career of glory was about to open for Israel, that was to eclipse the greatness of the surrounding nations. David was to be the founder of a long line of illustrious kings, whose deeds would live through the ages. ORRIN P. ALLEN.

For the World's Crisis.

LONG ARTICLES, SERMONS, AND PRAYERS.

If it were possible to make people see under what disadvantages they labor through a long sermon, there would be a reform in this respect. People now-a-days will not sit as patiently as formerly under such inflictions. They know more about preaching, and comprehend faster. Said a brother to me,—

"I wish you would tell us who to send for to come and preach."

After proposing two or three, he said,—

"They preach so long we cannot stand it. When he was here he preached half the people out of the house, or to sleep, and when had to sum up, and wind up, and finish, and varnish, to have it look well. We do not like him."

Probably two-thirds of our preachers are in the habit of preaching too long. If they knew how much complaint there is about long preaching, they would reform, unless they are willful.

Preachers wonder they have so few invitations to preach. If I should call the names of those with whom the brethren are dissatisfied on this account, you would be astonished

A sermon over one hour is lost, two times out of ten. Crowd down too much, and you lose the whole. One half of the subject or an hour ought to be condensed into forty-five minutes. Some are guilty of holding the people one hour and a half, and some two hours or over Such ought to have sore throats, and God or nature thinks so, and gives it to them They do not so much more than others, because they preach so much longer

Such generally write long articles, which are not read but by few We want short, pointed articles of interest, of reformations, and those that feed the church down here, instead of those long, prosy ones, which must needs crowd out four or five short ones, either of which is worth more to the flock One editor said the men that had the longest articles were the most difficult to suit Perhaps all the editors might say Amen to this.

Long prayers are a great sign of a religion with no saving power in it It is generally formal, dry, and pharisaical It is generally understood by reformationists that the prayer which God answers and the people feel, in all ages, will not exceed from one to three minutes That is longer than the Lord's prayer His sermon on the Mount, which you will find in Matt 5, 6, and 7, the whole three chapters, would be a sermon of about thirty five to forty minutes His public prayers were in proportion Those who pray publicly fifteen to twenty minutes, and preach one hour and a half to two hours, never learned it of Jesus, nor of the apostles

Secret prayer, through which we can draw near to God, is not limited nor interrupted by other influences, as in public It has been remarked that those who pray the longest in public pray the least in secret The world is getting full of the form of godliness, let us shun it, and contend for the power, if we are unpopular and but few, God will give such the kingdom. HOLD ON

A raft with several men upon it was floating down the Ohio river The current of the river was strong and swift, and the channel narrow An island lay directly in the way and there was great danger that the raft might be dashed to pieces in attempting to pass between it and the shore

One of the passengers, but little accustomed to the river, became much frightened A tall, stout Indian, wearing a broad, leather belt, was steering the raft. He told the man to hold on to his belt and he would take care of him

"But we are in great danger"

"Hold on to my belt"

"I am afraid the raft will go to pieces"

"Hold on to my belt, and I will take care of you"

"But I cannot swim"

"Hold on to my belt, and I will swim ashore with you"

The Indian guided the raft safely through the narrow pass, and none on board were harmed

Our life is like a passage down a rapid river Temptations lie before us, and destruction is around us We are in danger of being wrecked and lost But there is One that can save us Jesus Christ is sitting at the helm and steering the course. In his strength and judgment we may safely confide. He is "mighty to save" He bids us hold on to him and trust in him.

"But the danger is great," we say.

"I, the Lord thy God, will hold thy right hand Fear not I will help thee."—Isa. 41 13

"But I am afraid I shall be lost I cannot resist my temptations to sin"

"Fear thou not, for I am with thee; be not dismayed, for I am thy God; I will strengthen thee, yea, I will help thee; yea, I will uphold thee with the right hand of my righteousness"—Isa 41 10 "God is faithful, who will not suffer you to be tempted above that ye are able, but will with the temptation also make a way to escape."—1 Cor. 10: 13

"But I cannot swim; I should sink beneath the waters, like Peter, and perish."

"Thus saith the Lord that created thee,—Fear not for I have redeemed thee, I have called thee by my name; thou art mine. When thou passest through the waters I will be with thee; and through the rivers, they shall not overflow thee. When thou walkest through the fire, thou shalt not be burned; neither shall the flame kindle upon thee."—Isa. 43: 1, 2.

Wandering, doubting, timid soul, come to Christ; believe in Christ; hold on to Christ. He is "girded about with strength." Righteousness is the girdle of his loins, and faithfulness the girdle of his reins. Cling to him, and you will be safe. No human strength is equal to uphold you, and no human wisdom is sufficient to guide you amid the dangers and temptations of your life. Jesus Christ alone can help you. But even He cannot aid you unless you hold on to him. You must prove your faith in him by doing as he bids you. And he will prove faithful to you: He will safely conduct you, through all the perils of your way, and bring you at last, unharmed and in peace, to rest in his salvation.

Reader, have you a hold on this Christ? Have you committed your soul to his keeping? Is he your pilot, your friend, your safety, and your trust? Are you grasping his strength, and clinging to his righteousness, and holding on to his truth?

Are you young, and do temptations beset you on every side? Do vain thoughts, and foolish ambitions, and childish vanities, and youthful lusts allure to deceive and ruin you? There is no safety for you but in holding on to Christ. You cannot breast the current alone. But he is sufficient for all things. Give up to him, and he will give you "a wise and an understanding heart, that you may know to refuse the evil and choose the good."

Or, are you aged? Has the light and gladness of early days faded before your dim eyes? Have you lived to see earthly hopes fail, and earthly friends die? Has the bitterness of sorrow, and the blight of sickness, taught you that "all is vanity and vexation of spirit"? Has your sun set, and your day of toil ended, and is the damp and chill and darkness and desolation of the night of death creeping upon you? Hold on to Christ. What else can you cling to? He alone can comfort or sustain you. When thou walkest through the valley of the shadow of death he will be with thee his rod and his staff will comfort thee.

God grant that we "remember and hold fast," and at last be found among the "righteous who have held on their way, and grown stronger and stronger." E A. ANNABLE

THE PILGRIM'S TRIALS.

Says one, "I am almost discouraged, my trials are so severe. While I was in the world, I used to get along well enough; but since I have been trying to serve the Lord, and have been waiting for his coming, trials have increased tenfold. I might about as well give up, for I can now scarcely keep my head above water, and my trials keep increasing"

Indeed! and how will they all look beside the deep humiliation, reproach and suffering of the crucified One? Have you ever experienced any trial which was sufficient to make a bloody sweat issue from the pores of your body? O! my brother, my sister, think not of your own petty trials they are scarcely worth noticing, when you consider the boundless, unfathomable love and condescension of the dear Lamb of God! And he endured all this, not for his own sake, but for yours And now are you unwilling to bear that which this same loving Redeemer sees necessary and best that you should bear?

Again, how will these trials of yours compare with those of your brethren—your "companions in tribulation," who have lived in by-gone days? Read the Book of Martyrs and see what those holy men and women were willing to endure for Christ's sake, and will may you be ashamed when you remember your own little trials and how you have shrunk from them

Constrained by the love of Jesus they yielded themselves the victims to the most shocking cruelty and barbarity which the ingenuity of men and devils could invent They had their bodies most terribly mangled and tortured, their eyes dug out, their tongues drawn out by the roots, their toes and other members pulled off with pincers, red hot irons applied to the most tender parts of their bodies were starved to death were locked in a large pan, and naked to death over a slow fire were almost drawn asunder, their limbs from their bodies, then suffered to recover, and again subjected to the same inhuman treatment, and this process several times repeated But these are but few of the numberless ways in which millions on millions have sealed their testimony with their blood Thousands on thousands have been tortured upon the rack, and time would fail me were I able to enumerate the black catalogue of tortures invented on that terrible engine of cruelty—The Inquisition

What think you, my brother, of trials like these? Do not any longer brood over that pigmy trial of yours, but rather let your heart be filled with joy, gratitude, and praise, that though they without us will not be made perfect, but, on the contrary, we shall with them receive an everlasting crown, that still your trials are so light comparatively

Must I be carried to the skies
On flowery beds of ease,
Whilst others fought to win the prize,
And sailed through bloody seas?

But suppose your trials are terrible severe, have you forgotten what the great apostle Paul says? and surely he made no mistake, but "reckoned" correctly Hear him "For I reckon that the sufferings of this present time are not worthy to be compared with the glory which shall be revealed in us"—Rom 8 18 Paul if I mistake not had an opportunity of judging and forming a comparison, such as neither you or I ever had You know he "was caught up [in vision] into Paradise, and heard unspeakable words, which it is not possible [margin] for a man to utter" (Probably the language, "I knew a man in Christ," etc., refers to what he had himself actually passed through)

"But," say you, "I can scarcely bear up now, and my trials keep increasing, it seems to me that I cannot hold out much longer" Yes, dear tried one, and does not the grace of God in your heart, and your ability to bear trials, increase also? This is the very object for which trials are sent, or permitted; that you may "grow in grace"—have more faith in God

"Let those that sow in sadness wait
Till the fair harvest come.
They shall confess their sheaves are great,
And shout the blessing home."

Did you ever consider that your trials, afflictions and sorrows are an indication of the love and favor of God toward you? Saith the apostle, "Whom the Lord loveth, them he chasteneth, and scourgeth every son whom he receiveth." But woe to that professor of religion who is left to sail along without them! For the Master continues, "But if ye be without chastisement, whereof all are partakers, then are ye bastards, and not sons." Then, my brethren, "think it not strange concerning the fiery trial which is to try you, as though some strange thing happened unto you; but rejoice, inasmuch as ye are partakers of Christ's sufferings; that when his glory shall be revealed, ye may be glad with exceeding joy."

Northfield, Mass. H. P. SIKES.

PAY YOUR PREACHERS.

"Even so hath the Lord ordained, that they which preach the gospel should live of the gospel."—1 Cor. 9: 14.

I would like to say a few words in behalf of those who preach. Although not a preacher myself, I know something about the state of things existing at the present time.

How does the text look to you, who have your thousands? I think it is a hard text to spiritualize. In the course of my christian life I have heard and known of some rather hard and trying circumstances that some of the ministers of Christ have had to pass through, yet they may not complain. But what if they do not? does that screen those who have an abundance of this world's goods? Think you of these things, with your fine houses and lands? And you who have no houses or lands, you whom God has prospered with good health, so that you can work? Think for a moment of some God has called to go out into the world to proclaim his gospel. How is it with them? Perhaps they once worked by your side, could do as well as you, had as many of the comforts of life. Methinks it is not so with some of them now Think of him as he goes from place to place. How is it when he returns to his home after being absent one, two, three weeks, or more, preaching and studying, we being blessed by his labors. Think of his family, not having enough food in the house to last one day. The meal most gone in the barrel, and the oil in the cruise. Where is the money to buy more? So they are compelled to go to work and pay up, then start again, with the words of the apostle resting on them—"Woe is me, if I preach not the gospel"

Is this right? I think not "Thou shalt not muzzle the mouth of the ox that treadeth out the corn. Doth God take care for oxen? Or saith he it altogether for our sakes? For our sakes, no doubt, this is written Again, "if (they) have sown unto (us) spiritual things, is it a great thing if (they) reap (our) carnal things?" Thus teaches the word of God May God help us all to think these things over, and see if all is right, asking the good Lord to lead and guide us I pray God to pardon me where I have come short in these things, and help me to do my part in the future May we all realize that our time of giving will soon be over, and so live and give that in that great day the Master will say unto us, "Inasmuch as ye have done it unto one of the least of these my brethren, ye have done it unto me" Let us remember, also, he said, "The workman is worthy of his hire."

Perhaps not all the servants of Christ are needy, but some are Should they happen to come to you, and you are aware of the fact, will you remember them and try to help them along by giving what the Lord requires at your hand, remembering God has said, "Cast thy bread upon the waters, for thou shalt find it after many days"

More might be said on this subject, but we hope a word to the wise may be sufficient Perhaps some may say, If God has called them to preach his gospel, he will take care of them So he will, but does he require anything at our hands I think he does

I do not think they should call on the ungodly for their support It is our duty to see that they do not suffer May the Lord help us to do it

I will close by asking you to remember in your prayers the preachers, remember their wives and little ones at home, remember the servants everywhere remember the poor and needy the afflicted, the sorrowing, those that are mourning the loss of near and dear friends Remember the cross of Christ Remember the trials and sufferings he passed through. Remember his commandments Remember to have an eye single to the glory of God Remember to deny self, and take up the cross and follow him Finally dear brethren and sisters, let us remember each other in our prayers and be patient in all things.

Concord, N H JOHN T KIMBALL

THE DUTY OF REPROVING.

Reproving is one of those "weapons" which the apostle speaks of as not being "carnal, but mighty through God to the pulling down of strong holds" 2 Cor 10 It is one of those "daily crosses" which Christ has commanded us to bear, if we would be his followers It is evident that if we love God with all our heart, we will hate sin in the same proportion; and if we love our neighbors as ourselves, we will feel as deeply interested in their soul's salvation as our own, and consequently we will not suffer sin upon them Those who profess to love God, and can bear to hear his name profaned, and see his holy Sabbath polluted, without reproving the offenders, are still "in the gall of bitterness, and in the bond of iniquity" It is impossible to be a child of God and neglect this duty, for the command is, "Thou shalt not hate thy brother in thine heart, thou shalt in anywise rebuke thy neighbor, and not suffer sin upon him." Lev 19 17

Mr Wesley says, "Let us consider, first, what is the duty that is here enjoined? What is it we are to rebuke or reprove? And what is it to reprove? To tell any one of his faults, as clearly appears from the following words "Thou shalt not suffer sin upon him." Sin is, therefore, the thing we are called to reprove, or rather, him that commits sin We are to do all that in us lies, to convince him of his fault, and lead him into the right way Love indeed requires us to warn him, not only of sin, (although of this chiefly), but likewise of any error, which, if it were persisted in, would naturally lead to sin. If we do not 'hate him in our heart,' if we love our neighbor as ourselves, this will be our constant endeavor: to warn him of every evil way, and of every mistake which tends to evil.

But if we desire not to lose our labor, we should rarely reprove any one for any thing that is of a disputable nature; that will bear much to be said on both sides. A thing may possibly appear evil to me; therefore I scruple the doing of it: and if I were to do it while that scruple remains, I should be a sinner before God; but another is not to be judged by my conscience; to his own Master he standeth or falleth. Therefore I would not reprove him but for what is clearly and undeniably evil. Such, for instance, is profane cursing and swearing, which even those who practice it most will not often venture to defend, if one mildly expostulates with them. Such is drunkenness, which even a habitual drunkard will condemn when he is sober. And such, in the account of the generality of people, is the profaning of the Lord's day. And if any, who are guilty of these sins, for a while attempt to defend them, very few will persist to do it, if you look them steadily in the face, and appeal to their own conscience in the sight of God.

Let us, in the second place, consider who are those that we are called to reprove? It is the more needful to consider this, because it is affirmed by many serious persons that there are sinners whom the Scriptures themselves forbid us to reprove. This sense has been put on that solemn caution of our Lord, in his sermon on the Mount: "Cast not your pearls before swine, lest they trample them under foot, and turn again and rend you." But the plain meaning of these words is, do not offer the pearls, the sublime doctrines or mysteries of the gospel, to those whom you know to be brutish men, immersed in sins, and having no fear of God before their eyes. This would expose the precious jewel to contempt, and yourselves to injurious treatment. But even those whom we know to be, in the Lord's sense, dogs and swine, if we saw them do, or heard them speak, what they themselves know to be evil, we ought in any wise to reprove; else we "hate our brother in our heart." The persons intended by our "neighbor" are, every child of man; every one that breathes the vital air; all that have souls to be saved. And if we refrain from performing this office of love to any, because they are sinners above other men, they may persist in iniquity, but their blood will God require at our hands. . . .

Again Mr. Wesley says, "I never heard or read of any considerable revival of religion, which was not attended with a spirit of reproving I believe it cannot be otherwise, for what is faith unless it worketh by love? Thus it was in every part of England, when the present revival of religion began, about fifty years ago; all the subjects of that revival, all the Methodists, so called in every place, were reprovers of outward sin And indeed, so are all that 'being justified by faith, have peace with God through Jesus Christ." Such they are at first, and if they use that precious gift, it will never be taken away Come, brethren, in the name of God let us begin again! Rich or poor let us all arise as one man! And in anywise, let every man "rebuke his neighbor and not suffer sin upon him"—Ex

"This is for your health."—Paul

ALCOHOLIC MEDICATION

How does alcohol act? Mark you, there is no basis, nor pretended basis, for its employment as a medicine, except the hypothesis that, in some peculiar manner, it acts on some one or more of the tissues, structures, parts or organs of the living system, and that such action maintains or supports the vital powers, under various depressing influences, and in numerous conditions of disease.

Now, the proposition that alcohol acts on the living system is either true or false There is no compromise, like rum and sugar, no "half and half," like milk and whiskey, about it And thus we have, again, a direct issue [illegible] And on these two little but now mighty monosyllables—Yes, No—I predicate my whole argument for teetotal Temperance and against Alcoholic Medication

If the proposition be true that alcohol does, in some way, even though no one can tell how, really act on the living system, the presumption may be reasonable, that such action may possibly be useful But, suppose that we can prove the proposition to be untrue Where, then, will be the basis for Alcoholic Medication?

Now I deny that alcohol acts on the living system at all I deny that alcohol has a special affinity for the brain, or any affinity for any living tissue The relation is the contrary—that of antagonism

The modus operandi of medicines, as assumed in medical schools is, and always has been, a pernicious and most disastrous error—a fatal mistake The popular medical doctrine just reverses the order of nature It has given us a false medical philosophy, and an unsuccessful Healing Art Its first premise is wrong Its fundamental principle is a mistake Its basis is a physiological fallacy

And so is the popular idea or theory of the nature of disease On this subject, also, the medical profession teaches a false doctrine It confounds the causes of disease with the disease itself, it makes the "vis medicatrix naturæ" for an entity at war upon it And in attempting to subdue or counteract, or neutralize or destroy the imaginary enemy, it is really warring upon the vitality of the patient

In the relations between living and dead matter, the dead matter does not act on the living, although this is the doctrine of medical books But on the contrary, the living matter acts on the dead. This is the law of Nature

Alcohol is no part of any living thing It belongs to the inorganic world It is in no sense vital, nor vitalizing Its properties are chemical not vital, and there is no chemistry in living structures In its relation to living structures, alcohol is dead, inert, passive, as are all other inorganic substances And this remark is true of all medicines and all poisons

Tell me not that learned men, that great and good men, have always taught the contrary That is not our question We are not discussing what learned men have taught, but what Nature does teach. What is truth? This is our subject.

The medical profession will tell us, if it argues this point, that alcohol produces or occasions certain effects Granted And you may ask, "What is the difference whether alcohol acts itself or superinduces an action so long as action in some way results? It is all difference. It is just the difference between life and death. The gist of our controversy lies in the kind of action. And the kind and quality of the action, and the good or evil of it, can only be determined by the solution of the primary question, whether the alcohol acts on the living system, or the living system on the alcohol

The knowledge of what acts, and how, when living and dead matter come in contact, is the vital prerequisite to an understanding of the rationale of the effects of such action.

It makes all difference, in understanding the problems connected with the several subjects, whether external objects act on the mind or body, or the mind or body on them:—whether a man eats his dinner, or his dinner eats him; whether the earth revolves around the sun, or the sun around the earth; whether the horse draws the cart, or the cart pushes the horse; in a word, whether the whale swallowed Jonah, or whether Jonah swallowed the whale!

How can we know whether the actions or the effects of alcohol are useful or injurious, unless we can understand the mode, manner, wherefore—the rationale, of such actions or effects; and how can we comprehend the rationale unless we know which is the acting and which the passive agent?

Medical men tell us that alcohol first acts on the living system, and then the system, "responds" or "reacts." I deny, totally, the doctrine of responsive action or reaction. That doctrine has slain its thousands. No doctrine can be better calculated to people grave-yards with untimely victims. It sent the late Prince Albert, in the prime of life, in the full vigor of manhood, "to that bourne from whence no traveler returns." He was "kept up" as the London Lancet informed us, for six days, by alcoholic stimulants, and on the seventh day his system refused any longer to respond, and he died. It was said that he died of typhoid fever. The real disease was alcoholismus.

If it is the living system only which acts, as I contend, when alcohol, or any other poison, or any non-usable substance, is brought in contact with its structures, then the question arises, What is the nature of the action?

Those who contend that the alcohol acts, have never been able to explain the nature of its action; nor have they ever explained, nor can they explain, the rationale of a single one of its acknowledged effects, on the theory that it acts on the living system. But, on the theory which I advocate, that it is the living system only which acts, all of its effects are intelligible and explainable. I repeat, then, the gist of the whole argument is, the rationale of its effects.—Dr. Trall

We have on more than one occasion lately pointed out some of the discoveries that are constantly going on in regard to classes of Entozoa, that is, those microscopic insects which breed and live only within man or other animals, many of which produce the most fatal consequences. The importance of the practical study of this subject may be seen by the fact that in one little town or village in the environs of Magdeburg called Edersleben, upwards of a hundred adults have died since Christmas, and three hundred more were in the middle of January at the point of death, of "trichonosis," a disease so called because produced by trichinæ This is a species of spiral worm, not the thickness of a hair, the eggs of which are taken into the system in diseased pork imperfectly cooked, and multiply by millions, sometimes producing death almost immediately as if by cholera, and at other times penetrating to the most remote parts of the body, the eggs being carried round in the blood, and lodging and breeding and feeding on every part of the human organization, producing agonizing pains, constitutional disturbance, and death in a thousand ways.

There are some kinds of entozoa that seem to seek out the muscles and develop there, burrowing instinctively into the flesh; others penetrate the nervous system and especially the brain, entering even into the fluids of the eye itself, and there living. In fact, a man's foes become those of his own household, of his own body At [illegible] meeting of the town councillors, [illegible] doctors, and a sprinkling of the general public, was held about Christmas, and Professor Virchow produced a piece of smoked sausage and pork, which he had examined with the microscope and pronounced highly trichinous. A Dr Urban a veterinary practitioner, [illegible] and said that the trichinæ were the most innocent animals in the world and harmless [illegible] that it was only doctors without practice [illegible] made a fuss about them, to create occupation for themselves The Professors of the Medical school, in great excitement, demanded an apology and retraction, and finally [illegible] this was refused Dr Urban should [illegible] of the diseased sausage After making every possible excuse, he at length seized the sausage and bit a piece off and ate it, but immediately left the room One account says [illegible] he instantly took a strong emetic that made him sick But another says that five days later he was confined to his bed and his limbs paralyzed, but whether from an emetic or from the sausage there was some dispute The impression was that it was the latter For [illegible] lin butchers now have all pork meat examined under a microscope, without which people will not buy or eat it Large quantities of pork are, however, exported to England. But there the more thorough process of cooking seems to destroy most of the danger Such meat, however, is not always safe as food until the whole has been [illegible] to a heat of 200 degrees Fahrenheit

It is said that a case has recently been [illegible] traced in Indiana, where a young [illegible] died in great agony from this disease [illegible] is no doubt but that the Mosaic and Mohammedan prohibition of pork was founded [illegible] great likelihood of producing this very disease The hog is a filthy feeder where food is scarce and often on the excrements of other animals Now the law of existence for these entozoa seems to be that they can only come to [illegible] the intestines of one animal where they deposit their eggs, which never come to anything until vitalized in some way by the gastric juice of the stomach Hence this tendency of the hog makes it the most dangerous of all animals for producing this disease

Of course this suggests care in the feeding of hogs designed for human food It is the careless, over economical habits of the feeders of this class of animals that render their meat in some cases unwholesome The swine of the American forests never produce this class of diseases, but in overcrowded populations, by want of care to guard against the danger, one diseased animal may infect a whole drove and decimate a town or village Pork not well cooked the history of which is unknown, has always more or less of danger and should be avoided. Well-boiled ham is safe enough, but raw ham and sausages are not safe merely because they have been salted and smoked Pigs and rabbits seem to be the chief depositories of trichinæ [illegible] Owen first discovered them with the microscope in 1835

HEART LONGINGS.

I long to see my Savior, and hear his blessed voice;
I have given all for Jesus, and he is now my choice;
I once was lost in darkness, and hardly knew my way,
But oh! the blessed Savior has turned my night to day.

I love to think of Jesus while sickness is my lot;
The peace he daily gives me can never be forgot;
He's promised to go with me through death's dark, narrow way,
And cheer me in the valley, and point to endless day.

I lean upon my Savior; he's gentle, meek and mild,
He is my loving Savior, the "Father's only child";
I'll cast my care on Jesus, he ever cares for me,
And in that blessed morning his face I then shall see.

Of what a precious Savior; he ever is my all,
He listens to the [illegible] when on him I do call;
I'll trust my all on Jesus, and when he comes again,
He'll say, "afflicted daughter, with me, you ever shall reign."

MISSION LETTERS FROM SWITZERLAND.

NUMBER FIVE.

BRO. GRANT:—Hoping that some of your readers are still interested in my labors in this part of the Lord's vineyard, and would like to read a letter occasionally from this little Swiss Republic, I again take my pen to address you, and them, through the medium of the Crisis.

To me the present is a time of great interest in the world's history, and my heart is filled with gratitude to God that I live in this age, and am permitted to be a humble worker in this time of "preparation." It seems to me that God in his providence is arranging every thing in this world to the end that people may understand its destiny, that they may be warned of what is soon coming, the great and terrible day of the Lord, and the year of his redeemed, that they may be without excuse, if found unprepared. There has been a governmental movement in this Republic recently, very interesting to me.

Notwithstanding its professions of liberty, there has been heretofore but little religious liberty in Switzerland, except in a few cantons. The national church, the Roman Catholic, and Jews, being the only sects tolerated by law; but there has recently been a great movement in all the cantons, which resulted in a change of the constitution in that as well as some other important respects, the 14th of January. Now the word of God may be preached freely in all parts of this Republic. May the Lord also open the way for the spread of truth in other European countries now darkened by intolerance and superstition, is my prayer.

It is a great satisfaction to one who believes in God and his immutable laws, which sooner or later must be recognized, to see any approximation to them on the part of worldly governments; and we especially, who watch the signs of the times, and believe that God is directing all events to the merciful end, that all who will may be saved, must look upon the movements of the present with great interest and satisfaction.

After writing my last letter to you, just after the opening of the year, I remained at home most of the time for two weeks, as little could be done publicly at that season, every one being busy his secular affairs. Jan. 17th I left home for Bullet, one of the flourishing villages of Mont Jura, some three hours' walk from Grandson. I delivered there four lectures in the college to good and attentive congregations.

From there I was invited to Buttes, a larger village, some three hours' distant. The large National Temple was tendered me for lectures, and the excellent pastor, Mr. Evard, gave me the kind hospitalities of his house. I lectured four times, and was listened to very attentively by a very large congregation, which filled the Temple. At their close, the venerable pastor expressed his gratitude that I had visited them to warn them of the near approach of the coming and kingdom of Christ, and exhorted them to heed the warning and prepare for what was soon coming on the earth. Several ministers, men of much intelligence and pretty well educated in Hebrew and Greek, attended the lectures, and spent much time with me in private, discussing those great Bible truths of particular importance at the present time, and acknowledged their force.

From Buttes I was invited to the little city of Fleurier (twenty minutes walk from there), by Mr. Coulon, pastor of its National church, where I spent a week laboring as God gave me ability, privately through the day, and publicly evenings. It was a season of great solemnity, and the blessing of God was manifested in power. At the close of my lectures, I listened to an excellent sermon on the signs of the times, by the pastor of the church.

I returned home the 6th inst., impressed deeply with a sense of the mercy of God, and the importance of his work. In the three places where I lectured, God was with me to assist in the presentation of his truth, and sent it home with power to the hearts of the hearers.

Dear brethren and sisters, I feel increased confidence wherever I present these great Bible truths, that God is in this work, and that it will go forward. However Satan, through his agents, may clog the wheels, so that for a time it may seem to be retarded, yet it will not be stopped. The coming and kingdom of Christ must be preached, and if those who have long professed faith in these great truths do not carry forward the work, God will raise up others to do it. Christ said, "if these should hold their peace the stones would immediately cry out."—Luke 19: 40.

The field that I have visited between Lake Neuchatel and France is very rich and interesting. The large and flourishing villages among the Jura mountains are inhabited by a very intelligent people, who, through industry and economy, live in comfort and elegance. Such people are capable of understanding and appreciating truth. May God give many of their hearts also to obey it. The 7th inst., I buried two in baptism in the beautiful lake of Neuchatel, one of them a lady of much intelligence and influence, the first fruits of my labor in Fleurier. [illegible]

NUMBER TWENTY-FIVE.

THE DEATH OF SAUL AND JONATHAN.

A sad change had been wrought in the destiny of Israel, since that eventful night when the maidens sang the victory of David over the fallen foe. The power of Saul had waned in the changing years. He had driven forth the youthful hero, David, who might have been a tower of strength to his throne, because he was jealous of his growing favor with the people.

But anon the days of darkness came, and the stubborn Saul was left alone in his weakness, a prey to doubts and despair. The proud Philistines, the old foes of his kingdom, were preparing war again, and had assembled their thousands for the invasion of Israel. Saul gathered his forces and encamped upon the heights of Gilboa. As he surveyed the valley of Jezreel, swarming with the heathen hosts, his heart, once so valiant, died within him, for his coming doom seemed to cast its shadow before his appalled vision. He had madly strayed from the path of wisdom marked out by the prophet Samuel, and followed his own inclinations; and when in the adversity of his expiring reign he would fain inquire of the Lord, he received no answer, "Neither by dreams, nor by Urim, nor by prophets." Then in the depth of his despair, he bethought him of the witch who lived in distant Endor, and, as a last resort, he determined to visit her, and learn his doom.

That night, as the darkening shadows stole over the heights of Gilboa, and shrouded the lesser hills and vales of Manasseh in gloom, three solitary horsemen might have been seen wending their way over the rugged hills to the far off Endor. Night had far advanced ere the king and his followers reached the cave of the sorceress. Being assured of protection the hag performed her incantations, and pronounced the destiny of the trembling king.

The dark revelation was too much for Saul, and he fell senseless to the earth. Recovering at last, he turned from the mysterious rites of Endor, and with a sad heart sought the camp of his warriors. The morning star was paling in the east as he neared the tents of Israel, wan and dejected, with the burden of the future weighing heavily upon him. With all the energy that despair had left him, he prepared for the conflict, vainly warring against his destiny.

As the morning sun bathed the craggy brow of Gilboa with its wealth of golden light, and drank up the dew from the mountain flowers, the Philistine began to climb the heights and press the battle. Saul, the warrior, who had triumphed in so many battles, fought with all the daring of dark despair, but it availed not. His sons fell in the onset of the conflict, and the valiant men of Judah fled before the conquering Philistines, or stumbled upon the high places of the mountains to rise no more.

When the ill-starred Saul saw that all was lost, that the glory of his house had departed, and that the terrible foe were pressing close upon him, he called upon his servant to slay him, but he would not; then Saul fell upon his own sword, and died with the slain of Israel on that memorable day. Then the triumphant foe carried the bodies of Saul and his sons, and fastened them in defiance to the walls of Beth-shan, and embellished the throne of Ashtaroth with their captured armor.

Thus faded the glory of the house of Saul in one day of conflict, and Israel was put to shame before the foe that once had fled in dismay before the heroic valor of a youth.

But where was the hero David, who turned the tide of war in other days? The years had changed his destiny, he was no longer the favored one of Saul, whose morose and jealous spirit had driven him out into the wild places of Judea, to subsist upon his own resources. Yet an undying friendship, the most beautiful and touching in all history, had grown up between David and Jonathan, the son of Saul. And when the cloud of Saul's displeasure lowered upon the path of David, Jonathan stood between him and the angry king. Their friendship was pure, noble, and unselfish. The vicissitudes of all the years changed it not, but added to its strength; and when Saul would fain have destroyed David and his party, Jonathan divulged all his father's plans, and warned him of the impending danger.

But all this while the star of Saul was hastening to the horizon, to set in the night of overthrow, and that of David was rising in the luminous orient.

David was encamped at Ziklag when the news of the last act in the tragedy reached him. He did not rejoice in the overthrow of his old foe, but generously forgot the enmity of the king in his sorrow for the death of his beloved friend Jonathan. All the scenes of the past, the many endearing words, the vows of undying friendship, came rushing back from the distant years, like smiling dreams of boyhood. He forgot the dangers he had escaped, the hardships endured in that moment of agony, when he realized that his friend was no more. Then he gave utterance to a lamentation that has never been surpassed in any language for its pathetic beauty. He lamented alike the foe and friend; he praised the father and son, and chanted for them a requiem, whose mournful music must have touched each heart, and thrilled each ear that listened.

"The beauty of Israel is slain upon thy high places; how are the mighty fallen. Tell it not in Gath, publish it not in the streets of Askelon; lest the daughters of the Philistines rejoice, lest the daughters of the uncircumcised triumph. Ye mountains of Gilboa, let there be no dew, neither let there be rain upon you, nor fields of offerings; for there the shield of the mighty is vilely cast away, the shield of Saul as though he had not been anointed with oil. From the blood of the slain, from the fat of the mighty, the bow of Jonathan turned not back, and the sword of Saul returned not empty. Saul and Jonathan were lovely and pleasant in their lives, and in their death they are not divided; they were [illegible] about to open for Israel, that was to eclipse the greatness of the surrounding nations. David was to be the founder of a long line of illustrious kings, whose deeds would live through the ages. ORRIN P. ALLEN.

LONG ARTICLES, SERMONS, AND PRAYERS.

If it were possible to make people see under what disadvantages they labor through a long sermon, there would be a reform in this respect. People now-a-days will not sit as patiently as formerly under such inflictions. They know more about preaching, and comprehend faster. Said a brother to me,—

"I wish you would tell us who to send for to come and preach."

After proposing two or three, he said,—

"They preach so long we cannot stand it. When he was here he preached half the people out of the house, or to sleep, and then had to sum up, and wind up, and finish, and varnish, to have it look well. We do not like him."

Probably two-thirds of our preachers are in the habit of preaching too long. If they knew how much complaint there is about long preaching, they would reform, unless they are willful.

Preachers wonder they have so few invitations to preach. If I should call the names of those with whom the brethren are dissatisfied on this account, you would be astonished.

A sermon over one hour is lost, two times out of ten. Crowd down too much, and you lose the whole. One half of the subject or an hour ought to be condensed into forty-five minutes. Some are guilty of holding the people one hour and a half, and some two hours or over. Such ought to have sore throats, and God or nature thinks so, and gives it to them. They do not so much more than others, because they preach so much longer.

Such generally write long articles, which are not read but by few. We want short, pointed articles of interest, of reformations, and those that feed the church down here, instead of those long, prosy ones, which must needs crowd out four or five short ones, either of which is worth more to the flock. One editor said the men that had the longest articles were the most difficult to suit. Perhaps all the editors might say Amen to this.

Long prayers are a great sign of a religion with no saving power in it. It is generally formal, dry, and pharisaical. It is generally understood by reformationists that the prayer which God answers and the people feel, in all ages, will not exceed from one to three minutes. That is longer than the Lord's prayer. His sermon on the Mount, which you will find in Matt. 5, 6, and 7, the whole three chapters, would be a sermon of about thirty-five to forty minutes. His public prayers were in proportion. Those who pray publicly fifteen to twenty minutes, and preach one hour and a half to two hours, never learned it of Jesus, nor of the apostles.

Secret prayer, through which we can draw near to God, is not limited nor interrupted by other influences, as in public. It has been remarked that those who pray the longest in public pray the least in secret. The world is getting full of the form of godliness; let us shun it, and contend for the power, if we are unpopular and but few, God will give such the kingdom. H. MUNGER.

HOLD ON.

A raft with several men upon it was floating down the Ohio river. The current of the river was strong and swift, and the channel narrow. An island lay directly in the way, and there was great danger that the raft might be dashed to pieces in attempting to pass between it and the shore.

One of the passengers, but little accustomed to the river, became much frightened. A tall, stout Indian, wearing a broad, leather belt, was steering the raft. He told the man to hold on to his belt and he would take care of him.

"But we are in great danger."

"Hold on to my belt."

"I am afraid the raft will go to pieces."

"Hold on to my belt, and I will take care of you."

"But I cannot swim."

"Hold on to my belt, and I will swim ashore with you."

The Indian guided the raft safely through the narrow pass, and none on board were harmed.

Our life is like a passage down a rapid river. Temptations lie before us, and destruction is around us. We are in danger of being wrecked and lost. But there is One that can save us. Jesus Christ is sitting at the helm and steering the course. In his strength and judgment we may safely confide. He is "mighty to save." He bids us hold on to him and trust in him.

"But the danger is great," we say.

"I, the Lord thy God, will hold thy right hand. Fear not; I will help thee."—Isa. 41: 13.

"But I am afraid I shall be lost. I cannot resist my temptations to sin."

"Fear thou not, for I am with thee; be not dismayed, for I am thy God; I will strengthen thee; yea, I will help thee; yea, I will uphold thee with the right hand of my righteousness."—Isa. 41: 10. "God is faithful, who will not suffer you to be tempted above that ye are able, but will with the temptation also make a way to escape."—1 Cor. 10: 13.

"But I cannot swim; I should sink beneath the waters, like Peter, and perish."

"Thus saith the Lord that created thee,—Fear not: for I have redeemed thee, I have called thee by my name; thou art mine. When thou passest through the waters I will be with thee; and through the rivers, they shall not overflow thee. When thou walkest through the fire, thou shalt not be burned; neither shall the flame kindle upon thee."—Isa. 43: 1, 2.

of your way, and bring you at last, unharmed and in peace, to rest in his salvation.

Reader, have you a hold on this Christ? Have you committed your soul to his keeping? Is he your pilot, your friend, your safety, and your trust? Are you grasping his strength, and clinging to his righteousness, and holding on to his truth?

Are you young, and do temptations beset you on every side? Do vain thoughts and foolish ambitions, and childish vanities, and youthful lusts allure to deceive and ruin you? There is no safety for you but in holding on to Christ. You cannot breast the current alone. But he is sufficient for all things. Give up to him, and he will give you "a wise and an understanding heart, that you may know to refuse the evil and choose the good."

Or, are you aged? Has the light and gladness of early days faded before your dim eyes? Have you lived to see earthly hopes fall, and earthly friends die? Has the bitterness of sorrow, and the blight of sickness, taught you that "all is vanity and vexation of spirit"? Has your sun set, and your day of toil ended, and is the damp and chill and darkness and desolation of the night of death creeping upon you? Hold on to Christ. What else can you cling to? He alone can comfort or sustain you. When thou walkest through the valley of the shadow of death he will be with thee: his rod and his staff will comfort thee.

God grant that we "remember and hold fast," and at last be found among the "righteous who have held on their way, and grown stronger and stronger." E. A. ANNABLE.

THE PILGRIM'S TRIALS.

Says one, "I am almost discouraged, my trials are so severe. While I was in the world, I used to get along well enough; but since I have been trying to serve the Lord, and have been waiting for his coming, trials have increased tenfold. I might about as well give up, for I can now scarcely keep my head above water, and my trials keep increasing."

Indeed! and how will they all look beside the deep humiliation, reproach and suffering of the crucified One? Have you ever experienced any trial which was sufficient to make a bloody sweat issue from the pores of your body? O! my brother, my sister, think not of your own petty trials; they are scarcely worth noticing, when you consider the boundless, unfathomable love and condescension of the dear Lamb of God! And he endured all this, not for his own sake, but for yours. And now are you unwilling to bear that which this same loving Redeemer sees necessary and best that you should bear?

Again, how will these trials of yours compare with those of your brethren—your "companions in tribulation," who have lived in by-gone days? Read the Book of Martyrs, and see what those holy men and women were willing to endure for Christ's sake, and well may you be ashamed when you remember your own little trials, and how you have shrunk from them.

Constrained by the love of Jesus they yielded themselves the victims to the most shocking cruelty and barbarity which the ingenuity of men and devils could invent. They had their bodies most terribly mangled and tortured, their eyes dug out, their tongues drawn out by the roots, their toes and other members pulled off with pincers, red hot irons applied to the most tender parts of their bodies, were starved to death, were locked in a large pan, and baked to death over a slow fire, were almost drawn asunder, their limbs from their bodies, then suffered to recover, and again subjected to the same inhuman treatment, and this process several times repeated. But these are but few of the numberless ways in which millions on millions have sealed their testimony with their blood. Thousands on thousands have been tortured upon the rack, and time would fail me (were I able) to enumerate the black catalogue of tortures invented in that terrible engine of cruelty—The Inquisition.

What think you, my brother, of trials like these? Do not any longer brood over that pigmy trial of yours, but rather let your heart be filled with joy, gratitude, and praise, that though "they without us will not be made perfect," but, on the contrary, we shall with them receive an everlasting crown, that still your trials are so light comparatively.

"Must I be carried to the skies
On flowery beds of ease,
Whilst others fought to win the prize,
And sailed through bloody seas?"

But suppose your trials are terribly severe; have you forgotten what the great apostle Paul says? and surely he made no mistake, but "reckoned" correctly. Hear him: "For I reckon that the sufferings of this present time are not worthy to be compared with the glory which shall be revealed in us."—Rom. 8: 18. Paul (if I mistake not) had an opportunity of judging and forming a comparison, such as neither you or I ever had. You know he "was caught up [in vision] into Paradise, and heard unspeakable words, which it is not possible [margin] for a man to utter." (Probably the language, "I knew a man in Christ," etc., refers to what he had himself actually passed through.)

"But," say you, "I can scarcely bear up now, and my trials keep increasing; it seems to me that I cannot hold out much longer." Yes, dear tried one; and does not the grace of God in your heart, and your ability to bear trials, increase also? This is the very object for which trials are sent, or permitted; that you may "grow in grace"—have more faith in God.

"Let those that sow in sadness wait
Till the fair harvest come,
They shall confess their sheaves are great,
And shout the blessing home."

Did you ever consider that your trials, afflictions and sorrows are an indication of the love and favor of God toward you? Saith the apostle, "Whom the Lord loveth, them he chasteneth, and scourgeth every son whom he receiveth." But woe to that professor of religion who is left to sail along without them! For the Master continues, "But if ye be with- [illegible]

PAY YOUR PREACHERS.

"Even so hath the Lord ordained, that they which preach the gospel should live of the gospel."—1 Cor. 9: 14.

I would like to say a few words in behalf of those who preach. Although not a preacher myself, I know something about the state of things existing at the present time.

How does the text look to you, who have your thousands? I think it is a hard text to spiritualize. In the course of my christian life I have heard and known of some rather hard and trying circumstances that some of the servants of Christ have had to pass through, yet they may not complain. But what if they do not? does that excuse those who have an abundance of this world's goods? Think you of these things, with your fine houses and lands? And you who have no houses or lands, you whom God has prospered with good health, so that you can work? Think for a moment of some God has called to go out into the world to proclaim his gospel. How is it with them? Perhaps they once worked by your side, could do as well as you, had as many of the comforts of life. Methinks it is not so with some of them now. Think of him as he goes from place to place. How is it when he returns to his home after being absent one, two, three weeks, or more, preaching and studying, we being blessed by his labors. Think of his family, not having enough food in the house to last one day. The meal most gone in the barrel, and the oil in the cruise. Where is the money to buy more? So they are compelled to go to work and pay up, then start again, with the words of the apostle resting on them—"Woe is me, if I preach not the gospel."

Is this right? I think not. "Thou shalt not muzzle the mouth of the ox that treadeth out the corn. Doth God take care for oxen? Or saith he it altogether for our sakes? For our sakes, no doubt, this is written ...." Again, "If (they) have sown unto (us) spiritual things, is it a great thing if (they) reap (our) carnal things?" Thus teaches the word of God. May God help us all to think these things over, and see if all is right, asking the good Lord to lead and guide us. I pray God to pardon me where I have come short in these things, and help me to do my part in the future. May we all realize that our time of giving will soon be over, and so live and give that in that great day the Master will say unto us, "Inasmuch as ye have done it unto one of the least of these my brethren, ye have done it unto me." Let us remember, also, he said, "The workman is worthy of his hire."

Perhaps not all the servants of Christ are needy, but some are. Should they happen to come to you, and you are aware of the fact, will you remember them and try to help them along by giving what the Lord requires at your hand, remembering God has said, "Cast thy bread upon the waters, for thou shalt find it after many days."

More might be said on this subject, but we hope a word to the wise may be sufficient. Perhaps some may say, If God has called them to preach his gospel, he will take care of them. So he will, but does he require anything at our hands? I think he does.

I do not think they should call on the ungodly for their support. It is our duty to see that they do not suffer. May the Lord help us to do it.

I will close by asking you to remember in your prayers the preachers, remember their wives and little ones at home; remember the servants everywhere, remember the poor and needy, the afflicted, the sorrowing, those that are mourning the loss of near and dear friends. Remember the cross of Christ. Remember the trials and sufferings he passed through. Remember his commandments. Remember to have an eye single to the glory of God. Remember to deny self, and take up the cross and follow him. Finally, dear brethren and sisters, let us remember each other in our prayers, and be patent in all things.

Concord, N. H. JOHN T. KIMBALL.

THE DUTY OF REPROVING.

Reproving is one of those "weapons" which the apostle speaks of as not being "carnal, but mighty through God to the pulling down of strong holds." 2 Cor. 10. It is one of those "daily crosses" which Christ has commanded us to bear, if we would be his followers. It is evident that if we love God with all our heart, we will hate sin in the same proportion; and if we love our neighbors as ourselves, we will feel as deeply interested in their soul's salvation as our own; and consequently we will not suffer sin upon them. Those who profess to love God, and can bear to hear his name profaned, and see his holy Sabbath polluted, without reproving the offenders, are still "in the gall of bitterness, and in the bond of iniquity." It is impossible to be a child of God and neglect this duty; for the command is, "Thou shalt not hate thy brother in thine heart; thou shalt in anywise rebuke thy neighbor, and not suffer sin upon him." Lev. 19: 17.

Mr. Wesley says, "Let us consider, first, what is the duty that is here enjoined? What is it we are to rebuke or reprove? And what is it to reprove? To tell any one of his faults, as clearly appears from the following words: 'Thou shalt not suffer sin upon him.' Sin is, therefore, the thing we are called to reprove, or rather, him that commits sin. We are to do all that in us lies, to convince him of his fault, and lead him into the right way. Love indeed requires us to warn him, not only of sin, (although of this chiefly), but likewise of any error, which, if it were persisted in, would naturally lead to sin. If we do not 'hate him in our heart,' if we love our neighbor as ourselves, this will be our constant endeavor: to warn him of every evil way, and of every mistake which tends to evil.

But if we desire not to lose our labor, we should rarely reprove any one for any thing that is of a disputable nature; that will bear much to be said on both sides. A thing may possibly appear evil to me; therefore I scruple the doing of it: and if I were to do it while that scruple remains, I should be a sin- [illegible] persist to do it; if you look them steadily in the face, and appeal to their own conscience in the sight of God.

Let us, in the second place, consider who are those that we are called to reprove? It is the more needful to consider this, because it is affirmed by many serious persons that there are sinners whom the Scriptures themselves forbid us to reprove. This sense has been put on that solemn caution of our Lord, in his sermon on the Mount: 'Cast not your pearls before swine, lest they trample them under foot, and turn again and rend you.' But the plain meaning of these words is, do not offer the pearls, the sublime doctrines or mysteries of the gospel, to those whom you know to be brutish men, immersed in sins, and having no fear of God before their eyes. This would expose the precious jewel to contempt, and yourselves to injurious treatment. But even those whom we know to be, in the Lord's sense, dogs and swine, if we saw them do, or heard them speak, what they themselves know to be evil, we ought in any wise to reprove; else we 'hate our brother in our heart.' The persons intended by our 'neighbor' are, every child of man; every one that breathes the vital air; all that have souls to be saved. And if we refrain from performing this office of love to any, because they are sinners above other men, they may persist in iniquity, but their blood will God require at our hands. . . . .

Again Mr. Wesley says, "I never heard or read of any considerable revival of religion, which was not attended with a spirit of reproving. I believe it cannot be otherwise; for what is faith unless it worketh by love? Thus it was in every part of England, when the present revival of religion began, about fifty years ago; all the subjects of that revival, all the Methodists, so called in every place, were reprovers of outward sin." And indeed, so are all that "being justified by faith, have peace with God through Jesus Christ." Such they are at first; and if they use that precious gift, it will never be taken away. Come, brethren, in the name of God, let us begin again! Rich or poor, let us all arise as one man! And in anywise, let every man "rebuke his neighbor and not suffer sin upon him."—Ex.

Hygiene.

"This is for your health."—Paul.

ALCOHOLIC MEDICATION.

How does alcohol act? Mark you, there is no basis, nor pretended basis, for its employment as a medicine, except the hypothesis that, in some peculiar manner, it acts on some one or more of the tissues, structures, parts or organs of the living system, and that such action maintains or supports the vital powers, under various depressing influences, and in numerous conditions of disease.

Now, the proposition that alcohol acts on the living system is either true or false. There is no compromise, like rum and sugar, no "half-and-half," like milk and whiskey, about it. And thus we have, again, a direct issue—a simple Yes or No. And on these two little but now mighty monosyllables—Yes, No—I predicate my whole argument for total Temperance and against Alcoholic Medication.

If the proposition be true that alcohol does, in some way, even though no one can tell how, really act on the living system, the presumption may be reasonable, that such action may possibly be useful. But, suppose that we can prove the proposition to be untrue? Where, then, will be the basis for Alcoholic Medication?

Now I deny that alcohol acts on the living system at all. I deny that alcohol has a "special affinity" for the brain, or any affinity for any living tissue. The relation is the contrary—that of antagonism.

The modus operandi of medicines, as assumed in medical schools is, and always has been, a pernicious and most disastrous error—a fatal mistake. The popular medical doctrine just reverses the order of nature. It has given us a false medical philosophy, and an unsuccessful Healing Art. Its first premise is wrong. Its fundamental principle is a mistake. Its basis is a physiological fallacy.

And so is the popular idea or theory of the nature of disease. On this subject, also, the medical profession teaches a false doctrine. It confounds the causes of disease with the disease itself; it makes the "vis medicatrix naturæ" for an entity at war upon it. And in attempting to subdue or counteract, or neutralize or destroy the imaginary enemy, it is really warring upon the vitality of the patient.

In the relations between living and dead matter, the dead matter does not act on the living, although this is the doctrine of medical books. But on the contrary, the living matter acts on the dead. This is the law of Nature.

Alcohol is no part of any living thing. It belongs to the inorganic world. It is in no sense vital, nor vitalizing. Its properties are chemical not vital, and there is no chemistry in living structures. In its relation to living structures, alcohol is dead, inert, passive, as are all other inorganic substances. And this remark is true of all medicines and all poisons.

Tell me not that learned men, that great and good men, have always taught the contrary. That is not our question. We are not discussing what learned men have taught, but what Nature does teach. What is truth? This is our subject.

The medical profession will tell us, if it argues this point, that alcohol produces or occasions certain effects. Granted. And you may ask, "What is the difference whether alcohol acts itself or superinduces an action, so long as action in some way results? It is all difference. It is just the difference between life and death. The gist of our controversy lies in the kind of action. And the kind and quality of the action, and the good or evil of it, can only be determined by the solution of the primary question, whether the alcohol acts on the living system, or the living system on the alcohol.

The knowledge of what acts, and how, when living and dead matter come in contact, is the vital prerequisite to an understanding of the rationale of the effects of such action.

It makes all difference, in understanding the problems connected with the several subjects, whether external objects act on the mind or body, or the mind or body on them;—whether a man eats his dinner, or his dinner eats him;—whether the earth revolves around the sun, or the sun around the earth;—whether the horse draws the cart, or the cart pushes the horse; in a word, whether the whale swallowed Jonah, or whether Jonah swallowed the whale! [illegible]

from whence no traveler returns." He was "kept up" as the London Lancet informed us, for six days, by alcoholic stimulants, and on the seventh day his system refused any longer to respond, and he died. It was said that he died of typhoid fever. The real disease was alcoholism.

If it is the living system only which acts, as I contend, when alcohol, or any other poison, or any non-usable substance, is brought in contact with its structures, then the question arises, What is the nature of the action?

Those who contend that the alcohol acts, have never been able to explain the nature of its action; nor have they ever explained, nor can they explain, the rationale of a single one of its acknowledged effects, on the theory that it acts on the living system. But, on the theory which I advocate, that it is the living system only which acts, all of its effects are intelligible and explainable. I repeat, then, the gist of the whole argument is, the rationale of its effects.—Dr. Trall.

THE RAW PORK DISEASE.

We have on more than one occasion lately pointed out some of the discoveries that are constantly going on in regard to classes of Entozoa; that is, those microscopic insects which breed and live only within man or other animals, many of which produce the most fatal consequences. The importance of the practical study of this subject may be seen by the fact that in one little town or village in the environs of Magdeburg, called Hedersleben, upwards of a hundred adults have died since Christmas, and three hundred more were in the middle of January at the point of death, of "trichonosis," a disease so called because produced by trichinæ. This is a species of spiral worm, not the thickness of a hair, the eggs of which are taken into the system in diseased pork imperfectly cooked, and multiply by millions, sometimes producing death almost immediately as if by cholera, and at other times penetrating to the most remote parts of the body, the eggs being carried round in the blood, and lodging, and breeding and feeding on every part of the human organization, producing agonizing pains, constitutional disturbance, and death in a thousand ways.

There are some kinds of entozoa that seem to seek out the muscles and develop there, burrowing instinctively into the flesh, but others penetrate the nervous system, and especially the brain, entering even into the fluids of the eye itself, and there living. In fact, a man's foes become those of his own household, of his own body. At Berlin, a meeting of the town councillors, butchers, doctors, and a sprinkling of the general public, was held about Christmas, and Professor Virchow produced a piece of smoked sausage and pork, which he had examined with the microscope and pronounced highly trichinous. A Dr. Urban, a veterinary practitioner, got up and said that the trichinæ were the most innocent animals in the world and harmless, and that it was only doctors without practice that made a fuss about them, to create occupation for themselves. The Professors of the Medical school, in great excitement, demanded an apology and retraction, and finally that, if this was refused, Dr. Urban should eat some of the diseased sausage. After making every possible excuse, he at length seized the sausage and bit a piece off and ate it, but immediately left the room. One account says that he instantly took a strong emetic that made him sick. But another says that five days later he was confined to his bed and his arms paralyzed, but whether from an emetic or from the sausage there was some dispute. The impression was that it was the latter. The Berlin butchers now have all pork meat examined under a microscope, without which the people will not buy or eat it. Large quantities of pork are, however, exported to England. But there the more thorough process of cooking seems to destroy most of the danger. Such meat, however, is not absolutely safe as food until the whole has been subjected to a heat of 200 degrees Fahrenheit.

It is said that a case has recently been distinctly traced in Indiana, where a young lady died in great agony from this disease. There is no doubt but that the Mosaic and Mohammedan prohibition of pork was founded on its great likelihood of producing this very disease. The hog is a filthy feeder where food is scarce, and often on the excrements of other animals. Now the law of existence for these entozoa seems to be that they can only come to life in the intestines of one animal where they deposit their eggs, which never come to anything until vitalized in some way by the gastric juice of the stomach. Hence this tendency of the hog makes it the most dangerous of all animals for producing this disease.

Of course this suggests care in the feeding of hogs designed for human food. It is the careless, over economical habits of the feeders of this class of animals that render their meat in some cases unwholesome. The acorns of the American forests never produce this class of diseases, but in overcrowded populations, by want of care to guard against this danger, one diseased animal may infect a whole drove and decimate a town or village. Pork not well cooked, the history of which is unknown, has always more or less of danger and should be avoided. Well-boiled ham is safe enough, but raw ham and sausages are not safe merely because they have been salted and smoked. Pigs and rabbits seem to be the chief depositories of trichinæ. Richard Owen first discovered them with the microscope in 1855.

☞ Most diseases not chronic can be cured by dietetic rules and exercise.

[illegible]

I long to see my Savior, and hear his blessed voice;
I have given all for Jesus, and he is now my choice;
I once was lost in darkness, and hardly knew my way,
But oh! the blessed Savior has turned my night to day.

I love to think of Jesus while distance is my lot;
The peace he daily gives me can never be forgot;
He's promised to go with me through death's dark, narrow way,
And show me in the valley, and point to endless day.

I lean upon my Savior; he's gentle, meek and mild,
He is my loving Savior, the "Father's only child";
I'll cast my care on Jesus, he ever cared for me,
And in that blessed morning his face I then shall see.

Of what a precious Savior; he ever is my all,
He'll ever be the Eden when on him I do call;
I'll trust my all on Jesus, and when he comes again,
He'll say, "afflicted daughter, with me, you, too, shall reign."

MISSION LETTERS FROM SWITZERLAND.

NUMBER FIVE.

BRO. GRANT:—Hoping that some of your readers are still interested in my labors in this part of the Lord's vineyard, and would like to read a letter occasionally from this little Swiss Republic, I again take my pen to address you, and them, through the medium of the Crisis.

To me the present is a time of great interest in the world's history, and my heart is filled with gratitude to God that I live in this age, and am permitted to be a humble worker in this time of "preparation." It seems to me that God in his providence is arranging every thing in this world to the end that people may understand its destiny, that they may be warned of what is soon coming, the great and terrible day of the Lord, and the year of his redeemed, that they may be without excuse, if found unprepared. There has been a governmental movement in this Republic recently, very interesting to me.

Notwithstanding its professions of liberty, there has been heretofore but little religious liberty in Switzerland, except in a few cantons. The national church, the Roman Catholic, and Jews, being the only sects tolerated by law; but there has recently been a great movement in all the cantons, which resulted in a change of the constitution in that as well as some other important respects, the 14th of January. Now the word of God may be preached freely in all parts of this Republic. May the Lord also open the way for the spread of truth in other European countries now darkened by intolerance and superstition, is my prayer.

It is a great satisfaction to one who believes in God and his immutable laws, which sooner or later must be recognized, to see any approximation to them on the part of worldly governments; and we especially, who watch the signs of the times, and believe that God is directing all events to the merciful end, that all who will may be saved, must look upon the movements of the present with great interest and satisfaction.

After writing my last letter to you, just after the opening of the year, I remained at home most of the time for two weeks, as little could be done publicly at that season, every one being busy his secular affairs. Jan. 17th I left home for Bullet, one of the flourishing villages of Mont Jura, some three hours' walk from Grandson. I delivered there four lectures in the college to good and attentive congregations.

From there I was invited to Buttes, a larger village, some three hours' distant. The large National Temple was tendered me for lectures, and the excellent pastor, Mr Evard, gave me the kind hospitalities of his house. I lectured four times, and was listened to very attentively by a very large congregation, which filled the Temple. At their close, the venerable pastor expressed his gratitude that I had visited them to warn them of the near approach of the coming and kingdom of Christ, and exhorted them to heed the warning and prepare for what was soon coming on the earth. Several ministers, men of much intelligence and pretty well educated in Hebrew and Greek, attended the lectures, and spent much time with me in private, discussing those great Bible truths of particular importance at the present time, and acknowledged their force.

From Buttes I was invited to the little city of Fleurier (twenty minutes walk from there), by Mr. Coulon, pastor of its National church, where I spent a week laboring as God gave me ability, privately through the day, and publicly evenings. It was a season of great solemnity, and the blessing of God was manifested in power. At the close of my lectures, I listened to an excellent sermon on the signs of the times, by the pastor of the church.

I returned home the 6th inst., impressed deeply with a sense of the mercy of God, and the importance of his work. In the three places where I lectured, God was with me to assist in the presentation of his truth, and sent it home with power to the hearts of the hearers.

Dear brethren and sisters, I feel increased confidence wherever I present these great Bible truths, that God is in this work, and that it will go forward. However Satan, through his agents, may clog the wheels, so that for a time it may seem to be retarded, yet it will not be stopped. The coming and kingdom of Christ must be preached, and if those who have long professed faith in these great truths do not carry forward the work, God will raise up others to do it. Christ said, "if these should hold their peace the stones would immediately cry out."—Luke 19: 40.

The field that I have visited between Lake Neuchatel and France is very rich and interesting. The large and flourishing villages among the Jura mountains are inhabited by a very intelligent people, who, through industry and economy, live in comfort and elegance. Such people are capable of understanding and appreciating truth. May God give many of their hearts also to obey it. The 7th inst., I buried two in baptism in the beautiful lake of Neuchatel, one of them a lady of much intelligence and influence, the first fruits of my labor in Fleurier.

Being somewhat exhausted in strength, I felt the need of a few days' rest, and am now at home, but expect in a few days to go again to public labors. We receive frequent and excellent letters from Florence, Pisa, Turin, La Tour, etc., Italy. Our brethren there are very firm and faithful. Glory be to God.

Just as I was finishing this letter, I had the pleasure of receiving a very kind christian letter from Bro. W. B. Harris, enclosing a draft for 530 francs, a contribution from dear American brethren and sisters for our European Mission. May God reward them for their kindness. Your brother in the hope of the gospel, M. B. CZECHOWSKI.

THE DEATH OF SAUL AND JONATHAN.

A sad change had been wrought in the destiny of Israel, since that eventful night when the maidens sang the victory of David over the fallen foe. The power of Saul had waned in the changing years. He had driven forth the youthful hero, David, who might have been a tower of strength to his throne, because he was jealous of his growing favor with the people.

But soon the days of darkness came, and the stubborn Saul was left alone in his weakness, a prey to doubt and despair. The proud Philistines, the old foes of his kingdom, were preparing war again, and had assembled their thousands for the invasion of Israel. Saul gathered his forces and encamped upon the heights of Gilboa. As he surveyed the valley of Jezreel, swarming with the heathen hosts, his heart, once so valiant, died within him, for his coming doom seemed to cast its shadow before his appalled vision. He had madly strayed from the path of wisdom marked out by the prophet Samuel, and followed his own inclinations; and when in the adversity of his expiring reign he would fain inquire of the Lord, he received no answer, "Neither by dreams, nor by Urim, nor by prophets." Then in the depth of his despair, he bethought him of the witch who lived in distant Endor, and, as a last resort, he determined to visit her, and learn his doom.

That night, as the darkening shadows stole over the heights of Gilboa, and shrouded the lesser hills and vales of Manasseh in gloom, three solitary horsemen might have been seen wending their way over the rugged hills to the far off Endor. Night had far advanced ere the king and his followers reached the cave of the sorceress. Being assured of protection the hag performed her incantations, and pronounced the destiny of the trembling king.

The dark revelation was too much for Saul, and he fell senseless to the earth. Recovering at last, he turned from the mysterious rites of Endor, and with a sad heart sought the camp of his warriors. The morning star was paling in the east as he neared the tents of Israel, wan and dejected, with the burden of the future weighing heavily upon him. With all the energy that despair had left him, he prepared for the conflict, vainly warring against his destiny.

As the morning sun bathed the craggy brow of Gilboa with its wealth of golden light, and drank up the dew from the mountain flowers, the Philistine began to climb the heights and press the battle. Saul, the warrior, who had triumphed in so many battles, fought with all the daring of dark despair, but it availed not. His sons fell in the onset of the conflict, and the valiant men of Judah fled before the conquering Philistines, or stumbled upon the high places of the mountains to rise no more.

When the ill-starred Saul saw that all was lost, that the glory of his house had departed, and that the terrible foe were pressing close upon him, he called upon his servant to slay him, but he would not; then Saul fell upon his own sword, and died with the slain of Israel on that memorable day. Then the triumphant foe carried the bodies of Saul and his sons, and fastened them in defiance to the walls of Beth-shan, and embellished the throne of Ashtaroth with their captured armor.

Thus faded the glory of the house of Saul in one day of conflict, and Israel was put to shame before the foe that once had fled in dismay before the heroic valor of a youth.

But where was the hero David, who turned the tide of war in other days? The years had changed his destiny, he was no longer the favored one of Saul, whose morose and jealous spirit had driven him out into the wild places of Judea, to subsist upon his own resources. Yet an undying friendship, the most beautiful and touching in all history, had grown up between David and Jonathan, the son of Saul. And when the cloud of Saul's displeasure lowered upon the path of David, Jonathan stood between him and the angry king. Their friendship was pure, noble, and unselfish. The vicissitudes of all the years changed it not, but added to its strength, and when Saul would fain have destroyed David and his party, Jonathan divulged all his father's plans, and warned him of the impending danger.

But all this while the star of Saul was hastening to the horizon, to set in the night of overthrow, and that of David was rising in the luminous orient.

David was encamped at Ziklag when the news of the last act in the tragedy reached him. He did not rejoice in the overthrow of his old foe, but generously forgot the enmity of the king in his sorrow for the death of his beloved friend Jonathan. All the scenes of the past, the many endearing words, the vows of undying friendship, came rushing back from the distant years, like smiling dreams of boyhood. He forgot the dangers he had escaped, the hardships endured in that moment of agony, when he realized that his friend was no more. Then he gave utterance to a lamentation that has never been surpassed in any language for its pathetic beauty. He lamented alike the foe and friend; he praised the father and son, and chanted for them a requiem, whose mournful music must have touched each heart, and thrilled each ear that listened.

"The beauty of Israel is slain upon thy high places; how are the mighty fallen. Tell it not in Gath, publish it not in the streets of Askelon; lest the daughters of the Philistines rejoice, lest the daughters of the uncircumcised triumph. Ye mountains of Gilboa, let there be no dew, neither let there be rain upon you, nor fields of offerings; for there the shield of the mighty is vilely cast away, the shield of Saul as though he had not been anointed with oil. From the blood of the slain, from the fat of the mighty, the bow of Jonathan turned not back, and the sword of Saul returned not empty. Saul and Jonathan were lovely and pleasant in their lives, and in their death they are not divided; they were swifter than eagles, they were stronger than lions. Ye daughters of Israel, weep over Saul, who clothed you in scarlet, with other delights; who put on ornaments of gold upon your apparel. How are the mighty fallen in the midst of battle! O Jonathan, thou wast slain in thine high places. I am distressed for thee, my brother Jonathan; very pleasant hast thou been unto me; thy love to me was wonderful, passing the love of women. How are the mighty fallen, and the weapons of war perished!"

The dynasty of Saul was ended. The way was opened for David to ascend the throne for which he had been anointed by the holy seer, Samuel. A new career of glory was about to open for Israel, that was to eclipse the greatness of the surrounding nations. David was to be the founder of a long line of illustrious kings, whose deeds would live through the ages. ORRIN P. ALLEN.

For the World's Crisis.

LONG ARTICLES, SERMONS, AND PRAYERS.

If it were possible to make people see under what disadvantages they labor through a long sermon, there would be a reform in this respect. People now-a-days will not sit as patiently as formerly under such inflictions. They know more about preaching; and comprehend faster. Said a brother to me,—

"I wish you would tell us who to send for to come and preach."

After proposing two or three, he said,—

"They preach so long we cannot stand it. When he was here he preached half the people out of the house, or to sleep, and would had to sum up, and wind up, and finish, and varnish, to have it look well. We do not like him."

Probably two-thirds of our preachers are in the habit of preaching too long. If they knew how much complaint there is about long preaching, they would reform, unless they are willful.

Preachers wonder they have so few invitations to preach. If I should call the names of those with whom the brethren are dissatisfied on this account, you would be astonished.

A sermon over one hour is lost, two times out of ten. Crowd down too much, and you lose the whole. One half of the subject or an hour ought to be condensed into forty-five minutes. Some are guilty of holding the people one hour and a half, and some two hours or over. Such ought to have sore throats, and God or nature thinks so, and gives it to them. They do not so much more than others, because they preach so much longer.

Such generally write long articles, which are not read but by few. We want short, pointed articles of interest, of reformations, and those that feed the church down here, instead of those long, prosy ones, which must needs crowd out four or five short ones, either of which is worth more to the flock. One editor said the men that had the longest articles were the most difficult to suit. Perhaps all the editors might say Amen to this.

Long prayers are a great sign of a religion with no saving power in it. It is generally formal, dry, and pharisaical. It is generally understood by reformationists that the prayer which God answers and the people feel, in all ages, will not exceed from one to three minutes. That is longer than the Lord's prayer. His sermon on the Mount, which you will find in Matt 5, 6, and 7, the whole three chapters, would be a sermon of about thirty-five to forty minutes. His public prayers were in proportion. Those who pray publicly fifteen to twenty minutes, and preach one hour and a half to two hours, never learned it of Jesus, nor of the apostles.

Secret prayer, through which we can draw near to God, is not limited nor interrupted by other influences, as in public. It has been remarked that those who pray the longest in public pray the least in secret. The world is getting full of the form of godliness, let us shun it, and contend for the power, if we are unpopular and but few, God will give such the kingdom. H. MUNGER.

For the World's Crisis.

HOLD ON.

A raft with several men upon it was floating down the Ohio river. The current of the river was strong and swift, and the channel narrow. An island lay directly in the way, and there was great danger that the raft might be dashed to pieces in attempting to pass between it and the shore.

One of the passengers, but little accustomed to the river, became much frightened. A tall, stout Indian, wearing a broad, leather belt, was steering the raft. He told the man to hold on to his belt and he would take care of him.

"But we are in great danger."

"Hold on to my belt."

"I am afraid the raft will go to pieces."

"Hold on to my belt, and I will take care of you."

"But I cannot swim."

"Hold on to my belt, and I will swim ashore with you."

The Indian guided the raft safely through the narrow pass, and none on board were harmed.

Our life is like a passage down a rapid river. Temptations lie before us, and destruction is around us. We are in danger of being wrecked and lost. But there is One that can save us. Jesus Christ is sitting at the helm and steering the course. In his strength and judgment we may safely confide. He is "mighty to save." He bids us hold on to him and trust in him.

"But the danger is great," we say.

"I, the Lord thy God, will hold thy right hand. Fear not; I will help thee."—Isa. 41: 13.

"But I am afraid I shall be lost. I cannot resist my temptations to sin."

"Fear thou not, for I am with thee; be not dismayed, for I am thy God; I will strengthen thee; yea, I will help thee; yea, I will uphold thee with the right hand of my righteousness."—Isa. 41: 10. "God is faithful, who will not suffer you to be tempted above that ye are able, but will with the temptation also make a way to escape."—1 Cor. 10: 13.

"But I cannot swim; I should sink beneath the waters, like Peter, and perish."

"Thus saith the Lord that created thee,—Fear not: for I have redeemed thee, I have called thee by my name; thou art mine. When thou passest through the waters I will be with thee; and through the rivers, they shall not overflow thee. When thou walkest through the fire, thou shalt not be burned; neither shall the flame kindle upon thee."—Isa. 43: 1, 2.

Wandering, doubting, timid soul, come to Christ; believe in Christ; hold on to Christ. He is "girded about with strength." Righteousness is the girdle of his loins, and faithfulness the girdle of his reins. Cling to him, and you will be safe. No human strength is equal to uphold you, and no human wisdom is sufficient to guide you amid the dangers and temptations of your life. Jesus Christ alone can help you. But even He cannot aid you unless you hold on to him. You must prove your faith in him by doing as he bids you. And he will prove faithful to you. He will safely conduct you through all the perils of your way, and bring you at last, unharmed and in peace, to rest in his salvation.

Reader, have you a hold on this Christ? Have you committed your soul to his keeping? is he your pilot, your friend, your safety, and your trust? Are you grasping his strength, and clinging to his righteousness, and holding on to his truth?

Are you young, and do temptations beset you on every side? Do vain thoughts, and foolish ambitions, and childish vanities, and youthful lusts allure to deceive and ruin you? There is no safety for you but in holding on to Christ. You cannot breast the current alone. But he is sufficient for all things. Give up to him, and he will give you "a wise and an understanding heart, that you may know to refuse the evil and choose the good."

Or, are you aged? Has the light and gladness of early days faded before your dim eyes? Have you lived to see earthly hopes fail, and earthly friends die? Has the bitterness of sorrow, and the blight of sickness, taught you that "all is vanity and vexation of spirit"? Has your sun set, and your day of toil ended, and is the damp and chill and darkness and desolation of the night of death creeping upon you? Hold on to Christ. What else can you cling to? He alone can comfort or sustain you. When thou walkest through the valley of the shadow of death he will be with thee: his rod and his staff will comfort thee.

God grant that we "remember and hold fast," and at last be found among the "righteous who have held on their way, and grown stronger and stronger." E. A. ANNABLE.

Boston, March, 1866.

For the World's Crisis.

THE PILGRIM'S TRIALS.

Says one, "I am almost discouraged, my trials are so severe. While I was in the world, I used to get along well enough; but since I have been trying to serve the Lord, and have been waiting for his coming, trials have increased tenfold. I might about as well give up, for I can now scarcely keep my head above water, and my trials keep increasing."

Indeed! and how will they all look beside the deep humiliation, reproach and suffering of the crucified One? Have you ever experienced any trial which was sufficient to make a bloody sweat issue from the pores of your body? O! my brother, my sister, think not of your own petty trials; they are scarcely worth noticing, when you consider the boundless, unfathomable love and condescension of the dear Lamb of God! And he endured all this, not for his own sake, but for yours. And now are you unwilling to bear that which this same loving Redeemer sees necessary and best that you should bear?

Again, how will these trials of yours compare with those of your brethren—your "companions in tribulation," who have lived in by-gone days? Read the Book of Martyrs, and see what those holy men and women were willing to endure for Christ's sake, and well may you be ashamed when you remember your own little trials, and how you have shrunk from them.

Constrained by the love of Jesus they yielded themselves the victims to the most shocking cruelty and barbarity which the ingenuity of men and devils could invent. They had their bodies most terribly mangled and tortured, their eyes dug out, their tongues drawn out by the roots, their toes and other members pulled off with pincers, red hot irons applied to the most tender parts of their bodies, were starved to death, were locked in a large pan, and baked to death over a slow fire, were almost drawn asunder, their limbs from their bodies, then suffered to recover, and again subjected to the same inhuman treatment, and this process several times repeated. But these are but few of the numberless ways in which millions on millions have sealed their testimony with their blood. Thousands on thousands have been tortured upon the rack, and time would fail me (were I able) to enumerate the black catalogue of tortures invented in that terrible engine of cruelty—The Inquisition.

What think you, my brother, of trials like these? Do not any longer brood over that pigmy trial of yours, but rather let your heart be filled with joy, gratitude, and praise, that though "they without us will not be made perfect," but, on the contrary, we shall with them receive an everlasting crown, that still your trials are so light comparatively.

"Must I be carried to the skies
On flowery beds of ease,
Whilst others fought to win the prize,
And sailed through bloody seas?"

But suppose your trials are terribly severe, have you forgotten what the great apostle Paul says? and surely he made no mistake, but "reckoned" correctly. Hear him: "For I reckon that the sufferings of this present time are not worthy to be compared with the glory which shall be revealed in us."—Rom 8 18. Paul (if I mistake not) had an opportunity of judging and forming a comparison, such as neither you or I ever had. You know he "was caught up [in vision] into Paradise, and heard unspeakable words, which it is not possible [margin] for a man to utter." (Probably the language, "I knew a man in Christ," etc., refers to what he had himself actually passed through.)

"But," say you, "I can scarcely bear up now, and my trials keep increasing; it seems to me that I cannot hold out much longer." Yes, dear tried one; and does not the grace of God in your heart, and your ability to bear trials, increase also? This is the very object for which trials are sent, or permitted; that you may "grow in grace"—have more faith in God.

"Let those that sow in sadness wait
Till the fair harvest come,
They shall confess their sheaves are great,
And shout the blessing home."

Did you ever consider that your trials, afflictions and sorrows are an indication of the love and favor of God toward you? Saith the apostle, "Whom the Lord loveth, them he chasteneth, and scourgeth every son whom he receiveth." But woe to that professor of religion who is left to sail along without them! For the Master continues, "But if ye be without chastisement, whereof all are partakers, then are ye bastards, and not sons." Then, my brethren, "think it not strange concerning the fiery trial which is to try you, as though some strange thing happened unto you; but rejoice, inasmuch as ye are partakers of Christ's sufferings; that when his glory shall be revealed, ye may be glad with exceeding joy."

Northfield, Mass. H. P. SEARS.

☞ Dr. Doddridge said "he never advanced well in human learning without prayer, and that he always made most proficiency in his studies when he prayed with the greatest fervency."

PAY YOUR PREACHERS.

"Even so hath the Lord ordained, that they which preach the gospel should live of the gospel."—1 Cor. 9: 14.

I would like to say a few words in behalf of those who preach. Although not a preacher myself, I know something about the state of things existing at the present time.

How does the text look to you, who have your thousands? I think it is a hard text to spiritualize. In the course of my christian life I have heard and known of some rather hard and trying circumstances that some of the servants of Christ have had to pass through, yet they may not complain. But what if they do not? does that screen those who have an abundance of this world's goods? Think you of these things, with your fine houses and lands? And you who have no houses or lands, you whom God has prospered with good health, so that you can work? Think for a moment of some God has called to go out into the world to proclaim his gospel. How is it with them? Perhaps they once worked by your side, could do as well as you, had as many of the comforts of life. Methinks it is not so with some of them now. Think of him as he goes from place to place. How is it when he returns to his home after being absent one, two, three weeks, or more, preaching and studying, we being blessed by his labors. Think of his family, not having enough food in the house to last one day. The meal most gone in the barrel, and the oil in the cruise. Where is the money to buy more? So they are compelled to go to work and pay up, then start again, with the words of the apostle resting on them—"Woe is me, if I preach not the gospel."

Is this right? I think not. "Thou shalt not muzzle the mouth of the ox that treadeth out the corn. Doth God take care for oxen? Or saith he it altogether for our sakes? For our sakes, no doubt, this is written . . . Again, "if (they) have sown unto (us) spiritual things, is it a great thing if (they) reap (our) carnal things?" Thus teaches the word of God. May God help us all to think these things over, and see if all is right, asking the good Lord to lead and guide us. I pray God to pardon me where I have come short in these things, and help me to do my part in the future. May we all realize that our time of giving will soon be over, and so live and give that in that great day the Master will say unto us, "Inasmuch as ye have done it unto one of the least of these my brethren, ye have done it unto me." Let us remember, also, he said, "The workman is worthy of his hire."

Perhaps not all the servants of Christ are needy, but some are. Should they happen to come to you, and you are aware of the fact, will you remember them and try to help them along by giving what the Lord requires at your hand, remembering God has said, "Cast thy bread upon the waters, for thou shalt find it after many days."

More might be said on this subject, but we hope a word to the wise may be sufficient. Perhaps some may say, If God has called them to preach his gospel, he will take care of them. So he will, but does he require anything at our hands? I think he does.

I do not think they should call on the ungodly for their support. It is our duty to see that they do not suffer. May the Lord help us to do it.

I will close by asking you to remember in your prayers the preachers, remember their wives and little ones at home, remember the servants everywhere, remember the poor and needy, the afflicted, the sorrowing, those that are mourning the loss of near and dear friends. Remember the cross of Christ. Remember the trials and sufferings he passed through. Remember his commandments. Remember to have an eye single to the glory of God. Remember to deny self, and take up the cross and follow him. Finally, dear brethren and sisters, let us remember each other in our prayers, and be patent in all things.

Concord, N H. JOHN T KIMBALL.

THE DUTY OF REPROVING.

Reproving is one of those "weapons" which the apostle speaks of as not being "carnal, but mighty through God to the pulling down of strong holds." 2 Cor. 10. It is one of those "daily crosses" which Christ has commanded us to bear, if we would be his followers. It is evident that if we love God with all our heart, we will hate sin in the same proportion; and if we love our neighbors as ourselves, we will feel as deeply interested in their soul's salvation as our own, and consequently we will not suffer sin upon them. Those who profess to love God, and can bear to hear his name profaned, and see his holy Sabbath polluted, without reproving the offenders, are still "in the gall of bitterness, and in the bond of iniquity." It is impossible to be a child of God and neglect this duty; for the command is, "Thou shalt not hate thy brother in thine heart; thou shalt in anywise rebuke thy neighbor, and not suffer sin upon him." Lev. 19. 17.

Mr. Wesley says, "Let us consider, first, what is the duty that is here enjoined? What is it we are to rebuke or reprove? And what is it to reprove? To tell any one of his faults, as clearly appears from the following words: "Thou shalt not suffer sin upon him." Sin is, therefore, the thing we are called to reprove, or rather, him that commits sin. We are to do all that in us lies, to convince him of his fault, and lead him into the right way. Love indeed requires us to warn him, not only of sin, (although of this chiefly), but likewise of any error, which, if it were persisted in, would naturally lead to sin. If we do not 'hate him in our heart,' if we love our neighbor as ourselves, this will be our constant endeavor: to warn him of every evil way, and of every mistake which tends to evil.

But if we desire not to lose our labor, we should rarely reprove any one for any thing that is of a disputable nature; that will bear much to be said on both sides. A thing may possibly appear evil to me; therefore I scruple the doing of it: and if I were to do it while that scruple remains, I should be a sinner before God; but another is not to be judged by my conscience; to his own Master he standeth or falleth. Therefore I would not reprove him but for what is clearly and undeniably evil. Such, for instance, is profane cursing and swearing, which even those who practice it most will not often venture to defend, if one mildly expostulates with them. Such is drunkenness, which even a habitual drunkard will condemn when he is sober. And such, in the account of the generality of people, is the profaning of the Lord's day. And if any, who are guilty of these sins, for a while attempt to defend them, very few will persist to do it, if you look them steadily in the face, and appeal to their own conscience in the sight of God.

Let us, in the second place, consider who are those that we are called to reprove? It is the more needful to consider this, because it is affirmed, by many serious persons that there are sinners whom the Scriptures themselves forbid us to reprove. This sense has been given that solemn caution of our Lord, in his sermon on the Mount: "Cast not your pearls before swine, lest they trample them under foot, and turn again and rend you." But the plain meaning of these words is, do not offer the pearls, the sublime doctrines or mysteries of the gospel, to those whom you know to be brutish men, immersed in sins, and having no fear of God before their eyes. This would expose the precious jewel to contempt, and yourselves to injurious treatment. But even those whom we know to be, in the Lord's sense, dogs and swine, if we saw them do, or heard them speak, what they themselves know to be evil, we ought in any wise to reprove; else we "hate our brother in our heart." The persons intended by our "neighbor" are, every child of man; every one that breathes the vital air; all that have souls to be saved. And if we refrain from performing this office of love to any, because they are sinners above other men, they may persist in iniquity, but their blood will God require at our hands. . . . .

Again Mr. Wesley says, "I never heard or read of any considerable revival of religion, which was not attended with a spirit of reproving. I believe it cannot be otherwise; for what is faith unless it worketh by love? Thus it was in every part of England, when the present revival of religion began, about fifty years ago; all the subjects of that revival, all the Methodists, so called in every place, were reprovers of outward sin." And indeed, so are all that "being justified by faith, have peace with God through Jesus Christ." Such they are at first; and if they use that precious gift, it will never be taken away. Come, brethren, in the name of God, let us begin again! Rich or poor, let us all arise as one man! And in anywise, let every man "rebuke his neighbor and not suffer sin upon him."—Ex.

ALCOHOLIC MEDICATION.

How does alcohol act? Mark you, there is no basis, nor pretended basis, for its employment as a medicine, except the hypothesis that, in some peculiar manner, it acts on some one or more of the tissues, structures, parts or organs of the living system, and that such action maintains or supports the vital powers, under various depressing influences, and in numerous conditions of disease.

Now, the proposition that alcohol acts on the living system is either true or false. There is no compromise, like rum and sugar, no "half-and-half," like milk and whiskey, about it. And thus we have, again, a direct issue—a simple Yes or No. And on these two little but now mighty monosyllables—Yes, No—I predicate my whole argument for teetotal Temperance and against Alcoholic Medication.

If the proposition be true that alcohol does, in some way, even though no one can tell how, really act on the living system, the presumption may be reasonable, that such action may possibly be useful. But, suppose that we can prove the proposition to be untrue? Where, then, will be the basis for Alcoholic Medication?

Now I deny that alcohol acts on the living system at all. I deny that alcohol has a "special affinity" for the brain, or any affinity for any living tissue. The relation is the contrary—that of antagonism.

The modus operandi of medicines, as assumed in medical schools is, and always has been, a pernicious and most disastrous error—a fatal mistake. The popular medical doctrine just reverses the order of nature. It has given us a false medical philosophy, and an unsuccessful Healing Art. Its first premise is wrong. Its fundamental principle is a mistake. Its basis is a physiological fallacy.

And so is the popular idea or theory of the nature of disease. On this subject, also, the medical profession teaches a false doctrine. It confounds the causes of disease with the disease itself; it makes the "vis medicatrix naturæ" for an entity at war upon it. And in attempting to subdue or counteract, or neutralize or destroy the imaginary enemy, it is really warring upon the vitality of the patient.

In the relations between living and dead matter, the dead matter does not act on the living, although this is the doctrine of medical books. But on the contrary, the living matter acts on the dead. This is the law of Nature.

Alcohol is no part of any living thing. It belongs to the inorganic world. It is in no sense vital, nor vitalizing. Its properties are chemical not vital; and there is no chemistry in living structures. In its relation to living structures, alcohol is dead, inert, passive, as are all other inorganic substances. And this remark is true of all medicines and all poisons.

Tell me not that learned men, that great and good men, have always taught the contrary. That is not our question. We are not discussing what learned men have taught, but what Nature does teach. What is truth? This is our subject.

The medical profession will tell us, if it argues this point, that alcohol produces or occasions certain effects. Granted. And you may ask, "What is the difference whether alcohol acts itself or superinduces an action, so long as action in some way results? It is all difference. It is just the difference between life and death. The gist of our controversy lies in the kind of action. And the kind and quality of the action, and the good or evil of it, can only be determined by the solution of the primary question, whether the alcohol acts on the living system, or the living system on the alcohol.

The knowledge of what acts, and how, when living and dead matter come in contact, is the vital prerequisite to an understanding of the rationale of the effects of such action.

It makes all difference, in understanding the problems connected with the several subjects, whether external objects act on the mind or body, or the mind or body on them;—whether a man eats his dinner, or his dinner eats him;—whether the earth revolves around the sun, or the sun around the earth;—whether the horse draws the cart, or the cart pushes the horse; in a word, whether the whale swallowed Jonah, or whether Jonah swallowed the whale!

How can we know whether the actions or the effects of alcohol are useful or injurious, unless we can understand the mode, manner, wherefore—the rationale of such actions or effects; and how can we comprehend the rationale unless we know which is the acting and which the passive agent?

Medical men tell us that alcohol first acts on the living system, and then the system "responds" or "reacts." I deny, totally, the doctrine of responsive action or reaction. That doctrine has slain its thousands. No doctrine can be better calculated to people grave-yards with untimely victims. It sent the late Prince Albert, in the prime of life, in the full vigor of manhood, "to that bourne from whence no traveler returns." He was "kept up" as the London Lancet informed us, for six days, by alcoholic stimulants, and on the seventh day his system refused any longer to respond, and he died. It was said that he died of typhoid fever. The real disease was alcoholism.

If it is the living system only which acts, as I contend, when alcohol, or any other poison, or any unusable substance, is brought in contact with its structures, then the question arises, What is the nature of the action? Those who contend that the alcohol acts, have never been able to explain the nature of its action; nor have they ever explained, nor can they explain, the rationale of a single one of its acknowledged effects, on the theory that it acts on the living system. But, on the theory which I advocate, that it is the living system only which acts, all of its effects are intelligible and explainable. I repeat, then, the gist of the whole argument is, the rationale of its effects.—Dr. Trall.

THE RAW PORK DISEASE.

We have on more than one occasion lately pointed out some of the discoveries that are constantly going on in regard to classes of Entozoa; that is, those microscopic insects which breed and live only within man or other animals, many of which produce the most fatal consequences. The importance of the practical study of this subject may be seen by the fact that in one little town or village in the environs of Magdeburg, called Ederslében, upwards of a hundred adults have died since Christmas, and three hundred more were in the middle of January, at the point of death, of "trichonosis," a disease so called because produced by trichinæ. This is a species of spiral worm, not the thickness of a hair, the eggs of which are taken into the system in diseased pork imperfectly cooked, and multiply by millions, sometimes producing death almost immediately as if by cholera, and at other times penetrating to the most remote parts of the body, the eggs being carried round in the blood, and lodging, and breeding and feeding on every part of the human organization, producing agonizing pains, constitutional disturbance, and death in a thousand ways.

There are some kinds of entozoa that seem to seek out the muscles and develop there, borrowing instinctively into the flesh, but others penetrate the nervous system, and especially the brain, entering even into the fluids of the eye itself, and there living. In fact, a man's foes become those of his own household, of his own body. At Berlin, a meeting of the town councillors, butchers, doctors, and a sprinkling of the general public, was held about Christmas, and Professor Virchow produced a piece of smoked sausage and pork, which he had examined with the microscope and pronounced highly trichinous. A Dr. Urban, a veterinary practitioner, got up and said that the trichinæ were the most innocent animals in the world and harmless, and that it was only doctors without practice that made a fuss about them, to create occupation for themselves. The Professors of the Medical school, in great excitement, demanded an apology and retraction, and finally that, if this was refused, Dr Urban should eat some of the diseased sausage. After making every possible excuse, he at length seized the sausage and bit a piece off and ate it, but immediately left the room. One account says that he instantly took a strong emetic that made him sick. But another says that five days later he was confined to his bed and his arms paralyzed, but whether from an emetic or from the sausage there was some dispute. The impression was that it was the latter. The Berlin butchers now have all pork meat examined under a microscope, without which the people will not buy or eat it. Large quantities of pork are, however, exported to England. But there the more thorough process of cooking seems to destroy most of the danger. Such meat, however, is not absolutely safe as food until the whole has been subjected to a heat of 200 degrees Fahrenheit.

It is said that a case has recently been distinctly traced in Indiana, where a young lady died in great agony from this disease. There is no doubt but that the Mosaic and Mohammedan prohibition of pork was founded on its great likelihood of producing this very disease. The hog is a filthy feeder where food is scarce, and often on the excrements of other animals. Now the law of existence for these entozoa seems to be that they can only come to life in the intestines of one animal where they deposit their eggs, which never come to anything until vitalized in some way by the gastric juice of the stomach. Hence this tendency of the hog makes it the most dangerous of all animals for producing this disease.

Of course this suggests care in the feeding of hogs designed for human food. It is the careless, over economical habits of the feeders of this class of animals that render their meat in some cases unwholesome. The acorns of the American forests never produce this class of diseases, but in overcrowded populations, by want of care to guard against this danger, one diseased animal may infect a whole drove and decimate a town or village. Pork not well cooked, the history of which is unknown, has always more or less of danger and should be avoided. Well-boiled ham is safe enough, but raw ham and sausages are not safe merely because they have been salted and smoked. Pigs and rabbits seem to be the chief depositories of trichona. Richard Owen first discovered them with the microscope in 1835.

☞ Most diseases not chronic can be cured by dietetic rules and exercise.

ALMOST HOME.

We're almost home, we're almost home, hark! hear the joyful cry,
The weary pilgrim lifts his head, and hails redemption nigh,
O glorious, soul-reviving sound! we soon shall see our King!
More swiftly fly, ye tardy hours, that welcome moment bring.

We're long been wandering here below, cast out for Jesus' sake,
And through the dark night we have watched and longed for morn to break;
And now the cry, "Behold! he comes; your journey's end is near,"
Sounds sweet as ever sound of "home" fell on the traveler's ear.

Oh! wayworn pilgrim, dry thy tears; look up, rejoice, and sing;
What though the world despise thy name? thy Father is a King,
And soon upon his dazzling throne thou shalt with him sit down,
And walk the streets of Paradise, and wear a glittering crown.

Art thou a mourner? dost thou weep that much-loved ones are borne
To rest beneath the valley clods? Christian, no longer mourn,
A few days more and you shall meet, no more to say "Farewell,"
But in the everlasting home in sweet reunion dwell.

Oh! home-bound sailor, courage take; what though the clouds be dark,
And angry billows dash around, to sink our little bark,
What though the tempest fiercer grows; with joyful hope we'll stand,
For well we know we're near the coast, our ship's almost to land.

O! watcher, thou hast waited long; turn not away thine eyes,
For, lo, the Day Star brightly beams, the Sun will soon arise;
With joyful hearts we'll watch and look, and pray, "Lord Jesus, come,"
And take thy waiting Bride away to her eternal home.

THE DOCTRINE OF THE PHARISEES AND OF THE SADDUCEES DEFINED.

And an Explanation of the Parable of the Rich Man and Lazarus.

"E'en adders hear,
But turn, and dart into the dark again."

"He is a slave who fears to be
In the right with two or three."

THE DOCTRINE OF THE PHARISEES AND OF THE SADDUCEES.

"Then said Jesus unto them, Take heed and beware of the leaven of the Pharisees and of the Sadducees.... Then understood they how that He bade them not beware of the leaven of bread, but of the doctrine of the Pharisees and of the Sadducees."—MATT. 16: 6-12.

THE OBJECT OF THE PARABLE.

But what was the design of Christ in the utterance of this parable if it was not to teach doctrine respecting the condition of men after death? I answer. There were two main things which he wished to impress upon the minds of these Pharisees.

1st. The difficulty in the way of the rich, covetous, and proud—living in affluence, ease, and luxury, of gaining the reward of the just. What called forth the parable was the following circumstance: Christ had said, "No servant can serve two masters. . . . Ye cannot serve God and mammon."—Verse 13. This remark incensed the Pharisees, "who were covetous and derided him."—Ver. 14. Their derision induced the Lord to bring forth the striking illustration of a covetous rich man and a poor beggar in their hades!—the one tormented with flames, the other in "the bosom of Abraham."

2nd. The second thing he wished to impress upon the minds of these Pharisees was the startling truth, that if they did not believe Moses and the prophets, they would not believe though one should rise from the dead. Verse 31. In rejecting Christ and his teachings and mission, they rejected these sacred writers as divinely inspired, and seared and hardened their consciences and made their own destruction sure. The Pharisees believing in the immortality of the soul, and rewards and punishments in the bowels of the earth, immediately after death, as did the heathen, he made use of their faith of the condition of the departed dead, the better to fix upon their minds these two considerations. In discussions of important subjects, we often grant the premises of a disputant the better to drive him to the conclusions of an argument.

THE PHARISEES' DOCTRINE, VERSUS THE WORD OF GOD.

I shall now show how the doctrine of the Pharisees makes void the word of God, by quoting certain scriptures and interpreting them according to their faith. In Gen. 2: 16, 17, we read:—"And the Lord God commanded the man, saying, Of every tree of the garden thou mayest freely eat. But of the tree of knowledge of good and evil, thou shalt not eat of it; for in the day that thou eatest thereof, thou shalt surely die." Satan, however, afterwards negates this threatened penalty of sin, by saying unto the woman, "Ye shall not surely die."—Gen. 3: 4. The Pharisees' doctrine perpetuates this great first lie of the devil, by asserting the immortality of the soul or spirit; and that the man proper does not die; but enters immediately into a conscious state of rewards at death in hades.

The inquiry is made, Job 14: 14, "If a man die, shall he live again?" The Pharisees' doctrine assumes that the inquiry relates merely to the body of man, and not to man as a whole; and still insists that he exists as a being in consciousness and rewards in death; with a knowledge of the condition of his surviving relatives (Luke 16: 28); notwithstanding the Scriptures declare, "Thou changest his countenance, and sendest him away. His sons come to honor, and he knoweth it not; and they are brought low, but he perceiveth it not of them."—Job 14: 20, 21.

Jesus, as "the Resurrection and the Life," asserts: "He that believeth on me, though he were dead, yet shall he live."—John 11: 25. But the Pharisees' faith hesitates not to pervert the scripture, by quoting it thus:—"He that believeth on me, though he were dead, yet doth he live."

The Preacher, in Ecclesiastes, says, "Whatsoever thy hand findeth to do, do it with thy might; for there is no work, nor device, nor knowledge, nor wisdom, in the grave (Heb. Sheol, and Greek hades—state of the dead) whither thou goest."—Eccl. 9: 10. Yet the Pharisees' doctrine controverts the scriptural declaration by asserting that there is both knowledge and wisdom in hades.

The Scriptures declare that "in death there is no remembrance of thee." Ps. 6: 5. "Their love, and their hatred, and their envy, is now perished."—Eccl. 9: 6. "His breath goeth forth, he returneth to his earth; in that very day his thoughts perish."—Ps. 146: 4. "The dead praise not the Lord, neither any that go down into silence."—Ps. 115: 17. "The dead know not anything."—Eccl. 9: 5. "Death cannot celebrate thee. . . . The living, the living, he shall praise thee."—Isa. 38: 18, 19. "None can keep alive his own soul."—Ps. 22: 29. But the Pharisees' doctrine makes void all these scriptures.

The thief on the cross prays unto Jesus, "Lord, remember me when thou comest into thy kingdom" (Luke 23: 42); and the interpretation the Pharisees' doctrine gives to Jesus' reply is, that Jesus assures him that that very day he should "judge the quick and the dead at his appearing and kingdom"; and he should accompany him down into a subterranean region, in the interior of the earth, called "hades" and "the bosom of Abraham," where he should be with him in Paradise! And when Jesus gives promise, "To him that overcometh will I give to eat of the tree of life, which is in the midst of the paradise of God" (Rev. 2: 7); also, "Blessed are they that do his commandments, that they may have right to the tree of life, and may enter in through the gates into the city"; the Pharisees interpret these scriptures so as to make the paradise of God and the heavenly Jerusalem in hades, and accordingly we must look there for the new heaven and new earth wherein dwelleth righteousness! Rev. 21st and 22nd chapters, and 2 Peter 3d.

St. Paul affirms, "If Christ be not risen," and "if the dead rise not at all," "then they which are fallen asleep in Christ are perished"; and he also inquires, "What advantageth it me, if the dead rise not?" assuring us, that no advantage at all would be gained by christian faith and christian conflict, saying, "Let us eat and drink; for to-morrow we die." 1 Cor. 15: 17, 18, 26, 32. But the Pharisees' faith so interprets his writings as to make the apostle contradict himself, by saying, It "is gain" to me "to die," when he says rather, "Christ shall be magnified" by my death. And that though the apostle said, "to die is gain" to himself, yet he is still made to contradict it by saying, "We would not be unclothed,"—"not be found naked,"—that is, he had no desire for the "gain" death was to bring to him. And again, the "strait betwixt two," in which he is suspended, is made to be life, and being "with Christ" in death, which he is most inconsistently made to say, "What I shall choose I wot not" (I care not which to choose), and at the same time says, "To be with Christ is far better"; so that the "far better" state was not a matter of choice or desire on his part. Strange inconsistency! Here must be certainly some of the "things hard to be understood" in "Paul's epistles," "which they that are unlearned" in the Scriptures of truth, "and unstable, wrest as they do also the other scriptures, unto their own destruction."—2 Pet. 3: 16.

The "strait betwixt two," which to him was no matter of choice, was no doubt between life and death. If he lived, his life would be one of care, toil, trial, and continued hardship. If he should die, he would be at rest, ready to stand in his lot at the end of time, and receive his crown at the Lord's appearing. 2 Tim 4: 18. But "to be with Christ, which is far better" than to live here in mortal flesh, or to die, was his "desire"—"earnest expectation and my hope." Phil. 1: 20, 23. This would be realized, as he says, "when Christ, who is our life, shall appear, then shall ye also appear WITH HIM in glory."—Col. 3: 4. We shall "meet the Lord in the air; and so shall we ever be with the Lord."—1 Thess. 4: 17. The Pharisees' doctrine, however, nullifies his hope, and perverts and wrests his words, making the apostle to desire to die and go down into hades to "meet the Lord," and "be with him" there!

In Gen. 5: 5, it is written:—"And all the days that Adam lived were nine hundred and thirty years; and he died." The Pharisees' doctrine adds, "and he was conducted by angels down into hades, a place in the world, not regularly finished—a subterranean region, on the right hand of which is a place we call the bosom of Abraham." And thus Adam is made to go to "the bosom of Abraham, where the just have dwelt from the beginning of the world," many centuries before Abraham was born! - See Josephus.

In Gen. 5: 27, it is written: "And all the days of Methuselah were nine hundred sixty and nine years: and he died." Here is the record of this most venerable of all the fathers.' But the Pharisees must take him up from the close of his scriptural record, and have him "conducted by angels down into hades, led by hymns, sung by them, to The bosom of Abraham."

In Gen. 7: 22, 23, of the wicked in the days of Noah, who were destroyed by the deluge, it is recorded; "And all flesh died, . . . all in whose nostrils was the breath of the spirit of life (margin)...all...died." The Pharisees however do not leave them to rest here till the judgment of the great day; but have them "dragged into the neighborhood of hell itself," where "they are tormented by the hot vapor, and punished thereby; and where they see the place (or choir) of the fathers and of the just," etc., etc.

Of Moses it is written: "So Moses the servant of the Lord died there in the land of Moab, according to the word of the Lord. And he buried him."—Deut. 34: 5, 6. "Moses my servant is dead."—Josh. 1: 2. The Pharisees' doctrine adds:—"Moses died and descended into hades, into a region of light, in which the just have dwelt from the beginning of the world, which we call The bosom of Abraham." NOTE.—Moses' appearance on the mount of transfiguration with Christ and Elias (Matt. 17: 1-9), does not sustain the Pharisees's doctrine, or controvert the above record; for he may have appeared then in "vision," as Jesus calls the occurrence (v. 9), or he may have been raised from the dead, as was Lazarus.—Jude v. 9.

Of David it is said: "So David slept with his fathers, and was buried in the city of David."—1 Kings 2: 10. "Men and brethren, let me freely speak unto you of the patriarch David, that he is both dead and buried, and his sepulchre is with us unto this day."—Acts 2: 29. "For David, after he had served his own generation by the will of God, fell on sleep, and was laid unto his fathers, and saw corruption."—Acts 13: 36. These scriptures declare David to be "asleep," "dead," "buried," "in his sepulchre," or under "corruption"; and all beyond is silent. But the Pharisees' doctrine asserts that he has been "conveyed down to the bosom of Abraham, among the choir of the fathers in hades!" Again, the apostle says of David, "David is not ascended into the heavens," "he is both dead and buried," and in his sepulchre. Acts 2: 34. How shall we reconcile this statement of the apostle with the popular christian faith respecting the dead, that they ascend to heaven when they die? Or how reconcile the prevalent christian faith with the Pharisaic doctrine concerning the departed in hades? If the Pharisees' doctrine be true, then David was at this time, and had been for centuries, in hades, in the bosom of Abraham. The popular christian doctrine ascribes him to be in heaven. Both cannot be true; and the Scriptures affirm that "David is not ascended into heaven." "David is not"! The conclusion, therefore, is that the popular christian doctrine, that men go to heaven at death, is untrue; and we have proved that the Pharisees' doctrine is untrue. Both doctrines are false, according to the word of God.

Compare the scriptures quoted above with the following from the "Union Bible Dictionary," concerning David, and see how different from the reading of the Scriptures.

"In the year B. C. 1014, David exchanged, as we have every reason to believe, a corruptible crown for an incorruptible one, and a state of severe probation and discipline for the glory and blessedness of the heavenly world." According to this statement, David is neither dead, nor buried, nor fallen on sleep. Nor has he gone down into hades; but he is in "the heavenly world." And he has also received his "incorruptible crown" long before he himself expected it, or St. Paul or St. Peter expected theirs. Ps. 17: 15; 2 Tim. 4: 6-8, 1 Pet. 5: 1-4.

I forbear proceeding further in demonstrating the fact that the Pharisees' doctrine of the soul's immortality, and a conscious state of rewards and punishments in death, is unscriptural; and that it makes void the doctrine of the resurrection of the dead and the return of our blessed Redeemer and Lord to "reward every man according as his work shall be."—Rev. 22: 12. In conclusion, I would admonish all, as did the Savior: "Take heed and beware of the . . . doctrine of the Pharisees and of the Sadducees."

To the same effort that is being made on the part of certain scriptural interpreters to back up the Pharisees' faith with quotations from the christian fathers, I would reply in the language of Melancthon against the sophisms of Dr. Eck: "We ought not to explain the Holy Scriptures by the fathers, but the fathers by the Holy Scriptures. How often has not Jerome been mistaken! how often Augustine! how often Ambrose! How often do we not find them differing in judgment! how often do we hear them retracting their errors! There is but one Scripture divinely inspired and without mixture."—D'Aubigne's Hist. Ref., p. 219. Were we to quote the fathers, as we have done elsewhere, we could show, as did Luther in his stern reply to the insulting charge of Dr. Eck, on another matter:—"The fathers are not opposed to me; the most eminent divines say as I do. Let my antagonist then restrain his speech. Such expressions as he has just used do but stir up animosity, instead of helping in learned discussion."—Ib. p. 213. O. R. FASSETT.

HOW TO BE HAPPY.—Happiness is easily attainable in any position of life. Any body can be happy—only love God, and love to do good to all around you. This is the secret of true happiness. Let the incredulous unravel it; they will be satisfied of its truth, and feel better for the effort. "Practice makes perfect;" and therefore the more they practice this truth in their daily lives, the more solid and perfect will be the foundation of their happiness.

THOUGHTS ON IMMORTALITY.

CUTTING REBUKE.

It is contended by the advocates of endless woe that "the eternal sufferings of the lost will give the intelligent creation, as a whole, a higher knowledge and enjoyment of God." That is, "The woes of some will make others happy." So teaches Dr. Beecher. To this slanderous sentiment the Rev. S. Cobb retorts: "Now be it known that I, Sylvanus Cobb, will consent, and even petition to be permitted to forego that extra share of happiness which was to be added to me by the infinite sufferings of my brothers and sisters, and so put up with that moderate degree of happiness which I may enjoy in the divine love and grace in common with all, for the sake of having them, too, reformed and blessed." This sarcastic reviewer adds, we should "have a unanimous petition from the righteous to be disencumbered of that enormous surfeit of enjoyment which should be derived from the endless misery of others!"

AWFUL SLANDER.

Speaking of the miseries of the lost, Mr. Benson, the commentator, says: "God will exert all his divine attributes to make them as wretched as the capacity of their natures will admit. The "Rev." Mr. Vincent adds:—"The wicked will always be roaring and never breathe out the last; always sinking and never come to the bottom; always burning in the flames and never be consumed; the eternity of hell will be the hell of hell!" And Pres. Finney, of Oberlin, outdoes them all by saying, "this torment will eternally increase!" May we not suppose, with Mr. John Foster, of England, that if so transcendently dreadful a doctrine has been meant to be taught, there would have been such forms of propositions as to render all doubt a palpable absurdity." But the devotees of this doctrine may find relief in the remarks of Prof. Stuart. He says: "Perhaps God may in mercy extinguish our social susceptibilities in heaven!"

A PREDICTION.

The great and godly Dr. Vinet once sagaciously observed, that "Even now, after eighteen centuries of christianity, we are very probably involved in some enormous error, of which christianity will at some future time make us ashamed." The doctrine of endless woe is just such an "enormous error," and many in the churches are beginning to be ashamed of it.

CLOSING TRIBUTE.

Mr. Panton Ham, of Bristol, England, in writing on the immortality of the soul, says: "Let it be registered as the genuine genealogy, that Pagan Plato was its father, and the profligate Pope Leo its foster-father. Born and bred by the Pagan philosophy, the protege of Popery, this notion of the soul's immortality has become a pet dogma of popular Protestantism, which, with a strange forgetfulness of its low lineage, openly declares it to be the honorable offspring of a true orthodoxy!"

WHERE THE JEWS GOT THE DOCTRINE OF THE SOUL'S IMMORTALITY.

Dr. Geo. Campbell, in a criticism on the word hades, in the Appendix to his translation of the gospels, says: "Before the captivity, and the Macedonian and Roman conquests, the Jews observed the most profound silence upon the state of the dead, as to their happiness or misery. They spoke of it simply as a state of silence, darkness, and inactivity. But after the Hebrews mingled with the Greeks and Romans, they insensibly slided into their use of terms, and adopted some of their ideas on such subjects as those on which their Oracles were silent." Here is a valuable historic testimony concerning the former dispensation. Said Christ to his followers: "Beware of the leaven of the Pharisees and Sadducees."

GEN II. 7.

"And the Lord God formed man of the dust of the ground, and breathed into his nostrils the breath of life; and man became a living soul." This passage is clung to with much tenacity by those who believe in the popular theory of the soul. We are glad, however, to note the following concessions from the pens of those who hold the common view:

Dr. Bagnall, a writer in the Methodist Quarterly Review for April, 1852, makes the following frank admission on this text, though his article is an effort to prove the soul's immortality. The Dr. says: "Some have supposed that the account of the creation of the soul, Gen. 2: 7, contains an intimation of its immortality. If there be in this verse such an intimation, it must be found either in the expression, 'the Lord God . . . breathed into his nostrils,' or in the phrases, 'breath of life,' and 'man became a living soul.' If it be in the former phrase, then the idea is that God infused a portion of himself, of his own divinity, into the human body at that time. But few will admit this idea. Most of us think there is more poetry than truth in the line of one of our hymns:

'Our souls are his immortal breath.'

If the proof is sought in the phrases, 'breath of life,' and 'living soul,' these do not prove any thing, for both of them are applied, in the first chapters of Genesis, to brutes, and prove the same things concerning them. Thus the words in Gen. 7: 15, and Gen. 1: 20, rendered life, are the same with those rendered in Gen. 2: 7, 'a living soul.' ".

Says the Union Bible Dictionary (art. Adam): "It seems as if the most proper idea resulting from these words is, that Adam became a living person."

Mr. Kitto, author of the Bible Cyclopædia, in speaking of those theologists who find an immortal soul in this text, thus frankly concedes: "We should be acting unfaithfully if we were to assume its being contained or implied in this passage."

DICK'S VIEW OF ETERNAL SUFFERING.

Dr. Thomas Dick, in adverting to the doctrine of endless misery, thus candidly expresses his convictions: "When I consider the limited duration of man, I can scarcely bring myself to believe that the sins of a few brief years are to be punished throughout a duration that has no end." Thus wrote that distinguished Christian Philosopher, and thus, kind reader, do we believe. Is it strange that a certain divine who held to this awful doctrine should say, "It renders society tiresome, pleasure disgustful, nourishment insipid, and life itself a cruel bitter"? We trow not.

THE TWO VIEWS CONTRASTED.

Some professed christians (and for charity's sake we say only those who have but superficially examined the subject) ask us, What matters it whether we believe in eternal misery or not? Much every way; but especially would we be averse to any position which is derogatory to the character of God. We think, to use the language of another, that there is a vast difference between Jehovah's passing by and proclaiming, "The Lord, the Lord God, merciful and gracious, long-suffering, abundant in goodness and truth, keeping mercy for thousands, forgiving iniquity, and that will by no means clear the guilty,"—and the statement of some modern divine, who "passes by," and virtually "proclaims," "The Lord, unmerciful, implacable, and who will preserve countless myriads of beings created in his own image, eternally, for the sole and only purpose of torturing them, without mercy, without intermission, without end, without object, without aim." The doctrine of the destruction of the wicked speaks to us in these beatific words of Jehovah, but the revolting sentiment of eternal woe appears in the language of the other. "GOD IS LOVE," therefore we believe that sin and sinners will both ultimately cease to be.—Ex.

EFFECTUAL PRAYER.

An Address delivered by Mr. John Ashworth, at the opening of the Mission Hall, Nottingham.

"The effectual fervent prayer of a righteous man availeth much." I purpose to speak of prayer in regard to its influence—1. On national events; 2. On the vitality and prosperity of the christian church; and 3. On the temporal and spiritual welfare of individuals.

1. Prayer has much influence on national events. This proposition will not be admitted on all hands. Many persons, to whom we must give credit for honesty, refuse to accept the testimony of Scripture on this point, because, say they, the physical laws of the universe are immutable, and their operation could not be stayed or changed at the request of any man. Pope, when young, wrote these beautiful lines beginning,

"Vital spark of heavenly flame,
Quit, oh quit this mortal frame";

but in after years, under the influences which attended worldly distinction and prosperity, he could ask, tauntingly,

"Shall the huge mountain, trembling from on high,
Its gravitation cease while saints pass by?
Shall burning Etna, if a saint requires,
Recall her thunders and forget her fires?"

We answer yes, emphatically yes! Physical laws are apparently immutable, but other laws equally unchangeable are to be found in God's word. "All things whatsoever ye shall ask in prayer, believing, ye shall receive," is a law no less unalterable than the rising and setting of the sun. The God of the universe is also the God of the Bible, and therefore the investigations of science bear testimony to the truth of Scripture and always will do so. Let us not then call in question the promise, "All things whatsoever that ye shall ask in prayer, believing, ye shall receive." Like all God's sayings it is a sweeping saying.

We learn from the Bible how prayer has been answered in former days. When Moses was sent to liberate the captive Israelites, Pharaoh's obstinacy brought down upon the land various plagues. I will allude only to one—that of the thunderstorm. When that storm arose, Pharaoh became alarmed (there are many persons who will begin to pray in a thunderstorm, though never at any other time), and he asked Moses to stop it. Now what had Moses to do with the storm? The law is that when two clouds, charged, the one negatively and the other positively, with electricity, meet each other, equilibrium is restored, and the flash and report are produced. And yet when Moses went out into the streets and stretched forth his hand, the storm instantly ceased.

Do we believe the Bible, or do we not? I do believe that the prayer of a good man is heard in heaven. When the Israelites had escaped from bondage, and reached the banks of the Red Sea, and Pharaoh and his host followed hard after them, Moses lifted up his heart to the Lord, and the answer came,—"Wherefore criest thou unto me? Speak unto the children of Israel that they go forward." It was an unlikely command. On either side of them were precipitous mountains, and in front a sea twelve and a half miles broad at its narrowest part. But who made that sea? He who parted its waves for his children to pass through.

"Shall the huge mountain, trembling from on high,
Its gravitation cease while saints pass by?"

Is it not a law of liquids that they shall find their level? How was it, then, that those waters became as a wall of glass on either side of the Israelites? Do we believe the Bible? Thank God, I do. I believe that God suspended the laws of matter then, as it was very easy for him to do, and as he has often done since. It was by the exercise of the same Almighty power that the pillar of cloud—which never changed its position but on that occasion—went between the Israelites and their pursuers, with its bright side towards God's children showing them their way, and its dark side toward the devil's children blocking up their path. When they had entered the promised land, a conflict arose between the Israelites and some of the kings of the country. Do you remember Joshua's prayer? I do not think he intended to offer such a prayer. I think God sometimes inspires his servants to ask those things which he graciously purposes to grant, but also to [illegible] "Sun, stand thou still upon Gibeon; and thou, moon, in the valley of Ajalon."

"Shall the huge mountain, trembling from on high,
Its gravitation cease while saints pass by?"

Yes, the sun did stand still. But some wise men say that Joshua made an astronomical mistake; for the sun, as regards its position towards the earth, always stands still. These very men, however, use the same kind of language themselves; they say the sun rises and sets, and their objection does not affect the facts. God could suspend his physical laws in any way whatever, and so, at the simple request of one of his servants, the sun was made to stand still. When Sennacherib went up to Jerusalem, he sent to Hezekiah an insulting request to surrender. Hezekiah laid the letter before the Lord, and at the same time sent to Isaiah, asking him to pray on behalf of the besieged city; one hundred and eighty-five thousand trained soldiers surrounded the walls, and within there were two men at prayer. Here was a conflict going on, and what was the result? Friends, I believe the prayers of these two men exerted an influence which was sufficient not merely to destroy the hundred and eighty-five thousand besiegers, but to crush as many worlds had it been necessary. The angel of destruction was sent to destroy the invading army.

Let us take another instance. Elijah prayed that it might not rain, and it rained not for the space of three years and six months. I believe the Lord inspired him to offer that prayer, for Israel had departed from God, and the testing time had come. In national calamities the Lord's servants suffer with the wicked, and Elijah suffered in this time of distress. He went to Sarepta and there found a poor widow about to cook her last handful of meal, and he promised her that if she would give him to eat, the handful of meal should not fail. And it did not fail for the space of twelve months. Do we believe that? Many a poor sufferer has believed it and rejoiced that Elijah's God was his God.

But some may say, "You are speaking of an age of miracles. Come down to modern times." James anticipates the objection of such persons when he tells us, "Elijah was a man subject to like passions as we are." It is often said that the age of miracles is past, but it would be more true to say that the day of faith is past. Go to Bristol, and see the three magnificent buildings erected there as homes for orphans—the result of believing prayer. My friends, God lives! He "is the same, yesterday, to-day, and for ever."

The time came when Elijah prayed again, a voiceless prayer. "Go and look toward the sea," he said to his servant; "Go again seven times." If that servant had resembled some of us, he would have objected, "I have been once, what is the use of going again?" And yet the first time he went the cloud was forming, and had the earth been flat he might perhaps have seen it even then. A good man was praying, and God was preparing to pour out a blessing; but he tested Elijah's faith as he does ours—as he tested the faith of the Gentile woman, when he told her, "It is not meet to take the children's bread and cast it to dogs." Our Lord then used an expression common among the Jews, and familiar to the woman's ears. He had some crumbs of bread for her, but he was pleased to try her faith; he tested it for you and for me. And when Elijah's servant had gone the seventh time, he saw the "little cloud like a man's hand," for there is a God to hear, and a God to answer prayer.

2. The influence of prayer on the vitality and prosperity of the christian church. A prayerless church is a paradox; it cannot flourish. The members of such a church find time to quarrel among themselves who shall be the greatest, and when they do that there are not many great ones among them. But look for a moment at a praying church; visit that upper room at Jerusalem. Among my longings, I have wished I might have been there. The Holy Ghost came down upon them, and, praise the Lord, he comes down now. They were to tarry at Jerusalem till they were endued with power from on high, and the same qualification is required still. All the popes and bishops in the world cannot send a man to preach if God does not send him; and if God does send him, all the bishops and popes cannot keep him back.

When a church loves prayer, it is prosperous. A praying band of men and women here would shake all Nottingham. Some of us have felt what it is to be under such an influence that we know no enemies, that we could pass by thousands of insults without feeling them. If the churches were always filled with the spirit of prayer, there would be no revivals—no need for any, for a revival supposes that something wants reviving—but there would be a continual flow of prosperous influences, and a steady and rapid progress. I was speaking to a minister some time ago, who was lamenting that his church appeared to be dead. He resolved to spend one hour each day pleading for a blessing. Two weeks after he began this special prayer, a man who was driving a coal-cart saw him and asked when he would be at home, as he wished to see him. He appointed nine o'clock that night; and at the hour the man came in at the back door, sat down in a chair, and said, "I am seeking mercy, master." In a short time two other persons came to the house on a similar errand, and three chairs in the room were occupied by penitents. The feelings of the minister cannot be described. The influence extended, and a revival broke out which affected all that locality. I had this from the minister himself.

In no single case is a revival known to have taken place without prayer having first been made. Some years ago a young man in Ireland saw a copy of George Muller's report. He said to himself, "Is not his God my God?" and he determined to set apart a portion of every day for prayer for a blessing. One of his friends observing that he absented himself for a certain time daily, inquired the reason, and on hearing it, asked leave to join him in prayer. He consented, and they kept together half an hour each day. Another and another came, and the influence spread, and the result was the revival in the north of Ireland. O that we were such as we ought to be! Then thousands of those who are now going fast to destruction might be brought to God in a week.

I have not time to dwell on the third part of the subject, and therefore I will conclude in the words of a very sweet hymn, which has always been dear to me.

"Prayer is the christian's vital breath,
The christian's native air;
His watchword at the gate of death,
He enters heaven by prayer."

LETTERS ON REVISION.

LETTER I.—GOD SPEAKING TO MEN IN THEIR OWN TONGUE.

When God created man, he endowed him with intelligence and consciousness, and gave him language, as a medium for the interchange of thought and feeling between one individual and another of the race. And when he spoke to our first parents, after they had sinned; to Abraham, in his native land, and afterward in the land of his sojourn; and to the Israelites, through Moses and the successive prophets; he addressed them all in their own native language, with which they were perfectly familiar, and which they could understand at once, without labored effort, or explanation from others.

When the Lord Jesus appeared among men to introduce his holy religion, he affected no singularities of dress or speech, nor did he seek to separate his religion from the language and acts of every-day life. All these he made tributary to his one grand design, and declared: "My food is to do the will of him who sent me, and to finish his work" (John 4: 34). He drew his illustrations from the common scenes and occurrences around him, with which his hearers were well acquainted; and clothed those illustrations in language familiar to the ear and the heart. He did not attempt nor wish to invest his religion with awe or sublimity in the popular estimation, by shrouding it in mystery, after the manner of the Pagan or the Papist, or by veiling it with the obscure and meaningless utterances of an unknown tongue. Through their usual channel of receiving and imparting knowledge, he sought to arrest and fix the attention of his hearers, and draw them to himself and the practise of his requirements. He was not afraid of making the distinguishing truths and principles of his heavenly religion too easy or too common, by clothing them in the well-understood and expressive language of the sons of earth in the ordinary intercourse of life.

And when Jesus had been crucified and raised again from the dead, and God would have the good news of pardon and salvation through his name made known to the thousands of Jews who had assembled in Jerusalem, at the feast of Pentecost, from all the surrounding countries, he bestowed on the apostles the gift of tongues; that those multitudes might have the glad tidings announced to them, every man in his own tongue wherein he was born.

And when expressions in the written word had become obsolete or obscure to the Jewish remnant who had returned from their seventy years' captivity in Babylon, Ezra the priest and his assistants "read in the book, in the law of God, distinctly, and gave the sense, and caused the people to understand the reading." Neh. 8: 8.

The Psalmist also, in giving utterance to his own experience, declares: "Thy word is a lamp to my feet, and a light to my path."—Ps. 119: 105. But how could it have been so, if he had not clearly understood it? God says, through his servant Jeremiah, "He that hath my word, let him speak my word faithfully"; implying the speaking of just what God directs, in such language as may be readily and correctly understood. (Jer. 23: 28.)

God saw fit that there should be many languages among the inhabitants of earth; and his holy book, the Bible, unfolds to sinful men his wondrous plan of redeeming mercy through Christ. But each of the separate books composing the Bible was originally written in only one language—the books of the Old Testament in the Hebrew, and those of the New Testament in the Greek. The Bible, then, must be faithfully translated from the Hebrew and Greek into all the different languages which are spoken; that every man may be permitted to read and hear, "in his own tongue," of "the wonderful works of God" for the salvation of our fallen race.

If any people, therefore, are without the Bible, it should be correctly translated into their language or dialect, by competent christian scholars, and copies of it be printed and proffered to them. If any have a version that has become in part obsolete and obscure, let its obsolete and obscure or antiquated expressions be removed, and the entire volume be made to reflect, with clearness and fidelity, the light of God's truth. And if any people can be favored with such a corrected version, let them joyfully receive, prize, and use it, and delight to hear their heavenly Father speaking to them his words of truth and love, in the beautiful simplicity and fervor of their mother tongue.

Such a version in the English language, it is believed by many who have examined it, may be found in the octavo edition of the Revised New Testament, recently issued by the American Bible Union. Let it have a fair trial. C. W. WATERHOUSE.

THE SEWING MACHINES AND DICTIONARIES.

"A Webster's Dictionary is something that I very much want, and I should be glad if I could make up a list of ten subscribers, so as to obtain it. But those who sympathize with our views are so few here, that I shall be unable to get the number required. The five which I have sent are all I can get."

"With a large family to support, and no dependence but my needle, a Sewing Machine would be a great help to us; and if there were more of our faith in this place, or more who look upon it with favor, I should go to work with some hope of securing it. If the requisite number (32) were not so large, I think I could, fast is; but I must be content for the present, to go without what I so much need."

We have received a number of letters like the above, and to put the Sewing Machine and the Webster's Dictionary within the reach of all who are thus situated, we make the following offer:—

For every $5.00, with five new subscribers, and $2.50 from each for one year, one copy of WEBSTER'S ($12.00) UNABRIDGED DICTIONARY.

For every $20.00 with sixteen new subscribers, and $2.50 from each for one year, one of GROVER & BAKER'S ($55.00) SEWING MACHINES.

This offer, with the other, extends only till the 1st of June. All names for the Dictionaries or Machines must be sent in before that date.

THE WORLD'S CRISIS.

Valuable Premiums for New Subscribers!

SEWING MACHINES AND DICTIONARIES.

To every one who shall, any time before the 1st of June, send us, with the money, THIRTY-TWO NEW SUBSCRIBERS for One Year, ($2.50 each), or Sixty-four for Six Months, ($1.25 each), we will send, by express or rail, a

Grover & Baker's
($55) SEWING MACHINE,

one of the simplest, most durable, completest and best, (in our opinion the very best), in the market. A great labor-saving machine and blessing, in the family and work room; and a gift of priceless value, which you can now, with a little effort, present to your thankful wife, sister, mother or daughter.

FOR TEN NEW SUBSCRIBERS, with the money for One Year, or Twenty for Six months, one copy of

Webster's ($12)
UNABRIDGED DICTIONARY,

containing 10,000 words and meanings not found in other Dictionaries, over 3000 fine Engravings, and more matter than any other single volume in the world. Invaluable to every student, minister, or general reader.

FOR THREE NEW SUBSCRIBERS, with the money for One Year, or Six for Six Months, one copy, postpaid, of Cruden's Condensed Concordance.

or a Bible Dictionary; either and both of which are indispensable helps in the study of the Scriptures.

The names and monies can be sent in as fast as they are obtained, and when the full number is received, the Gift will be forwarded.

Come, brethren, a general rally from Maine to California! The Judge is at the door; and, with these gifts in view, and the greater reward yet to be given to all who do what they can to prepare a people for his coming, let us every one see what we can do.

EXPLANATION.

DEAR BRETHREN:—I want to say a few words to you, and say them kindly but plainly. I have been solicited by several brethren to visit different localities and preach. In each of these places there is an organized band of believers, and they should be the ones to determine who shall labor among them. Now, unfortunately, none of the solicitations which I have received have come from brethren residing in the localities where they ask me to go; and I do not feel at liberty to thus thrust myself (perhaps against the wishes of that particular church) upon any organized band of brethren, without either a general, or special invitation from them. For instance, a most excellent and worthy brother, occupying a responsible position among us, and living in Boston (Bro. M. G.), desires me to go to Montreal, C. E., and labor with the church there for a week or so. Now I am ready to comply with his request and go there, or elsewhere, if they desire it, and will express such desire, stating the time when; but I am not willing to go to any church, unsolicited by the church to which I go. See my address under the proper head—"Post-office address."

DISCUSSION IN LOWELL.

We have arranged to hold a discussion in Lowell, Mass., Lee St., on the subject of Spiritualism, commencing Monday evening, March 26th, and continuing five evenings.

NEW VOLUME.

This number begins a new volume of the Crisis; and with it we hope our readers will renew their efforts to extend its circulation. If they could read all the letters we receive, expressing the benefits derived from perusing its pages, they would feel much encouraged to get others to read it also. It is very common for persons to write that they were all in the dark in relation to many important Bible truths, till a certain brother sent them the "Crisis." Some of them do not yet know who was so kind as to send the paper to their address, but now feel that they cannot do without it.

Now is a good time to send the paper to your friend, or to persuade your neighbor to take it. It may be the means of his salvation. Let us aim to do more and more for Jesus every year till he comes. Now is the favored hour to get the attention of the people, before their minds are all abroad in the exciting scenes which are about to open. They are anxious now to hear and read about the coming of Christ; more so than we have seen them for years.

We would remind all our subscribers that this is the time to pay for the coming year. Please send at once and have it off your mind.

MEETINGS IN BOSTON.

We are having the most interesting meetings at Lowell St. Chapel, corner of Causeway and Lowell streets, Boston, that we have had since our acquaintance in the city. Bro. J. O. Hook has been holding meetings afternoons and evenings for some days. A goodly number have been converted, and others are seeking the Lord. Some active christians come in from other churches, and render efficient aid. There is a deep, heart-searching work in progress. Some nights they are unable to close their meetings till near midnight. An earnestness is manifested which is seldom witnessed, and the results are blessed. Pray for us.

PHILADELPHIA.

On our return from Washington, we spent Monday evening, March 5th, in Philadelphia, and had a blessed season with the saints in the city of "Brotherly Love." We found their meetings had increased in interest, and that more were anxious to hear on the plan of salvation. Our meeting was held in Christian street, in the house occupied by the Mount Zion church. A goodly number were present, and we met a hearty welcome from the friends of Jesus.

At the close of the sermon, we had an excellent conference meeting. Some twelve or fifteen came forward for prayers. Some, who had been professors, felt the necessity of living nearer to the Lord, in order to be ready for his coming. The prospect looked very encouraging. The meetings were to be continued.

We met some very devoted christians, with whom we had a most delightful and profitable interview. It was a feast indeed, and will be remembered with much pleasure. We expect to see them soon in the everlasting kingdom.

NEW YORK.

We spent Tuesday evening, March 6th, in New York, and held a meeting in 24th street, where Bro. Samuel Curry formerly was pastor. We had the house well filled with attentive listeners. We found a free air, and hearts that were hungry for the truth. We endeavored to show that our Savior will soon appear. There were many present who could truly say, "Even so, come, Lord Jesus." Their countenances showed that they loved the coming of our Redeemer, and hence have the promise of "a crown of righteousness" when he comes. We had a most excellent conference meeting after the sermon. We found them ready to work. It was a real "union meeting." Although different churches were represented, we felt a strong spirit of oneness which seemed to possess all minds. It was a heavenly season. We have seldom enjoyed a meeting as good as that. Three rose for prayers, and we trust others will start soon.

Here we met Bro. S. Curry of New York, and Bro. Stewart of Philadelphia. The latter agreed to stay and hold a meeting the next evening. We found some brethren who were very strong in the faith that Jesus will soon come. In nearly all places we find a growing interest on this subject; not only among those who have been interested for years, but in the various churches. We learn that in England there are ten thousand ministers who are preaching the speedy coming of Christ; and more are awaking up to this important subject. It is high time all were awake, and ready for the grand event.

"THE LAST TIMES."—We would call special attention to the article in another column, headed "The Last Times." We think the writer takes a correct view of things, and brings before us a very important truth; and a timely warning.

☞ We hope all will give Bro. Fassett's articles on the "Rich Man" a careful reading. We think they should be published in a tract and scattered far and wide.

WEST HAVEN.

Wednesday evening, March 7th, we commenced meetings in West Haven, Ct., about two miles from New Haven, and continued them every evening through the week, and over the following Lord's day. We met Bro. Burbank there, who had preached two or three evenings. There is a lively interest in that place. A few earnest brethren have held prayer meetings there for some weeks, and as the result several have been converted. The interest is still good. Fourteen were baptized on the Lord's day, Mar. 11th, and were blessed with sweet peace. Others have decided to improve the next opportunity. We had a heavenly communion season in the evening, when forty gathered around the table of the Lord, and renewed their covenant with him to endure to the end.

Some young men, who have been recently converted, and had formed the bad habit of using tobacco, took a noble stand, and resolved to use it no more forever. We hope all who wish to be cleansed from "all filthiness of the flesh and spirit," will imitate their worthy example. Satan is using all his arts to get every one to indulge in some bad habits, knowing that they are more likely to backslide. It is a perilous hour in which we are living, and we need on "the whole armor of God" in order to stand. It will not do to make any compromise with the enemy of all righteousness. He knows his time is short, and hence his efforts to overthrow the saints are put forth with all the strength of which he is master. Let us "fight the good fight of faith," and soon the eternal victory will be ours.

SPIRITUALISM.—NO. 11.

"Now the Spirit speaketh expressly that in the latter times some shall depart from the faith, giving heed to seducing spirits, and doctrines of devils."—1 TIM. 4: 1.

THE DOCTRINES OF SPIRITUALISM.

We will continue the examination of the "Spirits' Creed."

9. Man is the Son of God as truly as Christ. Gibson Smith, a prominent Spiritualist, and one of the earliest believers, in giving a synopsis of his belief says:—

"I do not believe that the person who is called Jesus Christ was, or is, 'God's only Son.'.. He ... is no more the Son of God than was John Howard or George Washington."

A spirit says: "Christ was a natural man... Christ never performed a miracle during his sojourn on earth."

Said Mrs. Henderson, a noted Spiritualist, when speaking at the Melodeon in Boston:—"Jesus... had natural parents... We cannot believe that there was any thing marvelous either in his birth, his life, or in his death... You claim that there may not be another Christ on earth; but we see no reason why there may not be myriads of them.... Christ never died."

Says a spirit, whose communication was published in the Banner of Light —

"No law of God was ever broken—no law was ever violated." "If Jesus Christ was the Son of the Most High God, so are you, every one of you."

Another says:—"Jesus of Nazareth was a good man, but by no means infallible—no more divine than you are—no more the special child of God than you are."

The foregoing is utterly opposed to the Bible, which teaches that Jesus is "the only begotten of the Father" (John 1: 14), "the only begotten Son" (John 1: 18); "God so loved the world, that he gave his only begotten Son, that whosoever believeth on him should not perish, but have everlasting life."—John 3: 16. All the spirits deny that Jesus was begotten by the Holy Ghost, as the Scriptures teach, and hence deny that he was the Son of God, making him only the bastard son of Joseph.

Said a lecturer, with whom we are personally acquainted, "I pity you, if you depend on the old, stinking, rotten, miserable body and blood and bones of that Jesus Christ for salvation." Does this sound like christianity? or, like demonism?

10. Man is God.

In the "Educator," a book of 680 octavo pages, professedly coming from the spirits of some of the most noted men that have lived on the earth,—such as Daniel Webster, John Quincy Adams, Robert Rantoul, Aristotle, Martin Luther, Socrates, Roger Williams, etc., we find the following:—

"God is man, and man is God.... Tell us of God, ... they might as well say, Tell us of ourselves." "The being called God exists, organically, in the form of the being called man."—Educator, p. 303.

Says another spirit:—"Every one of you are Gods manifest in the flesh." "The divine existence is one grand universal mass." "Man is God's embodiment—his highest, divinest, outer elaboration. God, then, is man, and man is God."—Educator, p. 526.

Another spirit says:—"When man became a living soul, he became a God." "All living souls are Gods. They die not." "So, living soul, rejoice in thy wisdom,... be a King, a God, a Jehovah." "You are all Gods, every one of you." "Look within yourself, and behold yourself a God, responsible for every act. Read the inscriptions there, and thou shalt learn that thou art a God in thyself, and thine own judge."

A spirit, claiming to be Wm. H. Miller, says:—"God is a spirit; man is a spirit; then the two are one. All men who shall outlive all grossness—who shall have passed beyond all that is mundane and material—go to make up the Godhead, the superior portion of the intellectual world; and the many millions who inhabit the wisdom sphere, may be recognized as the one God."

11. There is no God.

The spirits teach that there is "no God" existing as a person, but only as a principle in all matter, like attraction, electricity, or magnetism. A spirit says:—

"There is no God anywhere to forgive sin." "There is no such thing as forgiveness for sin."

A spirit, calling himself Orlando Jenks, says:—"If I was coming back to preach, I should say, don't believe in God."

"The idea of a God of illimitable capacity is so incomprehensible, that, in our judgment, is borders on the absurd. God, in the abstract, is a nonentity—an ideality of man's brain."—Spiritual Telegraph, Jan. 24, '57.

Another spirit says:—"We must regard him (God) as a central principle, but not as a being.... A principle existing in matter, in all conditions, and in all relations, a part of every thing."

"The Divine is of necessity... a vast ocean of magnetism."—Educator, p. 326.

A spirit, claiming to be Joseph Foster, says:—"Ah, there is no God, there can be none.... What's the use of telling them of a God when there is none.... I tried to serve God, and there aint any."

A Free Lovers' institution has been established by the Spiritualists at Berlin Heights, Ohio, where a paper, called the Age of Freedom, has been published, in which we find the following:—

"What a horrible phantom, what a soul-crushing superstition is this idea of an over-ruling, omnipresent, all-powerful God... Belief in a God is degrading, whatever the character ascribed to him. Where is your God? I can stand up and look him in the face, and affirm that I have a right to 'life, liberty and happiness,' whether it is his pleasure that I shall enjoy them or not. It is perfectly plain, then, that his godhood or my manhood must succumb! If I can beat him at even one point, he is no God. But if I can 'make a case' once, I can a thousand times, in the case of every single right; and if I maintain my manhood in spite of him, so may every other human being, and so the God is nowhere—utterly routed."

At the Spiritual Convention, held for the purpose of inquiring into "the cause and cure of evil," Dr. R. T. Hallock said, as reported in the Spiritual Telegraph, when speaking of the sentiments of another:—

"Now we may cheerfully sympathize with his mirthful explosion of the popular Divinity; no merciful man will object even to his expunging from his vocabulary the three hateful little letters [G-o-d] which express it."

A spirit, who calls himself Thomas Rice, when speaking of some friends, says, "I want to tell those friends that there is no God. I know there is no such gentleman."

What can be more purely the "doctrine of devils," or demons, than the foregoing? Does this sound like the teaching of our dear friends and relatives, who lived in the service of the Lord, and died happy in his love? But it is just what we should expect from demons—the lying and "seducing spirits," who were to do a special work "in the latter times."

12. We now come to their "CARDINAL DOCTRINE," the one which the spirits and their followers claim to be the most important of all; without which their system could not stand. It is the one on which the whole rests—the foundation stone. And is it reasonable to suppose that this one is a Bible doctrine? The apostle says they are "doctrines of devils"; and he does not intimate that their chief doctrine is one taught in the Scriptures. We say again, such an idea looks very unreasonable. What is this "cardinal doctrine"? The spirits express it as follows:—

"If man would become satisfied of modern Spiritualism, he must first be satisfied that he is an immortal being."

A spirit says: "The first, the greatest, and the grandest truth, coming through modern Spiritualism, is the immortality of the soul."

Another spirit says: "I come... for the purpose of letting my friend (or relative) know that he has an immortal soul—that's all I wish to establish. When once that is established, this one simple germ of knowledge will work out all the rest."

A demon appears, and professes to be the spirit of Emanuel Swedenborg. He is asked,

"Is it one of the principal objects of these communications to convince men of the immortality of the soul?—Yes. Why are these communications made now more than formerly? Is it because that doctrine is more doubted now?—Yes."

Another spirit, or demon, says: "The visitations and manifestations from the spirit-world are to convince you of the immortality of the soul."

Spirits say, the corner-stone of this new enterprise rests on the following eternal principles:—

"Man is immortal."—Educator, p. 133.

"Human beings congratulate themselves that they alone are immortal."—Edu. p. 265.

The primal pair had "the star of individual immortality."—Edu. p. 573.

At a convention of Spiritualists, held in Rockford, Ill, in 1857, the following resolution was adopted:—

Resolved, That Spiritualism, according to the modern acceptation of that term, embraces all those who believe in the IMMORTALITY OF THE SOUL.... Beyond this common faith, there is no doctrine or creed necessarily incident to Spiritualism."

It may be asked, why are the demons so anxious to have us believe this doctrine? The reason is obvious. Their leader taught our first parents, in their paradise home, that they should not die, which was contradicting what the Lord had said. The statements stand thus:—"Thou shalt surely die."—Gen. 2: 17. "Ye shall not surely die."—Gen. 3: 4. Which told the truth? If Adam is still alive, and is immortal, then it follows that the deceiver has the truth on his side; but if Adam died, then Satan is proved a liar from the beginning, as the Scriptures affirm. We read that Adam was "sent ... forth from the garden of Eden," "lest he put forth his hand, and take also of the tree of life, and eat, and live forever."—Gen. 3: 22, 23. Here we see the mercy of God in not allowing Adam to become immortal, and thus perpetuate sin and misery eternally. We read again,—"All the days that Adam lived were nine hundred and thirty years, and he died."—Gen. 5: 5. No language could teach more clearly that Adam was mortal. Again we read,—"Shall mortal man be more just than God?"—Job. 4: 17. As man is now mortal, how can he get immortality? The apostle gives a very plain answer to this question. When speaking of what God will do, he says:—"Who will render to every man according to his deeds: to them who, by patient continuance in well doing, seek for glory and honor and immortality, eternal life."—Rom. 2: 6–7. Here we learn that the condition by which we may gain immortality is "patient continuance in well doing." Should we be exhorted to "seek for ... immortality," if we were already immortal, as the demons teach? Such an idea seems absurd. Now if the demons can make us believe that man does not die, then of course the doctrine of the resurrection of the dead is false; for man cannot be raised from the dead, if he never dies. But if the demons can persuade us that they are the spirits of our friends, who once lived on earth, then they can easily accomplish the rest of their work of destruction; hence their "Cardinal doctrine," on which their whole system rests, is a belief in the immortality of the soul. Take this away, and their infernal work is at once exposed; also hero-worship, Catholicism, with its prayers to saints, and its purgatory; Swedenborgianism, Mohammedanism and Shakerism, must all go down with Spiritualism; for they all rest on the same doctrine of the immortality of the soul, which we find no where taught in the Bible.

We close this part of the subject by an extract from "Spiritualism as it is," by Dr. Wm. B. Potter, who has had much experience in Spiritualism. When speaking of the contradictory teachings of the spirits he says:—

"The teachings and theories given through the different manifestations, are as various as it is possible to conceive. Indeed, few of the most devoted "seekers after truth under difficulties" are aware of the endless contradictions and absurdities that are mixed up with the most exalted truths and the most profound philosophies. We have room for only a tithe of them, for we have not yet found the first question or subject about which they do not contradict each other....

We are taught that God is a person; that he is impersonal; that he is omnipotent; that he is governed by nature's laws; that every thing is God; that there is no God; that we are gods. We are taught that the soul is eternal; that it commences its existence at conception, at birth, at maturity, at old age. That all are immortal, that some are immortal, that none are immortal. That the soul is a winged monad in the centre of the brain, that it gets tired, and goes down into the stomach to rest; that it is material, that it is immaterial; that it is unchangeable; that it changes like the body, that it dies with the body, that it develops the body, that it is developed by the body, that it is human in form, that it is in but one place at a time, that it is in all places at the same time.

We are taught that the spirit world is on earth—just above the air—beyond the milky way. That it has but one sphere, three spheres, six spheres, seven spheres, thirty-six spheres, an infinite number of spheres. That it is a real, tangible world, that it is all a creation of the mind of the beholder, and appears different to different spirits. That it is inhabited by animals, birds, etc., that they do not inhabit it. That it is a sea of ether, that it is a plain, that it has mountains, lakes and valleys, that it is a belt around the earth. We are taught that spirits eat food—live by absorption, live on magnetism—thoughts,—love. That they control media by will power, by magnetism, by entering media, by standing by their side, by an influence beyond our atmosphere, by permission of the Lord.

That spirits converse by thought reading, by oral language. That their music is harmony of soul, that it is instrumental and vocal. That they live single; in groups of nine. That they marry without having offspring; that they have offspring by mortals; that they have offspring by each other. That their marriage is temporary; that it is eternal. That spirits never live again in the flesh; that they do return, and enter infant bodies, and live many lives in the flesh. That some are born first in the spheres, and afterwards are born on earth in the flesh. That the true affinity is born in the spirit world at the same time that the counterpart is born on earth. That all spirits are good; that some are bad; that all progress, that some progress, that none progress....

That there is no high, no low, no good, no bad. That murder is right, lying is right, slavery is right, adultery is right. That whatever is, is right. That nothing we can do, can injure the soul, or retard its progress. That it is wrong to blame any; that none should be punished; that man is a machine, and not to blame for his conduct....

That the spirit of the tree exists in perfect form after the tree is burnt. That monads are God's thoughts and go through all forms of rocks, trees, animals, and at last become men. That we see by a positive radiation, that goes out from the eyes, and touches things. That thoughts are living entities, and may flow down the arm, on to the paper, if that is burnt, they float around. That spirit is substance, in absolute condensation; that matter is substance, whose particles never touch. That sexual union is necessary to health and development, that it is a great help to media to get spiritual elements, but, if the parties are not adapted, it is a great injury and an awful wrong. That as people develop they become unadapted, and poison each other. That affinities will be perfectly satisfied with each other. That to live together without perfect love, is worse than prostitution. That all earthly marriage is of the flesh, and must end; and, that the true affinity is a spirit mate, born at the same time in spirit life that the counterpart is born on earth.

N. B.—All the above teachings we have heard given by media, or from communications."

It will be seen from the foregoing, that the demons vary their teaching according to the belief of those whom they would seduce. They do not tell the christian when he first consults them, that "there is no God;" because they know full well that he would reject their testimony; but as soon as they think there is a chance for success, they endeavor to raise doubts in his mind about the truth of the Bible, and thus lead him on from one step in infidelity to another, till he becomes a bold scoffer against the holy doctrine of the Scriptures.

DANGERS AHEAD.

Says the New York Daily Herald, of March 12th, 1866:—

"No point in our history has been more dangerous than this; and we may see the real extent of this danger by comparing our position with analagous ones in the history of other nations."

In a late speech of a Senator in Congress, he is reported to have said:—

"The country is alarmed, the people are anxious, and the political atmosphere bodes the coming of no common storm. What can we do to prevent it, and bring back peace to the country and harmony to the party? Is there no common ground on which we can stand? Is there no common standard round which we can rally.... If, however, we refuse moderate counsel, the only remedy will be to take the consequences, and they seldom linger long behind the act."

Candid, thinking, observing men, are well satisfied that some great event is at hand.

Bro. HENRY NOCK, William Street, Swan Road, West Bromwich, Staffordshire, Eng., writes:—"A friend of ours returned from America to England some twelve months ago, and brought with him some works entitled, 'Death not Life,' 'Ghostology,' 'Pauline Theology,' 'Bible View of Creation,' and others. We have carefully read and studied them prayerfully, as we are members of the orthodox church; and we have seen such a beauty in the above works, that we have been led to believe them, and adopt the principles they contain, believing them to be the truth taught in the holy word of God."

For the World's Crisis.

OUR MISSION TO THE FREEDMEN.

FROM BRO. HIMES' JOURNAL.

AMONG THE POOR.

Monday, Feb. 12. Having no appointments this week, I have devoted my time to the interests of our school, and to the poor among Freedmen. We have met the wants of every case among the worthy poor brought to our notice, from the clothing sent by kind friends from the North, and have some articles left for others that may apply.

FREEDMEN'S SCHOOLS.

Had an interview with Mr. Waters, the Government Superintendent of the Freedmen. He is a noble and generous-hearted man, and well suited for his work. All the Freedmen's schools report to him. He informs me of the rapid progress of the colored children, and that they will give a good account of themselves. The friends of education have a hard time now, but Southern prejudice must give way; but there are no signs of it in this city as yet. There are one thousand Freedmen and their children being educated in this city by missionaries from the different christian churches in the North, whose influence must be seen and felt ere long....

In most places we are not allowed even to hire a room, or teach at all; while in other places schools are established only to be broken up, and sometimes the houses burned and the teachers banished. Indeed, there is no protection as yet in the South for a Northern man or woman engaged in teaching or preaching, except in the immediate vicinity of the United States army; and as the troops are being rapidly withdrawn from this great field, both Northern men and Freedmen have a dark future.

THE STATE OF SOCIETY HERE.

I have been residing in this city, Brownsville, Helena, and Lagrange for about two months—the most of the time in Memphis. I have been a close observer of the state of society; and, aside from Southern hatred of the North, and their treatment of the negro race, there is a sad state of society. Drunkenness, debauchery, house-breaking, robberies, pocket-picking, and garroting abound. This city has about sixty or seventy thousand inhabitants, and is now under civil law. There are about one hundred policemen, of whom it is said, they are never to be found when wanted. Most persons who are out at night go armed, in anticipation of garroters. No man feels safe in the street after dusk; and in some parts of the city one is not safe even in the daylight. In going to and from meetings, and school, I have had to be guarded, and even then, with nothing but my Bible and Hymn Book, would not be safe in case of an attack by a company of two or three ruffians armed to the teeth. God alone can preserve us....

If society is not as it was in the days of Noah, and Lot in Sodom, when can it be? We are surely in the midst of the perils of the last days, and the violence and wickedness of the times indicate the coming of the Son of man near at hand. May the event be hastened.

THE FEELING AMONG RELIGIONISTS.

I turn from this terrible picture to another view of the case. While people from the North are shut out from Southern sympathy, and especially Northern ministers, teachers, and professors of religion generally, even by their own denominations, many professors of religion from the North look with a spirit of scorn upon us, as Adventists, and treat us much as their own Southern brethren treat them. I have to meet this treatment from those from whom I hoped for better things. But "the love of many has waxed cold," and we may not look for any better things in this last time, on the eve of the coming judgment.

A Northern minister, whom I met unexpectedly at church among the Freedmen, said to me, "Have you come down here to teach these poor creatures that the world is to be burned up this year?" No, sir; for I do not believe it. I have come to help my brethren and sisters of the North, who have provided garments, books, and teachers for them; and we want to do what we can for their good before the Master comes. And I expect to tell them the truth on the subject of redemption near, in order to cheer their hearts; and I hope to see many of them converted and prepared for that day.

But the idea of the personal coming of Christ at hand was looked upon with contempt; and this theme is hated by the mass of professors both North and South. But, thank God! whenever I have had the opportunity to present this theme to the pious Freedmen, they have received it with joy. This is my consolation. But I long to be once more in the society of those who look for the coming One, and I love the thought of his glorious advent.

THE CHURCH SOUTH.

The church in the South is still in great darkness. They do not discern the signs of the times, or as yet see that in the enslavement and heathenizing of millions of the colored race they have sinned.... The Southern church is worse than the State; for the State has made a confession of its wrongs by some righteous legislation. But the church holds to the great wrong of slavery, and even now would justify it by the Bible, and perpetuate it for ever!...

There is yet another view of things that saddens the heart of the christian. It is, that what few professors there are should be so sadly deficient in the great characteristics and graces of the christian character. Many of the white people are worldly, proud, and conformed to the gay fashions of the world. Drinking habits are common; and among the Freedmen, with all their manifestations of zeal and piety, most of them drink, and many of their ministers indulge in this habit. One of the most discouraging features of our work among this poor and hitherto suffering people is their habit of drinking, contracted from their former masters. Drinking, chewing, smoking and snuff-dipping are general. Whites and blacks are alike addicted to these habits.

A SAD HEART.

After an earnest labor of near three months in the South, among whites and blacks, chiefly with the latter, I return home with a sad heart. It is true I have seen some good, and have been instrumental, I hope, in doing some little good; yet everything is dark and saddening. The great mass cannot be reached. The saloons, and other places of dissipation, are crowded with the profane, while the churches are thinly attended, and supported by a membership that is sadly wanting in the essential characteristics of true christianity.

We are, indeed, in the last times. The only thing that can cheer us is, that this very picture is a sign of speedy redemption. Come, Lord Jesus!—Voice.

For the World's Crisis.

DIARY LEAVES—No. 3.

When we left the readers of the Crisis, in Diary Leaves No. 2, we were speaking of our visit to Whitefield, N. H., and of the scenery of the Franconia range of mountains, and intended then to have given No. 3 soon after, but circumstances have seemed to order it otherwise.

We left Boston by invitation of Eld. J. A. Cleaveland, pastor of the church in Whitefield, N. H., to visit his pastorate, and spend two Sundays with them. After riding several hours in Nahum's chariots on the B. C. and M. R. R. to Littleton, N. H., we had to change from the cars to an express wagon, in which we rode about thirteen miles, over one of the roughest roads in all the hill country of the Granite State, as seemed to me. We arrived at Whitefield Village about eight o'clock in the evening. On our arrival, we found Bro. I. M. Aldrich waiting to conduct us to his pilgrim home, where we were kindly cared for in every department of the physical man.

We spent two Sundays with Bro. C.'s charge, and also had one meeting in the exterior part of his parish, and had a very good time in speaking on the subject of paradise lost and paradise restored. We found a willing ear, in "the regions beyond," to hear the great truths we preach.

From Whitefield we came to Woodstock, N. H., where we had a protracted meeting appointed. The weather the first of the week seemed rather unfavorable, but soon became fair, and on Thursday evening we commenced our meetings, and continued them Friday evening, Saturday all day and evening, and over Sunday.

Sunday A. M., we spoke on the subject of the day of judgment and retribution, when all would be rewarded according to their works, involving a necessity of the bringing to life those who are dead. A deep impression was made on the minds of the audience, and indications of the work of God in the conversion of sinners were visible. Sunday evening, there were fifteen, more or less, that rose for prayers. We continued our meetings during the week, and God worked wonderfully. Lord's day, P. M., we buried five happy souls in the Pemigewassett river, who one week previous were without the hope of the gospel, and in the road to perdition. O how good it is to see the perishing, those who without the hope of eternal life, fleeing to Christ for refuge, and securing to themselves eternal safety, and everlasting blessedness in the Edenic home of the good of all ages.

During the second week of our meetings, Eld. A. B. Russell, pastor of the F. W. Baptist church, rendered us efficient aid in our meetings, and seemed interested in the great truths which we preach, viz., the personal advent of our Savior to the world again, and also the final abode of the saints in the new heavens and new earth. Bro. Russell stated to the audience, that he firmly believed the second, personal coming of our Savior was near, and that the inheritance of the saints would be under the new heavens, on the new earth; and for his part, he could not see how the doctrine of Christ's soon coming could produce a bad effect, and he thought the influence of the doctrine of the coming of Christ soon was calculated to produce a greater consecration to God on the part of christians, and awaken a deeper devotional feeling. Bro. R. has a connection with the M. E. church, but, unlike many of them, has native independence enough to think outside of the old ruts, and that there may be some good things come out of Nazareth.

During our meetings, Bro. Russell's son came out happy in the Lord, and has since been baptized by his father, and seven others also.

We organized a church in Woodstock, which adopted the following name and church covenant:—

"The Advent Christian Church.

"We, the undersigned, believers in the Lord Jesus Christ, do hereby agree to walk together in the observance of the precepts, commands and ordinances of our Savior and his apostles, watching over each other, and to take the New Testament as our rule of faith and practice, making christian character the only test of christian fellowship; endeavoring in all things to build each other up on our most holy faith in Christ."

Your Bro., in hope of eternal life,

A. W. SIBLEY.

For the World's Crisis.

MUST WE BE CLEANSED BY FIRE?

Reader, are you free? Are you filled with that "love that casteth out fear," so that you can say, "I fear no evil?" Are you free from envy, and wrath, and hatred? Do you love your neighbor as yourself, and do you always forgive as you wish to be forgiven? These are close questions; but let us one and all give them an honest, candid answer. After we have attended to the questions already proposed, let us go one step farther and ask if we always "eat and drink, and whatsoever we do, do all to the glory of God?"

Bro. Himes paints a sad picture for us to contemplate. In his travels, he finds only one "saint" (by which term, in this connection, we suppose he means "church member") to twenty-five profane and openly wicked persons. Only one in twenty-five even profess religion! But this is not all, and we are sorry to say, this is not the worst of it. Among church-members (excuse me for not saying saints), with all their apparent zeal and piety, most of them drink! And is any thing worse coming? Yes, "many of their ministers indulge this habit!"

Bro. Himes goes on to say that "drinking, chewing, smoking, and snuff-dipping are general." No wonder our dear brother "returns home with a sad heart." Truly the whole creation "groaneth and travaileth in pain." O why are we not free? I know some argue that we cannot be free till death. But we profess to believe that not death, but Jesus, makes us free His blood cleanseth from all sin.

But how is this work done? Have we nothing to do about it? Can we drink, and smoke, and chew, and take snuff, and say we are "clean every whit?" Do not these things "defile a man?" And we may go further and carry this principle into our table habits. Can we eat like gluttons, and ruin our health, and yet be without sin? Can we indulge to excess in nameless vices, and yet profess to be cleansed in that precious blood? Ah! this vile world is soon to be cleansed by fire. O let us strive to be so clean that the Lord will take us to himself, and not leave us to be consumed with the "filthy dreamers, who defile the flesh, and speak evil of dignities."

Correspondence.

From Bro. J. C. Rice.

Bro Grant:—It is with a sad heart that I inform you that death has again entered our family circle and riven our hearts by its cruel agency the typhoid fever, and has dragged our loved father (Israel Rice) to the dark tomb; for which we sorrow, but not as those without hope, for we are assured that the same Spirit which raised Christ from the dead dwelt with him; and we feel assured, also, that the same Spirit will quicken him and bring him up in like manner, at the day of general restitution, by which hope we are comforted exceedingly. Who would not want to see death vanquished? Who would not wish to change these scenes of sorrow and separation, disease, trouble and mortality, for those of joy and eternal union, ease, peace, and immortality? Then, I ask in all sincerity and earnestness, who would not want the Life-giver, "the Nobleman," the Captain of our salvation, to return? Can there be any? Who have not suffered from the cruel inroads of that dreaded enemy? Who have not felt the finger of disease upon them? O! who have not suffered from this trying state of insecurity? Then who can feel like blaming those who are poring over the Scriptures of divine truth, in order to glean all the information and comfort possible concerning the ushering in of so glorious, so desirable, yea, so requisite an event? Again I ask, Who? O! why so much antipathy to that crowning event of all blessedness; one that will stamp an eternal end upon sin, and therefore upon its attendant evils, sickness, sorrow, pain and death? O! who cannot long for that event when the eyes of the blind shall be opened, the ears of the deaf unstopped; when the lame man shall leap as an hart, and the tongue of the dumb shall sing; when the ransomed of the Lord shall return and come to Zion with songs and everlasting joy upon their heads, and shall obtain joy and gladness, and sorrow and sighing shall flee away; when there will be nothing to hurt nor destroy in all the holy mountain? Who? Who?

I cannot represent the extent of the loss we sustained when we were called upon to extend the parting hand, and bid adieu to a loved father, both in our family tie of sociality, and in a more general sense; viz., in our church, in the temperance movement, and in general good; neither is it necessary to make mention of the pungency of our sorrow as we beheld death's cruel finger feeling for the heartstrings of one whom we loved so dearly; but it does sometimes require an effort to refrain from writhing under a sense of our loss, though he be taken from the trouble to come; and were it not for the comforts tendered by holy inspiration, we feel that it would be almost impossible to submit to the stroke.

When we meet in our social meetings and conferences, and witness the vacancy as well as miss the encouraging exhortations of one so prominent, and reflect that that voice which has so often been heard there importuning our Father's grace and mercies, stimulating the tried and tempted in the path of holiness, and endeavoring to "give to each a portion of meat in due season," is silent in death, and will never more be heard this side of the day of redemption; a chord is touched which instantly becomes unstrung, and again we importune our Father for sustaining grace, "gird up the loins of our minds" if possible, still more closely, and repeat our resolution to "watch unto prayer" still more carefully, that we may be enabled to strike hands with him and other loved ones on the shore of immortality. Then imagination makes an attempt to scan the appearance of the redeemed. How gloriously high will be the degree of happiness enjoyed by the favored ones of the Lord, if its proportionate effects upon the entire system be in accordance with its thrilling effects upon so small a portion as the heart, in our present state, even allowing that our senses be no more acute and susceptible of glory and pleasure than now. Ah! how blessed, truly; in contemplation of which the great apostle found himself swimming in such a depth of glory and pleasure that, in his apparently failing effort to get language to convey a full idea of his sense of its magnitude (though we would presume that he had command of all that could be obtained in either the Hebrew or Greek vocabulary, having studied under that celebrated [D. D. Gamaliel]), he at last has to content himself with terming it, "a far more exceeding and ETERNAL WEIGHT of glory." My soul! O! who would not deny himself of ALL ungodliness and worldly lusts, and live soberly, righteously and godly in this world, during this short life, in order to participate in those glories and pleasures throughout an endless eternity? Think of it, dear brother, dear sister, and dear sinner. O decide in the affirmative, and I will, by God's grace, meet you on the shores of eternal glory. Amen. Your Bro. in the lively hope of speedy redemption, Jos. C. Rice.

Hillsburgh, N. S.

From Sr. A. E. Smith.

Brethren and Sisters:—On the 18th of January, I started in company with Bro. Campbell and Wilkins, and Sister Bolde, to hold a series of meetings with the Shinnecock tribe of Indians, near Southampton, L. I. We arrived about five o'clock in the afternoon, and found the friends waiting for us. Had supper, and then went to the church, where we found a good congregation. I spoke from Psalm 1:3. Excellent attention. Two rose for prayers. A good prayer meeting, the members taking hold and doing their duty.

Next day we visited from house to house, which we continued while the meetings lasted, being every evening till Sunday; then preaching at ten, love feast at two, and preaching at six. The next week preaching afternoon and evening. The Lord was with us, and blessed our labors; and in all the meetings I ever attended I never saw the Spirit of the Lord work more sweetly. There seemed to be such a melting spirit among the people. Truly all that was done there was by the Lord. To him be all the glory. We labored there three weeks, and thirty-one found peace in believing. I shall never forget this visit among this dear people. Some came fourteen and eighteen miles to attend the meetings. It was hard parting with these dear children of God. They have been very kind to us, and our hearts were entwined around them.

They brought us eight miles on our journey, to good ground, where I stopped to fill an appointment at the M. E. church. Fourteen of us Indians came up in the morning with two teams, and we all sat around a big table the white folks had prepared for us, and I felt I was the chief of the tribe that day, and as I looked around the table and saw how their faces shone with the love of Jesus, my heart yearned towards them, and I felt to say, O Jesus, do keep them and us faithful till thy coming.

We went to the church in the evening. It was crowded inside and out. People came twenty miles, I was told, to that meeting. They begged of us to stay longer with them, but I told them my work was among the poor and needy, and I could not stay. And as the parting again drew near, I was sorry I had ever learned the word farewell; but there was some consolation in knowing that very soon we shall meet where parting will be no more.

These people are a whole-souled people. All they have is the Lord's. Every thing is on the altar, and they would give their life to do God's children good. I thought what an example they set for the white man to follow. There is none of that mean, stingy covetousness among them that I find among the white people. They used us well, and paid all expenses going and coming, and sent us home like kings and princes. And I hope when Daniel stands in his lot, that my Master will give me my lot either with or next to the Shinnecock tribe of Indians on the new earth. Then, children, we will finish that experience meeting of the last Sunday when I was with you. Be faithful, dear ones, especially you young converts, and I will see you again when the general roll is called.

How I would like to tell you, readers of the Crisis, many of the interesting things which transpired at this meeting; but this letter is long enough.

On my return home I went to New York, and found the young converts there doing well, rejoicing still in their first love. Bro. Powell is a good nursing father, and is taking good care of the flock. I spoke to them afternoon and evening. Church crowded with white and colored. There is another dear people I expect to meet in the kingdom Praise the Lord. Come, Lord Jesus, come quickly, and gather us all together.

Your sister, waiting for the coming One,
Anna E. Smith.

From Bro. O. D. Woodruff.

Bro. Grant:—Had a good meeting yesterday, and in the evening. The spirit of the Lord was there. Four requested prayers, and many more are under deep conviction. It is the last call of mercy, and the last work before Jesus comes is in the highways and hedges. What we do we must do quickly, and may we obey the Lord in all things. The saints of God are going into the kingdom by virtue of living faith, which each one must possess individually. We cannot live by going into a good meeting, catching a little of the spirit of the meeting, getting blessed, and then wait for another like opportunity. That is trying to live by borrowed faith. This kind will not answer in these times of peril. Startling events are just at hand, and living faith is the qualification necessary to survive Daniel's time of trouble. Lord, give us such a faith as this, and then the just will live by his faith. "Nevertheless, when the Son of man cometh, shall he find faith on the earth?" O. D. Woodruff.

Southington, Ct., March 12th.

From Bro. L. C. McKinstry.

Bro. Grant:—I wish to say to the brethren scattered abroad, with whom I have labored, that the Lord has been blessing me recently as never before. I have spent the past three years in Canada, holding meetings in school-houses and other places, and have enjoyed myself in the work. I had plenty of traveling on foot to do, through long woods, often with either mud or snow in my way, holding protracted meetings, and on Sundays; and then, to keep myself and family alive, going into a shoe shop to work. But I have had three years of profitable experience.

For several years previous to that time, I had been among the Methodists. I had one or two stations under presiding elders, and spent two years at their theological school at Concord, N. H. During this time, I had heard some truth, as to the nature of man in death, the end of the wicked, and was a believer in the coming kingdom, but did not really dare to venture to believe that Jesus was coming very soon.

1st. Because it would interfere with my plans of being a full-fledged conference preacher, with two ordinations, and other matters. The doctrine of life through Christ presented objections to my position of the eternal, conscious existence of all the race, which I could not answer, and yet I adhered to my old faith. But God led me so that I saw the truth, and for the last three years I have been trying to preach the whole of God's simple truth as to the plan of salvation, and the eternal kingdom. The Lord has kept me uneasy when I was not fully in the work, and I have with my wife committed all to him, and we are out here in the name of Jesus praying that, where duty calls, the way may be opened, and every door closed by the Spirit of God and circumstances, where it is not duty to go. Bless the Lord, O my soul. I love to be in Father's hands a real pilgrim, without a home to call my own, although I do find some very pleasant, comfortable ones among my brethren where I go, where I can rest. It is blessed to be with the saints, although,

> "No foot of land do I possess,
> No cottage in this wilderness"

Yes, brethren,

> "I gladly wander to and fro,
> Till I my Canaan gain."

The Lord is coming soon,—sooner than many of us realize, and what we do must be done quickly. I want to be free to go wherever the Lord wills; and I am satisfied with the pilgrimage, and feel like preaching the straight truths of the Bible, and living by them. Jesus is mine,—he is my all. I hang all my hopes on him, and all my plans have reference to his cause. I am in his work, and if there are any places where the brethren and sisters want preaching, if they will drop me a line to the Crisis office, and pray over the matter, I will try to be there if the Lord wills. I have a mother whom I must care for. She is able to get about, but not to do any work, and I want to find a good boarding place for her, and then I shall be free. Pray for me. Your brother in Christ,

L. C. McKinstry.

From Sr. S. D. Ackerman.

Bro. Grant:—I feel an earnest desire to do something to assist in spreading the good news of a soon coming Savior, and rejoice that I have been enabled by self sacrifice to send this small sum May it help to spread the glad tidings and lead sinners to Christ, is my prayer. Jesus has done great things for me, and I long to do something for him. I have long been a member of the M. E. church, but have never (though I once thought I had) been baptized; and I long for the privilege of following my Savior beneath the liquid wave. I feel as if I had no right to ask any of the preaching brethren to come here, as we are the only family that I know of in the place who believe in the soon coming of the Savior, and we could not remunerate them for their labor. But I will say that if any of the brethren should come this way, they will find a welcome pilgrim home with J. B. Ackerman, 1½ miles from Windham Depot, N. H. Your sister, looking for Jesus,

Obituaries.

Rice. At Hillsburgh, N. S., Feb. 18th, 1866, of typhoid fever, settled in chronic complaints, Eld. Israel Rice, aged sixty-four years.

He leaves a wife, eleven children, the Church of the First Born, a large circle of relatives, and the community in general, to mourn their sad loss.

Comfort was tendered to the bereaved family by the word of God and the Holy Spirit, and on the funeral occasion by Eld. Wm. M. Ingham, from 1 Thess. 4: 13–18, which was comfort indeed. We pray the Lord that his works may follow him.

> Oh! we are bereft of a kind father's care,
> The church is bereft of his aid,
> The poor are bereft for no pains did he spare
> That they might be clothed and fed.
> No longer the footsteps of father are heard,
> No longer his accents of praise,
> His pleadings are ceased, and he sleeps in the Lord,
> But soon him the Spirit will raise.
> Ah! thanks to the Lord, death is vanquished and shorn,
> And soon we expect the glad sound,—
> "Come forth" when his grasp from his victim is torn,
> And each loved one comes forth with a bound.

J. C. Rice.

Banks. Died at Hillsburgh, N. S., Nov. 8th, 1865, Sydney, son of Abram and Sarah Banks, aged about two years.

Comfort was tendered to the bereaved by Elder Jno. Moore, from 1 Cor. 15.

> Your little one rests in its lone hillock grave,
> Fond parent, your Lord knows its worth,
> And as he once died those sweet treasures to save,
> Oh, praise him! he'll soon call it forth.

J. C. Rice.

Dailey. Died in Canton, Ct., Feb. 16th, trusting in the Savior he had long loved and waited for, Joseph Dailey, aged eighty-one years.

"And I heard a voice from heaven saying unto me, Write, blessed are the dead which die in the Lord from henceforth; yea, saith the Spirit, that they may rest from their labors; and their works do follow them."

Stone. Died at South Reading, Mass., Feb. 24th, Sr. Martha Stone, aged sixty-two years.

Sister Stone gave her heart to Christ when about sixteen years of age, and subsequently united with the Baptist church. She embraced the doctrine of the near coming of the Lord in 1842, and lived and died a christian. Sermon by the writer, from 1 Thess. 4: 18. Joseph W. White.

Westcott. Died in Iosco, Mich., Feb. 17th, our dear sister, Mary Ann, wife of Stephen Westcott, aged twenty-nine years.

She was formerly connected with our little church at South Butler, and was loved by all. Her attachment to the people of God, and to the truth, were very strong. She died in full hope of eternal life through Christ. May her rest be sweet, and heaven's richest blessings rest upon the mourning ones, to prepare them to meet her in the kingdom. C. B. Turner.

Booker. Died in Richmond, March 5th, 1866, Sr. Hannah Booker, aged sixty-seven years.

This dear sister was sick many years, yet she did not murmur nor complain, but was patient and resigned; and as death drew near she could rejoice and praise the Lord for his abounding love and mercy towards her. Precious in the sight of the Lord is the death of his saints.

H. D. Reed.

☞ Prominent Jews in New York are endeavoring to establish a Theological Seminary. At a recent meeting a society was formed, consisting of eighty members, and officers were elected, besides eight life-members. The Reformed or anti-Talmudic party are engaged in the matter, and it is thought they will succeed.

☞ Church-going statistics prove that in London 101,000, or 11 per cent, of the entire sittings in churches are vacant at every Sunday service, and that 300,000, or 33 per cent., are unoccupied at the most numerously attended services.

Summary of News.

FOREIGN.

Liverpool March 3d, Queenstown 4th.

In the French Corps Legislatif, after a debate regarding the temporal power of the Pope, M. Jules Favre and others having spoken in favor of its separation from the spiritual, the paragraph in the address relative to the Roman question was adopted, 218, to 18.

Dispatches have been received from Paris announcing the death of the King of Siam.

The Paris Patrie says an answer of Maximilian to the mission of M. Saillard is not expected in Paris before the beginning of April.

In the Principalities order and tranquility has not been disturbed since the abdication of Prince Couza. The Turkish government has determined to demand at the Conference of the Great Powers that the inhabitants of the Principalities should select none but a native as their ruler. Turkey has further resolved to station a corps of observation on the Danube and concentrate troops in Bulgaria.

On the 1st of March the Italian army was reduced entirely to a peace footing.

A late Paris letter says the French government has received despatches from America, which has put an end to the Mexican question.

DOMESTIC.

New York, March 13. A special dispatch from Canada says the excitement is unabated. Two thousand militia have been dispatched to various posts on the frontier. The police are examining cars from the United States.

The rumors from New York have excited military activity astonishingly.

A special dispatch from Detroit says everything wears a military aspect. Troops are hurrying to the front. Earthworks are being constructed on the Canada side.

March 14. A special Toronto dispatch says the authorities are said to be in possession of startling intelligence. Thousands of Fenians will cross the border as soon as the weather permits—and be joined by Fenians in Canada. Government detectives are alert on this side of the line and keep the Canadian authorities informed of the movements of the enemy. The panic shows no abatement.

Detroit, March 14. The City Council has accepted an invitation to join a Fenian celebration on St. Patrick's Day. There is an unusual stir among the Detroit Fenians, and mysterious rockets are sent up on the American shore. It is believed that some movement is in progress.

New York, March 14. A special Montreal dispatch says the excitement is still at fever heat. Business is at a stand. There is a run upon the savings banks, and small depositors are converting their balances into gold. The militia are drilled many times a day. All the public buildings are strongly guarded. The banks are restricting their discounts to well approved customers, and refusing to advance on any collateral security.

A special dispatch to the Herald, dated Windsor, C. W., March 14, says the excitement along the frontier is gaining. Canada is very warm for Americans of a suspicious character, who are crossing the borders daily. A thousand volunteers are on the lookout, and more are on the way.

Rochester, N. Y., March 14. There is a report in circulation here that the Fenians have purchased the four large steamers of the American line on Lake Ontario, now lying in the harbor. This is not credited, however, as the steamers are fitting out for the spring trade. It is understood that government officials are keeping an eye upon these boats and affairs in the harbor below the city.

New York, March 16. A special dispatch, dated Guelph, Canada West, to-day, has the following: "The excitement has nearly disappeared in the interior towns, but rages on the frontier in all its force Volunteers are still being organized. Reports are current of arrests in lower Canada for treason. At all points on the frontier there is a skirmish line extending many miles. The organ of the Hibernians speaks of the difficulty of getting volunteers. Some volunteers have been brought up to the mark by the bayonet, and in several cases have been dragged by the heels from under beds. The officers of a regiment at Toronto had themselves to perform duty as sentries, and last week three privates were flogged and sent to prison for expressing Fenian sentiments."

A special Montreal dispatch says there is less excitement, though preparations to resist an attack were actively proceeding. A Cabinet council has been held which was presided over by the Governor General. During its sessions telegrams were received from the Governors of New Brunswick and Nova Scotia. The first announced that a resolution advising confederation had passed the upper House of the Legislature unanimously, and a similar result was expected in the lower House. The other dispatch expressed the belief that the measure was sure of success in Nova Scotia. The powder in private magazines has been ordered to be removed to St Helen's Island, strongly fortified and commanding the city. The citizens are rapidly enrolling themselves. Yesterday 25,000 rifles were sent to Upper Canada.

A Prophecy.—The Pope has lately uttered a prophecy According to his Holiness, the year 1866 is to be full of horrors, the abomination of desolation, and he is to leave Rome in sorrow and despondence. In 1867 the fierce struggle will still go on between the Church and its enemies; but in 1868 the Church will triumph, and Pio Nono will enter Rome in the plenitude of power. After living to see the mighty cause of truth prevail, the Holy Father announces that he will be taken away from sublunary cares to sit by the side of St. Peter There are several young Southerners in Paris en route to join the Papal army. They must be greatly encouraged by this flattering prediction.

ITEMS.

☞ There are 400,000 persons engaged in the manufacture and sale of intoxicating liquors in America. The capital invested in the business is variously estimated at from $500,000,000 to $1000,000,000 In Montreal city, of 100,000 inhabitants, there is a licensed liquor seller for every 300 persons, over fourteen years of age. The number of unlicensed places, which do a profitable business, is estimated by those who ought to know at about one hundred and fifty.

☞ The Western papers are full of accounts of the losses resulting from freshets. Half the bridges on the Kalamazoo, Mich., are down, and great quantities of grain stored in warehouses by the river side have been spoiled by the inflow of water. On the Illinois the injury to dams, piers, bridges, etc., is very serious. Huge masses of ice sweep down the stream, some of them more than thirty feet in altitude.

☞ A Savannah paper is afraid the raising of rice is at an end, and pictures the rice swamps degenerating into unproductive swamps. It says the white man cannot, and the black man will not, cultivate the swamp plantations. It therefore goes for a compulsory cultivation of them.

☞ The Cleaveland Herald reports that on Friday night the earth in the vicinity of East Cleveland, Ohio, cracked open with a loud, dull report, like an earthquake. The fissure was two or three inches wide and extended into the ground several feet. It damaged several houses, and alarmed the people generally.

☞ During the violent hurricane of the 11th, on the French coast, two hundred enormous blocks of stone placed in front of the breakwater at Cherbourg, to protect it from the action of the sea, were lifted by the waves and thrown over the wall into the harbor. Forty cannon planted on the pier were thrown into the sea. Such a storm had never before been experienced in that place.

☞ The Pittsfield Eagle says there is an unusual and increasing religious interest in that town. In the several churches the number of meetings has been increased, and there are a large number of inquirers, with a goodly number of hopeful conversions.

☞ The total population of Boston is 192,324, of which 66,020 is foreign, or about one-third of the whole population. The females exceed the males by more than 14,000. Of the 2,627 colored persons, more than half reside in ward six.

☞ At Vienna, pork has been dropped from the bill of fare at most of the leading hotels, and the pig dealers have telegraphed to their agents in Servia and Hungary not to send any more of the animals. The Jews are in ecstasies, and sausage makers in despair.

☞ A new material for soling shoes has made its appearance. It is a substance of which India rubber is the basis, but it is heavier, and whilst as solid as iron, is flexible and elastic. It is said that one pair of shoes with this article will outwear four pairs soled with the best English leather.

☞ It has been decided that a woman who is regularly ordained and settled as minister in this State can legally unite a couple in marriage.

☞ It is now said that a February without a full moon, though rare, may come more than once in an ordinary lifetime.

☞ There are nine thousand shoemakers in New York city.

☞ As many as ten thousand cattle have been frozen to death in Colorado since winter set in.

CASH RECEIPTS FOR THE CRISIS.

To find how your account stands.

The present No. of the Crisis is 546. The No. which follows your name is the No. to which you have paid.

If the No. paid to, is greater than the present No., the difference shows how many weeks you have paid for in advance. If the No. paid to, is less than the present No., the difference shows for how many weeks you owe. For every week of indebtedness before No. 468, (if any), charge four cents, for every week since No. 468, if less than 26 weeks, five cents, if over 26 weeks, six cents a week (or $3.12 for the year.) From the sum deduct four cents for every dollar, and you have the exact amount due.

MUST WE BE CLEANSED BY FIRE?

Reader, are you free? Are you filled with that "love that casteth out fear," so that you can say, "I fear no evil?" Are you free from envy, and wrath, and hatred? Do you love your neighbor as yourself, and do you always forgive as you wish to be forgiven? These are close questions; but let us one and all give them an honest, candid answer. After we have attended to the questions already proposed, let us go one step farther and ask if we always "eat and drink, and whatsoever we do, do all to the glory of God?"

Bro. Himes paints a sad picture for us to contemplate. In his travels, he finds only one "saint" (by which term, in this connection, we suppose he means "church member") to twenty-five profane and openly wicked persons. Only one in twenty-five even profess religion! But this is not all, and we are sorry to say, this is not the worst of it. Among church-members (excuse me for not saying saints), with all their apparent zeal and piety, most of them drink! And is any thing worse coming? Yes, "many of their ministers indulge this habit!"

Bro. Himes goes on to say that "drinking, chewing, smoking, and snuff-dipping are general." No wonder our dear brother "returns home with a sad heart." Truly the whole creation "groaneth and travaileth in pain." O why are we not free? I know some argue that we cannot be free till death. But we profess to believe that not death, but Jesus, makes us free His blood cleanseth from all sin.

But how is this work done? Have we nothing to do about it? Can we drink, and smoke, and chew, and take snuff, and say we are "clean every whit?" Do not these things "defile a man?" And we may go further and carry this principle into our table habits. Can we eat like gluttons, and ruin our health, and yet be without sin? Can we indulge to excess in nameless vices, and yet profess to be cleansed in that precious blood? Ah! this vile world is soon to be cleansed by fire. O let us strive to be so clean that the LORD will take us to himself, and not leave us to be consumed with the "filthy dreamers, who defile the flesh, and speak evil of dignities."

Sutton, Mass. F. H. CHAMBERLAIN.

Correspondence.

From Bro. J. C. Rice.

BRO GRANT:—It is with a sad heart that I inform you that death has again entered our family circle and riven our hearts by its cruel agency the typhoid fever, and has dragged our loved father (Israel Rice) to the dark tomb, for which we sorrow, but not as those without hope, for we are assured that the same Spirit which raised Christ from the dead dwelt with him; and we feel assured, also, that the same Spirit will quicken him and bring him up in like manner, at the day of general restitution, by which hope we are comforted exceedingly. Who would not want to see death vanquished? Who would not wish to change these scenes of sorrow and separation, disease, trouble and mortality, for those of joy and eternal union, ease, peace, and immortality? Then, I ask in all sincerity and earnestness, who would not want the Life-giver, "the Nobleman," the Captain of our salvation, to return? Can there be any? Who have not suffered from the cruel inroads of that dreaded enemy? Who have not felt the finger of disease upon them? O! who have not suffered from this trying state of insecurity? Then who can feel like blaming those who are poring over the Scriptures of divine truth, in order to glean all the information and comfort possible concerning the ushering in of so glorious, so desirable, yea, so requisite an event? Again I ask, Who? O! why so much antipathy to that crowning event of all blessedness; one that will stamp an eternal end upon sin, and therefore upon its attendant evils, sickness, sorrow, pain and death? O! who cannot long for that event when the eyes of the blind shall be opened, the ears of the deaf unstopped; when the lame man shall leap as an hart, and the tongue of the dumb shall sing; when the ransomed of the Lord shall return and come to Zion with songs and everlasting joy upon their heads, and shall obtain joy and gladness, and sorrow and sighing shall flee away; when there will be nothing to hurt nor destroy in all the holy mountain? Who? Who?

I cannot represent the extent of the loss we sustained when we were called upon to extend the parting hand, and bid adieu to a loved father, both in our family tie of sociality, and in a more general sense; viz, in our church, in the temperance movement, and in general good; neither is it necessary to make mention of the pungency of our sorrow as we beheld death's cruel finger feeling for the heartstrings of one whom we loved so dearly; but it does sometimes require an effort to refrain from writhing under a sense of our loss, though he be taken from the trouble to come; and were it not for the comforts tendered by holy inspiration, we feel that it would be almost impossible to submit to the stroke.

When we meet in our social meetings and conferences, and witness the vacancy as well as miss the encouraging exhortations of one so prominent, and reflect that that voice which has so often been heard there importuning our Father's grace and mercies, stimulating the tried and tempted in the path of holiness, and endeavoring to "give to each a portion of meat in due season," is silent in death, and will never more be heard this side of the day of redemption; a chord is touched which instantly becomes unstrung, and again we importune our Father for sustaining grace, "gird up the loins of our minds" if possible, still more closely, and repeat our resolution to "watch unto prayer" still more carefully, that we may be enabled to strike hands with him and other loved ones on the shore of immortality. Then imagination makes an attempt to scan the appearance of the redeemed. How gloriously high will be the degree of happiness enjoyed by the favored ones of the Lord, if its proportionate effects upon the entire system be in accordance with its thrilling effects upon so small a portion as the heart, in our present state, even allowing that our senses be no more acute and susceptible of glory and pleasure than now. Ah! how blessed, truly; in contemplation of which the great apostle found himself swimming in such a depth of glory and pleasure that, in his apparently failing effort to get language to convey a full idea of his sense of its magnitude (though we would presume that he had command of all that could be obtained in either the Hebrew or Greek vocabulary, having studied under that celebrated [D. D. Gamaliel], he at last has to content himself with terming it, "a far more exceeding and ETERNAL WEIGHT of glory." My soul! O! who would not deny himself of ALL ungodliness and worldly lusts, and live soberly, righteously and godly in this world, during this short life, in order to participate in those glories and pleasures throughout an endless eternity? Think of it, dear brother, dear sister, and dear sinner. O decide in the affirmative, and I will, by God's grace, meet you on the shores of eternal glory. Amen. Your Bro. in the lively hope of speedy redemption, JOS. C. RICE.

From Sr. A. E. Smith.

BRETHREN AND SISTERS:—On the 18th of January, I started in company with Brn. Campbell and Wilkins, and Sister Boide, to hold a series of meetings with the Shinnecock tribe of Indians, near Southampton, L. I. We arrived about five o'clock in the afternoon, and found the friends waiting for us. Had supper, and then went to the church, where we found a good congregation. I spoke from Psalm 1: 5. Excellent attention. Two rose for prayers. A good prayer meeting, the members taking hold and doing their duty.

Next day we visited from house to house, which we continued while the meetings lasted, being every evening till Sunday; then preaching at ten, love feast at two, and preaching at six. The next week preaching afternoon and evening. The Lord was with us, and blessed our labors; and in all the meetings I ever attended I never saw the Spirit of the Lord work more sweetly. There seemed to be such a melting spirit among the people. Truly all that was done there was by the Lord. To him be all the glory. We labored there three weeks, and thirty-one found peace in believing. I shall never forget this visit among this dear people. Some came fourteen and eighteen miles to attend the meetings. It was hard parting with these dear children of God. They have been very kind to us, and our hearts were entwined around them.

They brought us eight miles on our journey, to good ground, where I stopped to fill an appointment at the M. E. church. Fourteen of us Indians came up in the morning with two teams, and we all sat around a big table the white folks had prepared for us, and I felt I was the chief of the tribe that day, and as I looked around the table and saw how their faces shone with the love of Jesus, my heart yearned towards them, and I felt to say, O Jesus, do keep them and us faithful till thy coming.

We went to the church in the evening. It was crowded inside and out. People came twenty miles, I was told, to that meeting. They begged of us to stay longer with them, but I told them my work was among the poor and needy, and I could not stay. And as the parting again drew near, I was sorry I had ever learned the word farewell; but there was some consolation in knowing that very soon we shall meet where parting will be no more.

These people are a whole-souled people All they have is the Lord's. Every thing is on the altar, and they would give their life to do God's children good. I thought what an example they set for the white man to follow There is none of that mean, stingy covetousness among them that I find among the white people. They used us well, and paid all expenses going and coming, and sent us home like kings and princes. And I hope when Daniel stands in his lot, that my Master will give me my lot either with or next to the Shinnecock tribe of Indians on the new earth. Then, children, we will finish that experience meeting of the last Sunday when I was with you. Be faithful, dear ones, especially you young converts, and I will see you again when the general roll is called.

How I would like to tell you, readers of the Crisis, many of the interesting things which transpired at this meeting; but this letter is long enough.

On my return home I went to New York, and found the young converts there doing well, rejoicing still in their first love. Bro. Powell is a good nursing father, and is taking good care of the flock. I spoke to them afternoon and evening. Church crowded with white and colored. There is another dear people I expect to meet in the kingdom Praise the Lord. Come, Lord Jesus, come quickly, and gather us all together.

Your sister, waiting for the coming One,
ANNA E. SMITH.

No. 128 East 27th Street, New York City.

From Bro. O. D. Woodruff.

BRO. GRANT:—Had a good meeting yesterday, and in the evening. The spirit of the Lord was there. Four requested prayers, and many more are under deep conviction. It is the last call of mercy, and the last work before Jesus comes is in the highways and hedges. What we do we must do quickly, and may we obey the Lord in all things. The saints of God are going into the kingdom by virtue of living faith, which each one must possess individually. We cannot live by going into a good meeting, catching a little of the spirit of the meeting, getting blessed, and then wait for another like opportunity. That is trying to live by borrowed faith. This kind will not answer in these times of peril. Startling events are just at hand, and living faith is the qualification necessary to survive Daniel's time of trouble. Lord, give us such a faith as this, and then the just will live by his faith. "Nevertheless, when the Son of man cometh, shall he find faith on the earth?" O. D. WOODRUFF.

Southington, Ct., March 12th.

From Bro. L. C. McKinstry.

BRO. GRANT:—I wish to say to the brethren scattered abroad, with whom I have labored, that the Lord has been blessing me recently as never before. I have spent the past three years in Canada, holding meetings in school-houses and other places, and have enjoyed myself in the work. I had plenty of traveling on foot to do, through long woods, often with either mud or snow in my way, holding protracted meetings, and on Sundays; and then, to keep myself and family alive, going into a shoe shop to work. But I have had three years of profitable experience.

For several years previous to that time, I had been among the Methodists. I had one or two stations under presiding elders, and spent two years at their theological school at Concord, N. H. During this time, I had heard some truth, as to the nature of man in death, the end of the wicked, and was a believer in the coming kingdom, but did not really dare to venture to believe that Jesus was coming very soon.

1st. Because it would interfere with my plans of being a full-fledged conference preacher, with two ordinations, and other matters. The doctrine of life through Christ presented objections to my position of the eternal, conscious existence of all the race, which I could not answer, and yet I adhered to my old faith. But God led me so that I saw the truth, and for the last three years I have been trying to preach the whole of God's simple truth as to the plan of salvation, and the eternal kingdom. The Lord has kept me uneasy when I was not fully in the work, and I have with my wife committed all to him, and we are out here in the name of Jesus praying that, where duty calls, the way may be opened, and every door closed by the Spirit of God and circumstances, where it is not duty to go. Bless the Lord, O my soul. I love to be in Father's hands a real pilgrim, without a home to call my own, although I do find some very pleasant, comfortable ones among my brethren where I go, where I can rest. It is blessed to be with the saints, although,

"No foot of land do I possess,
No cottage in this wilderness."

Yes, brethren,

"I gladly wander to and fro,
Till I my Canaan gain."

The Lord is coming soon,—sooner than many of us realize, and what we do must be done quickly. I want to be free to go wherever the Lord wills; and I am satisfied with the pilgrimage, and feel like preaching the straight truths of the Bible, and living by them. Jesus is mine,—he is my all. I hang all my hopes on him, and all my plans have reference to his cause. I am in his work, and if there are any places where the brethren and sisters want preaching, if they will drop me a line to the Crisis office, and pray over the matter, I will try to be there if the Lord wills. I have a mother whom I must care for. She is able to get about, but not to do any work, and I want to find a good boarding place for her, and then I shall be free. Pray for me. Your brother in Christ,

L. C. MCKINSTRY.

From Sr. S. D. Ackerman.

BRO. GRANT:—I feel an earnest desire to do something to assist in spreading the good news of a soon coming Savior, and rejoice that I have been enabled by self sacrifice to send this small sum. May it help to spread the glad tidings and lead sinners to Christ, is my prayer. Jesus has done great things for me, and I long to do something for him. I have long been a member of the M. E. church, but have never (though I once thought I had) been baptized; and I long for the privilege of following my Savior beneath the liquid wave. I feel as if I had no right to ask any of the preaching brethren to come here, as we are the only family that I know of in the place who believe in the soon coming of the Savior, and we could not remunerate them for their labor. But I will say that if any of the brethren should come this way, they will find a welcome pilgrim home with J. B. Ackerman, 1½ miles from Windham Depot, N. H. Your sister, looking for Jesus,

Obituaries.

RICE. At Hillsburgh, N. S., Feb. 18th, 1866, of typhoid fever, settled in chronic complaints, Eld. Israel Rice, aged sixty-four years.

He leaves a wife, eleven children, the Church of the First Born, a large circle of relatives, and the community in general, to mourn their sad loss.

Comfort was tendered to the bereaved family by the word of God and the Holy Spirit, and on the funeral occasion by Eld. Wm. M. Ingham, from 1 Thess. 4: 13–18, which was comfort indeed. We pray the Lord that his works may follow him.

Oh! we are bereft of a kind father's care,
The church is bereft of his aid,
The poor are bereft for no pains did he spare
That they might be clothed and fed.

No longer the footsteps of father are heard,
No longer his accents of praise;
His pleadings are ceased, and he sleeps in the Lord,
But soon him the Spirit will raise.

Ah! thanks to the Lord, death is vanquished and shorn,
And soon we expect the glad sound,—
"Come forth!" when his grasp from his victim is torn,
And each loved one comes forth with a bound.

J. C. RICE.

BANKS. Died at Hillsburgh, N. S., Nov. 8th, 1865, Sydney, son of Abram and Sarah Banks, aged about two years.

Comfort was tendered to the bereaved by Elder Jno. Moore, from 1 Cor. 15.

Your little one rests in its lone hillock grave,
Fond parent, your Lord knows its worth,
And as he once died those sweet treasures to save,
Oh, praise him! he'll soon call it forth.

J. C. RICE.

DAILEY. Died in Canton, Ct., Feb. 16th, trusting in the Savior he had long loved and waited for, Joseph Dailey, aged eighty-one years.

"And I heard a voice from heaven saying unto me, Write, blessed are the dead which die in the Lord from henceforth; yea, saith the Spirit, that they may rest from their labors; and their works do follow them."

STONE. Died at South Reading, Mass., Feb. 24th, Sr. Martha Stone, aged sixty-two years.

Sister Stone gave her heart to Christ when about sixteen years of age, and subsequently united with the Baptist church. She embraced the doctrine of the near coming of the Lord in 1842, and lived and died a christian. Sermon by the writer, from 1 Thess. 4: 18. JOSEPH W. WHITE.

WESTCOTT. Died in Iosco, Mich., Feb. 17th, our dear sister, Mary Ann, wife of Stephen Westcott, aged twenty-nine years.

She was formerly connected with our little church at South Butler, and was loved by all. Her attachment to the people of God, and to the truth, were very strong. She died in full hope of eternal life through Christ. May her rest be sweet, and heaven's richest blessings rest upon the mourning ones, to prepare them to meet her in the kingdom. C. B. TURNER.

BOOKER. Died in Richmond, March 5th, 1866, Sr. Hannah Booker, aged sixty-seven years.

This dear sister was sick many years, yet she did not murmur nor complain, but was patient and resigned; and as death drew near she could rejoice and praise the Lord for his abounding love and mercy towards her. Precious in the sight of the Lord is the death of his saints.

☞ Prominent Jews in New York are endeavoring to establish a Theological Seminary. At a recent meeting a society was formed, consisting of eighty members, and officers were elected, besides eight life-members. The Reformed or anti-Talmudic party are engaged in the matter, and it is thought they will succeed.

☞ Church-going statistics prove that in London 101,000, or 11 per cent, of the entire sittings in churches are vacant at every Sunday service, and that 300,000, or 33 per cent., are unoccupied at the most numerously attended services.

Summary of News.

FOREIGN.

Liverpool March 3d, Queenstown 4th.

In the French Corps Legislatif, after a debate regarding the temporal power of the Pope, M Jules Favre and others having spoken in favor of its separation from the spiritual, the paragraph in the address relative to the Roman question was adopted, 218, to 18.

Dispatches have been received from Paris announcing the death of the King of Siam.

The Paris Patrie says an answer of Maximilian to the mission of M. Saillard is not expected in Paris before the beginning of April.

In the Principalities order and tranquility has not been disturbed since the abdication of Prince Couza. The Turkish government has determined to demand at the Conference of the Great Powers that the inhabitants of the Principalities should select none but a native as their ruler. Turkey has further resolved to station a corps of observation on the Danube and concentrate troops in Bulgaria.

On the 1st of March the Italian army was reduced entirely to a peace footing.

A late Paris letter says the French government has received despatches from America, which has put an end to the Mexican question.

DOMESTIC.

New York, March 13. A special dispatch from Canada says the excitement is unabated. Two thousand militia have been dispatched to various posts on the frontier. The police are examining cars from the United States.

The rumors from New York have excited military activity astonishingly.

A special dispatch from Detroit says everything wears a military aspect. Troops are hurrying to the front. Earthworks are being constructed on the Canada side.

March 14. A special Toronto dispatch says the authorities are said to be in possession of startling intelligence. Thousands of Fenians will cross the border as soon as the weather permits—and be joined by Fenians in Canada. Government detectives are alert on this side of the line and keep the Canadian authorities informed of the movements of the enemy. The panic shows no abatement.

Detroit, March 14. The City Council has accepted an invitation to join a Fenian celebration on St. Patrick's Day. There is an unusual stir among the Detroit Fenians, and mysterious rockets are sent up on the American shore. It is believed that some movement is in progress.

New York, March 14. A special Montreal dispatch says the excitement is still at fever heat. Business is at a stand. There is a run upon the savings banks, and small depositors are converting their balances into gold. The militia are drilled many times a day. All the public buildings are strongly guarded. The banks are restricting their discounts to well approved customers, and refusing to advance on any collateral security.

A special dispatch to the Herald, dated Windsor, C. W., March 14, says the excitement along the frontier is gaining. Canada is very warm for Americans of a suspicious character, who are crossing the borders daily. A thousand volunteers are on the lookout, and more are on the way.

Rochester, N. Y., March 14. There is a report in circulation here that the Fenians have purchased the four large steamers of the American line on Lake Ontario, now lying in the harbor. This is not credited, however, as the steamers are fitting out for the spring trade. It is understood that government officials are keeping an eye upon these boats and affairs in the harbor below the city.

New York, March 16. A special dispatch, dated Guelph, Canada West, to-day, has the following: "The excitement has nearly disappeared in the interior towns, but rages on the frontier in all its force Volunteers are still being organized. Reports are current of arrests in lower Canada for treason. At all points on the frontier there is a skirmish line extending many miles. The organ of the Hibernians speaks of the difficulty of getting volunteers. Some volunteers have been brought up to the mark by the bayonet, and in several cases have been dragged by the heels from under beds. The officers of a regiment at Toronto had themselves to perform duty as sentries, and last week three privates were flogged and sent to prison for expressing Fenian sentiments."

A special Montreal dispatch says there is less excitement, though preparations to resist an attack were actively proceeding. A Cabinet council has been held which was presided over by the Governor General. During its sessions telegrams were received from the Governors of New Brunswick and Nova Scotia. The first announced that a resolution advising confederation had passed the upper House of the Legislature unanimously, and a similar result was expected in the lower House. The other dispatch expressed the belief that the measure was sure of success in Nova Scotia. The powder in private magazines has been ordered to be removed to St Helen's Island, strongly fortified and commanding the city. The citizens are rapidly enrolling themselves. Yesterday 25,000 rifles were sent to Upper Canada.

A PROPHECY.—The Pope has lately uttered a prophecy According to his Holiness, the year 1866 is to be full of horrors, the abomination of desolation, and he is to leave Rome in sorrow and despondence. In 1867 the fierce struggle will still go on between the Church and its enemies; but in 1868 the Church will triumph, and Pio Nono will enter Rome in the plenitude of power. After living to see the mighty cause of truth prevail, the Holy Father announces that he will be taken away from sublunary cares to sit by the side of St. Peter There are several young Southerners in Paris en route to join the Papal army. They must be greatly encouraged by this flattering prediction.

ITEMS.

☞ There are 400,000 persons engaged in the manufacture and sale of intoxicating liquors in America. The capital invested in the business is variously estimated at from $300,000,000 to $1000,000,000 In Montreal city, of 100,000 inhabitants, there is a licensed liquor seller for every 300 persons, over fourteen years of age. The number of unlicensed places, which do a profitable business, is estimated by those who ought to know at about one hundred and fifty.

☞ The Western papers are full of accounts of the losses resulting from freshets. Half the bridges on the Kalamazoo, Mich., are down, and great quantities of grain stored in warehouses by the river side have been spoiled by the inflow of water. On the Illinois the injury to dams, piers, bridges, etc., is very serious. Huge masses of ice sweep down the stream, some of them more than thirty feet in altitude.

☞ A Savannah paper is afraid the raising of rice is at an end, and pictures the rice swamps degenerating into unproductive swamps. It says the white man cannot, and the black man will not, cultivate the swamp plantations. It therefore goes for a compulsory cultivation of them.

☞ The Cleveland Herald reports that on Friday night the earth in the vicinity of East Cleveland, Ohio, cracked open with a loud, dull report, like an earthquake. The fissure was two or three inches wide and extended into the ground several feet. It damaged several houses, and alarmed the people generally.

☞ During the violent hurricane of the 11th, on the French coast, two hundred enormous blocks of stone placed in front of the breakwater at Cherbourg, to protect it from the action of the sea, were lifted by the waves and thrown over the wall into the harbor. Forty cannon planted on the pier were thrown into the sea. Such a storm had never before been experienced in that place.

☞ The Pittsfield Eagle says there is an unusual and increasing religious interest in that town. In the several churches the number of meetings has been increased, and there are a large number of inquirers, with a goodly number of hopeful conversions.

☞ The total population of Boston is 192,324, of which 66,020 is foreign, or about one-third of the whole population. The females exceed the males by more than 14,000. Of the 2,627 colored persons, more than half reside in ward six.

☞ At Vienna, pork has been dropped from the bill of fare at most of the leading hotels, and the pig dealers have telegraphed to their agents in Servia and Hungary not to send any more of the animals. The Jews are in ecstasies, and sausage makers in despair.

☞ A new material for soling shoes has made its appearance. It is a substance of which India rubber is the basis, but it is heavier, and whilst as solid as iron, is flexible and elastic. It is said that one pair of shoes with this article will outwear four pairs soled with the best English leather.

☞ It has been decided that a woman who is regularly ordained and settled as minister in this State can legally unite a couple in marriage.

☞ It is now said that a February without a full moon, though rare, may come more than once in an ordinary lifetime.

☞ There are nine thousand shoemakers in New York city.

☞ As many as ten thousand cattle have been frozen to death in Colorado since winter set in.

CASH RECEIPTS FOR THE CRISIS.

To find how your account stands.

The present No. of the Crisis is 546. The No. which follows your name is the No. to which you have paid.

If the No. paid to, is greater than the present No., the difference shows how many weeks you have paid for in advance. If the No. paid to, is less than the present No., the difference shows for how many weeks you owe.

For every week of indebtedness before No. 468, (if any), charge four cents, for every week since No. 468, if less than 26 weeks, five cents, if over 26 weeks, six cents a week (or $3.12 for the year.) From the sum deduct four cents for every dollar, and you have the exact amount due.

THE EXISTENCE OF HOLY ANGELS; their Origin, Nature, Rank and Titles, their Ministry and Various Offices in the work of Human Redemption, and in the Administration of the Government of G. d. By Wm Shepherd. 20c.

For the World's Crisis.

I SHALL WAKEN.

I shall waken in the morning,
When the night of death is gone,—
When the angel's trump of warning
Cites the world before the throne.

In the fairy days of Childhood,
Wandering by the flower-edged stream,
Or in the solemn shady wildwood,
Mused I Youth's delusive dream.

The path I tread will lead to Eden;
Somewhere sure that garden blooms;
In some lovely land 'tis hidden—
Sure the world is not all tombs.

True, the showers of grief descended
From the clouds of morning years:
But a bow of promise bended
O'er those transient mists of tears.

Long the pathway grew and dreary;
Frightful deserts round me spread;
In search of Eden, worn and weary,
I reached the dwellings of the dead.

Dark the heavens are brooding o'er me,
Across their blackness bends no bow;
And the iron gate before me
Opens to the grave below;

But a voice from heaven calls me—
"Pilgrim, walk the dreadful way;
The horrid darkness that appals thee,
Curtains an eternal day."

"Death shall not of hope bereave thee,
Thou shalt find an Eden home;
The heavenly word shall not deceive thee,
That garden's in the world to come."

I shall waken in the morning,
When the night of death is past;
When the angel's trump of warning
Calls to Paradise at last.

SPEAKING IN MEETING.

AN EXCITING NARRATIVE AND TRUE.

I spoke in meeting once—and, as I was afterwards assured, to a very good purpose. It chanced on this wise. I sat among the children, happily telling them stories—we were alone in the house. A knock at the door preluded the entrance of a gentleman who had come to invite me to attend a lecture by a Jesuit priest, at the Catholic church, saying that the lecture was to Protestants, and the lecturer a very eloquent and interesting speaker. So urgent and pleasant was the gentleman, whose wife had sent half a mile in the cold to get me, that I did not feel willing to refuse to go. Reluctantly I started. It was already late when we reached the church, and we were not able to find seats together. The subject was the Host, and before the lecture began there was a great burning of incense, and a great singing of praise to the Virgin. Seven times to her and once to the Son was the censer swung, and the song of praise offered. This was repeated till it became tiresome. The large church was crowded, galleries and all, with people, many of them Protestants. Officers from Fort Leavenworth (this was in Leavenworth City) were there, and other Union soldiers.

The orator of the evening began—shade of Cicero! did any educated man think that Jesuit an eloquent speaker? It was never my unhappy fate to listen to a more absolutely disgusting harangue. The man lacked not in garrulity; he could flourish, and twaddle, and bluster fast enough, and because he was thus airing his astonishing powers in a bad cause, men ran to hear him, and sat silent, if not content, to listen to his vicious and false spouting. Nobody would have endured him had he been a Protestant minister. He had not spoken three minutes ere I became indignant that my escort should have brought me to waste an evening listening to such a ranter. Then I thought—no matter what; it is safe to leave this to be imagined—of the judgment of any one who could endure him; but soon all other thoughts became absorbed in astonished indignation, that Protestant gentlemen of education and intelligence should sit listening to such disgraceful lies as the priest was uttering. One falsehood after another fell roundly from his impure lips, until he said, pointing to the Host, "Martin Luther, having had an argument with the devil and been beaten, yielded the worship of the Host, and taught this fatal omission to the Protestants. This is the reason why this day you are without a sacrifice. This Luther himself owns. You will find his confession in the book of Martin Luther, vol. —, page —.

"Who is your author?" I was impelled to ask, but was unheard.

"Yes," cried the Jesuit, boldly, "you have no sacrifice for sin—you are the only people under heaven of whom this can be said. Why, the Jews had a sacrifice, even the heathen had a sacrifice. We have this—you Protestants have no sacrifice. What sacrifice have you, Protestant?"

O how my ears and my heart longed to hear at least one noble voice cry out in acknowledgement of the real sacrifice; but all was silence. I looked about, up to the galleries, wondered how they could keep silence—how they dared to. To me it seemed as though the earth must presently open and swallow us all up together—blasphemer, and we who consented to his crime. Would no one confess Him now, when his name was impiously and impudently blasphemed? Yes, He should not be utterly put to shame and denied, let the consequences be what they might.

"What sacrifice have you, Protestants?" was again triumphantly asked, when a voice that astonished nobody so completely as it did its owner, cried out with strength and clearness such that it was heard in every part of the church, and caused great commotion,—

"Jesus Christ, crucified once for all! "The priest attempted to proceed. "Once for all!" repeated the voice with resolute and solemn emphasis. At this the priest swayed backwards, as if one had struck him, and cried out angrily,—

"Put her out! Put her out!"

She fully expected to be "put out." She almost expected to be torn to pieces. She did not fear at all, that hour, what man might do unto her. She will always know how the martyrs felt. Why, it never hurt them to kill them. They were raised above the reach of pain. I shall waste no more pity on the christian martyrs—they were conquering heroes all, to be envied, never pitied. Could one but walk through life, passing among its woes as that woman sat among the swaying mass that hissed, and groaned, and glared around her, one might truly say, "the world is under my feet."

But she was not destitute of friends and protectors even there. There was a great stir and many exclamations in the church, but for reasons unknown to me then, no one attempted to obey the Jesuit. He watched the proceedings narrowly, but did not think it best to repeat his order. Was it because he saw, forcing their way over pews and through people, into the pew behind her who had broken his discourse, armed men, determined to shoot down the first one who dared to lay hand upon her? I was told that Colonel Jennison, with a revolver in each hand, came close beside the offender, and that others, well known in Kansas as men not to be trifled with, were ready at a word. Very little did I then suspect it; but the first movement to put that woman out would have been the signal for the shedding of blood, of terrible confusion, and of conflagration. It is well for the Jesuit that he did not insist on being obeyed. He now attempted to go on, but the first words he said were, "Yes, crucified once for all;" he seemed then so much confused and worried that he scarce knew what to say. His lecture that evening was not, it is safe to say, even in his own estimation, a success.

The next noon, at dinner, my friend was very merry over the commotion which my "flooring" the priest had caused in the city. He was quite delighted at the turn affairs were taking.

The clergy took it up. I understood that one old minister made quite an eloquent discourse upon the subject of "That one lone voice crying out against the Mystery of Iniquity," which he declared was more powerful, through righteousness, than the whole Romish church, or something to that effect, and another blessed me publicly and with unction and energy, laying his "right hand of fellowship" (though he was a Baptist) warmly upon my shoulder, and saying, "God bless you, sister. You have spoken in meeting once to good purpose, if you keep silent all the rest of your life."

Lectures were at once commenced. The papers, too, came out against Samarius, and he soon departed. Leavenworth is strongly Catholic, the city officers, and officers of the fort are, I was told, all of that belief. But it was an officer belonging to Fort Leavenworth who said he was never was so much pleased in his life, "as when a woman from the midst of the congregation, by one clear, true sentence, stopped and ruined the whole discourse of Samarius."

I have only to say to that officer, "Why could not you have said those true words?" And yet all finally agreed that 'twas better as it was. Had a man made that interruption there would most certainly have been a dreadful row and bloodshed. The resistless impulse and the smiting voice were given as God saw good. He does choose the "weak things of the world to confound the mighty. —N. Y. Evangelist.

THE DARK DAY.

Hon. Wheeler Martin has favored us with the following recollections of the dark day in 1780:—

The day was on the 19th of May, 1780. Where I resided at the time, the darkness at eleven o'clock was so great that a candle was lighted and placed upon the table; the fowls went to roost; the sheep all huddled around in a circle, with their heads inward. The grass, to look at it through the window, seemed of a yellow green, the same as to look through smoked glass upon green grass.

I well remember that the gentleman of the house read the following scripture to his numerous family: "The sun shall be turned to darkness, and the moon into blood, before that great and terrible day of the Lord come.'

The darkness was so great in the night time that it was said by one Dr. Blackington, who resided near the northeast part of Rehoboth, who had occasion to be out among sick patients that night, that he could not see his white pocket-handkerchief placed before his eyes. The darkness was so thick that it could be felt.

The year 1780 was celebrated for its many northern lights; they covered the whole horizon over; they would flash like lightning, and fill the air with sulphur. The lights were "so red that the flashes would bring warmth against the face.

The great snow fall was in December, 1779, or January, 1780. It snowed seven days; the snow was estimated to be four feet on a level, and the drifts from eight to ten feet high. The snow came moist and coarse, and it was so cold that it congealed very hard. The banks were so high that the sheep were buried up in them, and there remained for forty days, until they were found by their air holes and then dug out alive.

This year the whole of the Narragansett Bay was frozen over so thick and hard that the late Hon. John Brown passed from Providence, on the river of ice, to Newport and back, and I believe some went on skating parties the whole range. Gen. William Valentine sleighed wood from Fall River to Newport on the ice, through Bristol Ferry.

The people of Newport burnt their furniture to keep from freezing. The British army had left the island of Rhode Island in November, 1779, and stripped the people of their valuables. In a manner, the years of 1779 and 1780 were the hardest known for a century last past.

The weather was so severe in the winter of 1780, that many people were frozen to death. A man went from Attleboro, Mass., with a load of hoops, to Boston, and was caught in a great storm, and returning home was frozen to death, coming off Boston Neck. His oxen were frozen to death, and were found standing on their feet, as the snow was deep enough to support them.—American Baptist.

1866

The historic eye of four thousand years looks down upon this point, the year 1866, and sees the issue fairly made up—is man capable of self-government. During that long, tedious march man has demonstrated a thousand times, and upon as many battle-fields, his capabilities to fight, has shown beyond question his physical prowess. And the last great showing on that issue was the grandest of them all, the crushing of the rebellion. The question for 1866 is to see if the broken fragments of war, a disorganized nation, can be harmoniously combined, "the many in one," by the diplomacy of peace, so that virtue and intelligence shall enable the people to make love of country its bulwark, and not its army and navy. For

"A union of hearts, a union of hands,
A union of lakes, and a union of lands,"

must be the bonds of a Republic, or it ceases to be a Republic. Well, the result sought is the most important man ever attempted to accomplish.

But 1866 is a year of note to the world. As an epoch it stands at the head of consummating grand events. The four quarters of the globe, at the dawn of this year, stand in strange and significant juxtapositions, as to coming troubles. A net-work of surroundings, not the devisings of human ingenuity, mysteriously enthralls the nations. All Europe watches Turkey. That appears to be the key of the arch of government of that continent. The Suez canal during this year will make "Palestine the highway of nations," and knock the last prop from beneath the rotten bottom of the worm-eaten Ottoman Empire. In 1866 the Emperor of the French will control the "short line route" to the East. On the first of May he is to withdraw his troops from Rome and leave the Pope to take care of himself. And already that venerable successor of the "rock-bottom" Galilean fisherman is looking out for a home, and the "Empire of Malta," the "kingdom of the sea," is talked of.

There is not a nation on earth that is at rest. The great cry is, "More rights to the people." The British empire is troubled. Fenians and pauperism are causing the corruptions of that government to quake. But why numerate the trials of the nations and the people. They are without end.—Warren Republican.

THE PRESENT STATE OF AFFAIRS.

Under the above heading an interesting article appears in an English monthly, from which we extract the following:—ED.

The present state of affairs is no easy subject to deal with amidst so many conflicting rumors, and in such a labyrinth of political embarassments. Yet one thing, and one alone, is clear—that no nation within the limits of the prophetic earth is, at this moment, perfectly settled, much less perfectly secure—or, rather there is no nation which is not in such a position that it might not at a day's notice be involved in war or revolution. The only settled thing is the universal dissettlement of nations; the only thing sure is that no nation can be sure of one day's peace. Like the forerunners of a tropical hurricane we see the little clouds flitting here and there "with the rapidity of birds"—while the air below and around us is as calm as death—the storm is high above our heads—when will it rush down?

If we move from north to south we find Russia at war in Central Asia, advancing to India as surely as the night is stealing on the day. Italy all but bankrupt, yet compelled to maintain her army at its utmost strength—and to prepare for an attack, sooner or later, on Venetia. Bankruptcy, if the army should be kept up much longer—tumult or revolution, inevitable, if the army shall be disbanded, or Venetia left permanently under Austria. We need not speak now of Rome or of the Pope, for that subject is before the minds of all the world, and, besides, the time has not come for seeing it in all its outlines and dimensions. Look next to the east and west, and you will find ubiquitous Russia in Central Asia, and at the centre of Asiatic centres, Samarcand. India always ready for revolt, America full of confusion, and preparing for war. China in the furthest east, in a state of permanent rebellion—the remotest western nations of America always in a state of feud. As for Europe itself—every nation and country, except Holland and Portugal, is more or less embroiled either at home, or with its neighbors. Germany is seething like a cauldron; and Spain is always in confusion—as well it may, being the masterpiece of Palmerstonian statesmanship. What real good could come from such a source? In short "the whole earth sitteth still and is at rest," and yet all is undermined by subterranean fires—and the subterranean smoke issues out through many a yawning chasm. Christendom has grown hard and dry—christianity, in man's vile hands, and under his very feet, has been moulded into idolatry, or trampled into dust! And the weary earth opens her mouth to swallow up the imposter and the imposture. Man is the impostor and man's christianity is the imposture, and both shall be swallowed up together. The thick smoke issuing through a thousand chasms, gives warning of the earthquake. . . .

Russia struggling on the brink of ruin, with internal difficulties, yet contriving to conquer Central Asia and to advance to India, at the same time. Italy growing in power and prosperity, yet on the verge of bankruptcy. America longing to fold her arms in peace, yet preparing for war. The Fenians put down under ineffable scorn, yet stronger than ever, and preparing for an outbreak in some unknown direction. An ambitious emperor renouncing all schemes of conquest, and converted in a moment into a kind of President of the Peace Society. Giving up Belgium, giving up the Rhine, reducing his army, reducing even his favorite naval establishments, yet keeping both army and navy just as efficient as before! What an odd combination of apparent tranquility, and real, deep, unfathomable agitation. A calm on the surface, an earthquake shaking the bottom of the deep—a calm on the level of the horizon, a tempest in the heights of the atmosphere. .

It is well known that the Emperor Napoleon promised to the Jews, three years ago, that he would restore them to their native land in due time, requiring only that the choice of the fittest time should be left to his own decision. It is also confidently asserted that a numerous meeting was held in Paris last summer, on the subject of the restoration of Israel, and that the meeting was presided over by the Emperor's cousin, Prince Napoleon. This would lead the most incredulous to suspect that the restoration of the Jews may very soon become a real fact, and that the Emperor who restores them will become their champion and their patron. . . .

Confining ourselves at present to the passing moment, we may perceive some strange things lying at our feet. We cannot advance a step further without taking them up to look at them, as a philosopher in his daily walks takes up the shells and pebbles which happen to lie on the pathway. An American envoy has arrived in Paris on a mission so secret that no one can make it out, and the longer he remains the stranger the mystery becomes. Now there is always a French minister at Washington, and an American minister at Paris, and therefore no additional envoy was in the least required, unless in this one case—namely: if any negotiations were being carried on between France and America so delicate that they could not be entrusted to paper. In that case a special envoy would be absolutely necessary, in order to communicate with the French government by word of mouth. It is therefore very much to be suspected that some secret negotiation is now being carried on between America and France—something relative to England, Canada, and the Fenians. At the same time the two principal Fenians, the two heads of the entire conspiracy, are both of them in Paris, in the neighborhood of the Tuileries and the Foreign Office. Can all this be accidental? Is our best ally likely to encourage the near approach of our bitterest enemies? Are secret messages sent from Washington to Paris on Mexican business which has been for years before the world? Certainly not. There is something more in this than accident or Mexico.

Another suspicious feature in the present state of affairs is this: The French journals have spoken loudly and boldly of the Mexican difficulty, and even said that Gen. Schofield has been sent to Paris with something like a threatening message from the American government. Now it is well known that the French government will not allow any journal whatsoever to circulate reports that are either alarming or derogatory. This is the general rule, yet in the present case it has been departed from. The journals have been permitted to say what they will concerning Mexico. This is unaccountable except upon one supposition. Suppose a secret transaction between France and the United States—suppose it to refer to England, Canada, and the Fenians. In such a case anything would be permitted that would divert our attention from the secret negotiations, and give us a false idea of what is being carried on by the two governments. Mexico serves as a screen to conceal Canada and the Fenians, and therefore the French journals have been permitted to speak with so little reserve about General Schofield and Mexican affairs. We throw out this suggestion; time will soon lift up the veil.

A third remarkable feature is this. The French government has just given notice of its intention to rescind the treaty of extradition within six months. And not only this, but the reasons publicly assigned are, neither more nor less than a direct public charge of dishonesty and falsehood brought against this whole nation! France in an official manifesto, sets forth the honesty and loyalty of her own government; and then proceeds to contrast with this the duplicity, almost the perfidy of England in the fulfillment of her stipulations. It is asserted that for twenty-two years we have in every case evaded our engagements. This is a serious charge—a national insult! But what is the motive? Why this sudden and abrupt attack just at this moment; when not a hint was given in the case of the Orsini conspirators, or in the recent case of Mazzini not two years ago? Why so silent then, when there was so much reason for complaint; and why so decisive now, when there is no trace of any additional provocation? Is it not because the time has come? Suppose we should be at war with America, France wishes to remain neutral, or perhaps the Emperor means to turn directly against us. Again—Suppose the Fenians defeated and obliged to fly to save their heads. Or rather, suppose the Fenians to wish, beforehand, to provide a place of shelter in case of an emergency. In each and in all of these cases the abandonment of the extradition treaty is a manifest advantage. It provides in France a place of shelter for the Fenians in an emergency, and at the same time our frequent violations of the treaty afford the Emperor a just excuse for remaining neutral, or for doing worse. The encouragement which this new measure will give to Fenianism, is evident at first sight. The two leading men are in Paris at present, perhaps in constant communication with the government; and the whole Fenian body is encouraged and invigorated by the knowledge that happen what may, they shall always be safe when once they have reached the French territory, not only in Europe but in the French West Indies! This will greatly increase their audacity and confidence, and strengthen their hands for mischief. For let it be remembered that Fenianism is not simply a political crime, in which case it could not have been affected by the treaty; but it is also most likely to end in those civil offences which are comprehended in the treaty—murder, pillage, and incendiarism. The abandonment of the treaty of extradition is, therefore, a most singular and suspicious measure, and may be pronounced to be the most singular, perhaps the most important, measure of the day.

TWELVE QUESTIONS FOR A WET SUNDAY.

1. If it were any other day would I be kept at home by the weather?
2. Did I ever stay away from my business, from a party, from an amusement, for such a rain or snow as this?
3. If it were a public meeting for some other purpose than divine worship, would I think it too bad a day to go out?
4. Would I go to church if I could make or save a dollar by it, or gain a customer?
5. If my own church be distant, is there none that is near where I may be sure of finding a vacant seat?
6. If I am afraid of spoiling my best clothes, had I not better go in my common dress, than lose the benefit of the meeting, and neglect my duty?
7. Have I not overcoat, overshoes, and umbrella, that will keep me from taking cold, and preserve my Sunday dress from injury?
8. Am I not nearer to the church than many who are never kept away by bad weather?
9. If every one should find an excuse for absence as easily as I do, what would be the appearance of our churches on the Lord's day?
10. Is it not a dishonor to my maker, if for reasons that would not influence me in worldly matters, I keep from the stated worship of the sanctuary?
11. Is not a wet Sunday at home a more dreary day than one that is diversified by going out to church?
12. Am I willing that my children should learn by my example that they may go to school, to market, to store, to shows, in all weather—but not to church?—Presbyterian.

For the World's Crisis.

WE ARE PASSING AWAY.

Having been favored with the privilege of visiting the old homestead for a few weeks past, as I cast my eye over the hills and through the vales, where once my childish feet were wont to roam, and there beheld the sad changes which a few brief years had made, these words, "we are passing away," seemed to vibrate heavily upon my ears.

As I view the same rippling waves of the Coaticooke, that glideth by as in former years, it gently murmurs, "we are passing away." I pass on half a mile or more, and inquire for the old familiar school-house; but the answer comes, "It is not here." The blight of years has taken it from our view, and another is erected on the opposite side of the river.

Turning away with a heavy heart, I pass on in quest of some of the old neighbors A few rods walk brings me to the house of one highly esteemed. I tap gently at the door But ah! new occupants are there. I inquire for the grandma, to whom I had so often carried flowers in my youthful days, and as often ran to meet when I had seen her tottering limbs bearing her over the meadow;—but the response comes, "She is not here." She lies quietly sleeping in yonder graveyard, as it were, pensively whispering, "we are passing away." Thus I pass on, and on, hoping to find the loved spot where I may shake the friendly hand of some schoolmate. But oh! strangers answer one lies here, another there, and a third has removed to a far distant country. I can tread no farther until I sit down and give vent to my feelings in a flood of tears, crying, "'Come, Lord Jesus, and come quickly!' bring back our loved ones from the tomb, and wipe the falling tears from off our faces."

Now we view the changing seasons of the year. It is cheering in spring to hear the birds warble forth their soft melody as they flit from branch to branch. Earth, relieved of her icy chains, brings forth the green herb, causing all nature to rejoice. And the buds burst out, thus telling us the leaves will soon appear. So passes a few days; when another season rolls around, and summer has come, bringing with her blooming flowers, and robing the earth in richest verdure; awakening all the finer sensibilities of the human heart, and pointing us to a land where sweeter flowers will bloom, and soft and balmy breezes will forever float over those delightsome plains. Thus, as we pause and look around, and behold every thing so beautiful, we picture to our imagination that we have arrived at our destined heaven. But ah! how soon are we undeceived. Those unwelcome words come, "We are passing away." The flowers fall off; the leaves, but a few days since of the brightest green, have begun to fade, and soon the forest is stripped of her foliage; and autumn, with her bleak winds and gloomy aspect, comes. Nor does change stop here: she strikes a last, fatal blow; earth falls beneath her power, and hills and valleys clad in snow and ice show that her victory is won.

With such a mirror before our eyes, how viridly is portrayed the four different stages of human life,—childhood, youth, middle age, and old age, each with their startling evidences of our mortality. Oh, may we be humble, and seek for that happy Eden home where the inhabitants will no more be heard to say, "We are passing away."

ENOCH AND ELIJAH.

A Question.—"If, as Jesus declares, in John 3: 13, 'No man hath ascended up to heaven, but he that came down from heaven, even the Son of man which is in heaven,'—where are Enoch and Elijah? for we read that they 'went up into heaven.'" (2 Kings 2: 11; Heb. 11: 5). R. L. C.
Clear Lake, Iowa.

The declaration of Christ that no man hath ascended to heaven, and the statements of other scripture that two men have ascended, are to be harmonized on the same principle as that by which we harmonize a general rule with its exceptions. There is no general rule without exceptions. Hence, in the Bible, as in other books, all general statements are to be qualified by such exceptions and limitations as the nature of the subject or the teachings of other scripture demand.

For example: Paul says, in one place (Rom. 5: 12), "DEATH hath passed upon ALL men;" this, without qualification, is equivalent to saying, "all men must die." Yet, to this general rule, other passages give the following exceptions,—Enoch, Elijah, and the last-day saints. "Enoch was translated, that he should not see death." (Heb. 11: 5); "Elijah went up into heaven" without dying." (2 Kings 2: 11); and the saints who "are alive and remain unto the coming of the Lord," shall "not all sleep · but shall all be changed in a moment, in the twinkling of an eye, at the last trump," and, like Enoch and Elijah, caught up, together with the resurrected saints, to meet the Lord in the air, and so be forever with the Lord. (1 Cor. 15: 51; 1 Thess. 4: 17)

Here, qualifying the general statement by its evident exceptions, no real inconsistency is discovered between them, and all apparent contradiction disappears.

Just so with regard to the seemingly conflicting statements about going to heaven. "No man hath ascended to heaven," is plainly the general rule; the translation of Enoch and Elijah are no less plainly exceptions. Up to the time when the words were uttered, so far as the evidence of scripture goes to show, they were the only exceptions. Besides the Son of man, they are doubtless the only exceptions still. As, therefore, they "went up into heaven" "without seeing death," they must have gone there alive, and as we have no evidence to show that they have since died, or departed to some other place, we conclude that they are living in heaven now,—waiting for that long-expected day, prophesied of by the one and foreshadowed on the Mount of Transfiguration to the other, when the Lord shall come, with ten thousand of his saints, to execute judgment upon all, and establish on the earth that kingdom whose majesty and glory shall be resplendent and eternal.—Young Pilgrim.

THE LAST TIMES.

Remarks of the Bishop of Oxford at a late Missionary Meeting in England.

I have no doubt myself that the last attempt upon the truth of Christ will come in, not with any open denial of its verity, but with a courteous admission of its truth. At the same time there will be a sapping of its distinctive features. I think that the aspect of men's minds at the present time shows us that this will be the form of danger, universal toleration, toleration not only among christian sects, one towards another, but a deep respect for religiousness everywhere, always providing that it is not that troublesome thing which, by being believed, affects men's conduct, is any limitation upon their thoughts, or even troubles what is called the course of society. That they will all agree together to put out. I have no doubt myself that unbelief contains within itself the seed of the most intensely hating persecution the world has ever yet seen. Instead of being tolerant, I believe it is the very perfection of intolerance. I believe that the very moment it has achieved its own victory, toleration will be the thing above all others it will hate with an intensity short only of the hatred the evil spirit himself has for the simple faith of the gospel of the Lord Jesus Christ. It must be so, I think, because unbelief, in whatever form it comes, is the exaltation of the human intellect and the human will, over the voice of revelation and revealed knowledge. It is thwarted to the utmost the very moment that it is met and confronted by the mighty rock of revealed truth. The stream flows on with the most delicious smoothness when there is nothing to thwart it. "Let us all love one another. Let us be tolerant of each other's views. If you choose to worship the devil, worship him, if you only do it quietly. If you choose to worship an anti-devil, do so, if you do so quietly. Let us go on altogether in our worldly ways and worldly thoughts, holding nothing that may be troublesome or disagreeable. Any thing disagreeable in religion is such a shocking thing."

Well, then comes the most disagreeable thing possible, the revelation of an absolute truth, which says, "We will have nothing to do with this fellowship of evil. You are leading men into absolute destruction; you are promising them liberty and making them slaves; you are handing them over to the devil under the pretence of liberty and emancipation from their shackles," and forthwith these men turn upon this stern declaration of the eternal verity of God with all the hatred of the human heart which the great rebel himself can stir up within it. Believing, then, as I do, that there may be heard upon the winds these footfalls of the coming of the great Antichrist; that this which we hear whispered thus, and see spreading, we know not how, through the air, is just the precursing atmosphere which comes before his advent, I say it is the time, if ever the time was, for those who fear and love the Lord to rouse themselves up and to be working mightily that they may establish indeed the hiding-places of his face throughout the earth. Yes, the very desires of spiritual men point to the same thing. I suppose one of the greatest desires with those who are in earnest in religion, and which is altogether new to the present times is the longing for greater unity in Christendom.—"The Guardian," Aug. 23d, 1865.

SHREWD RETORT.

A preacher of the gospel, on being introduced to a skeptic, with the explanation that the man was a skeptic, in the midst of an extended circle of friends, said to him, "I suppose, then, you do not believe anything." "O yes," replied the skeptic, "I do believe many things." "Will you then," said the preacher, "be so good as to tell us what you believe?" The skeptic replied, "I do not believe that old story of the Bible about Cain obtaining a wife in the land of Nod, where there was no body living." "Never mind what you don't believe," said the preacher, "no doubt there is much of that; but tell us what you do believe." The skeptic rallied and said, "Well, I will tell you; I don't believe the account given by Moses, that God commanded the Midianites to be destroyed." "I am not inquiring for what you don't believe, but what you do believe. Tell us what you do believe." Recovering himself a little, and clearing up his voice, he made a desperate effort, saying, "I don't believe that old fable of the Bible, that God commanded the Canaanites to be destroyed." His belief was all disbelief. It commences all the time with "I don't believe."

A Romanist once said to a christian, "You Protestants could not prove your Bible, if it were not for the Holy Catholic Church, and her great men." "True," said the christian, "for the Bible predicted that there would be just such an apostate church and priesthood, and here you are, just as the Bible said."

After hearing a discourse, in which much was said by the preacher about God, a skeptic said to him, "What is this God about whom you have been saying so much?" The preacher replied, "God is a spirit." The skeptic fiercely followed up, "What is a spirit?" The preacher quickly turned on him, and inquired, "What is a cornstalk?" "Why—why—why, it is a cornstalk." "Yes, sir," replied the preacher, "a spirit is a spirit, and if you cannot tell what a cornstalk is, which you have seen thousands of times, and know has an existence, why do you ask me to tell you what the Infinite Spirit is, or doubt his existence?'

A skeptic once said to a preacher, "If the human body, after death, decomposes and returns to its original elements, how is it raised from the dead and identified?" The preacher replied, "And if the child seven years old has not one particle of the matter in it that was in it when it was born, and if there is not one particle of the matter in it when it is fourteen years old that was in it when it was seven, and if all the old matter has been superseded by new ones every seven years till the person is seventy years old, or if all the old matter has been superseded by new matter ten times, as scientific men maintain, and the identity is not lost; why may not the person do through one more change, in death and the resurrection, and not lose his identity? and why may not this last change take place, as it will require no more power or wisdom to accomplish it, than any of the former changes?"—Ex.

DO NOT SWEAR!—Profane swearing is very justly regarded by all true gentlemen as a most debasing practice. The utterance of an oath quickly sinks a man in the estimation of all who entertain proper notions of true manhood. We have noticed that the habit is quite too common among our mechanics, and we would urge upon them to quit it. If a man happens to pound his finger with a hammer, the injury and pain are made none the less severe by swearing about it. The tongue is an unruly member and needs constant watching lest it become fouled with immoral sediment.

BE POLITE.

It is said that George McDuffie, of South Carolina, was very polite even when a little boy One evening he was holding a little calf by the ears while his mother milked the cow; and a gentleman passing by said, "Good evening, my little son."

George returned, "Good evening, sir," with such a polite bow, that the gentleman noticed him and said, "Why didn't you pull off your hat, my little man?"

George answered, "If you will get down and hold my calf for me, I will pull off my hat to you."

George's politeness and shrewd remark were the making of him. That gentleman said to his mother, "Your son is a smart boy, and if properly trained, will make a great man some day. If you will permit me, I will give George a good education, and give him a start in the world."

The mother thanked the gentlemen for his kindness, and let him take charge of her son. George rose from taking care of a calf to be a clever and successful lawyer, afterwards he became a member of Congress, and then was made Governor of South Carolina.

I wish all my little nephews and cousins to be polite. A polite bow and a "Good evening, sir," costs nothing, but are sometimes worth a good deal. One courteous bow was worth a fortune to little George McDuffie. Everybody likes polite children.

When I used to go to school my teachers made it a rule that every boy should make a bow and every girl a curtsey, as we entered the door every morning, and do the same as we left at evening. And our instructor would invariably notice us with a polite bow, unless he happened not to see us. I like every rule that helps to refine our manners and improve our hearts.

My little readers—scholars—salute your teacher every morning with a graceful bow, and a "Good morning, Mr. ——," and at evening, if convenient, part with him in the same way; and be polite to everybody, especially to old persons.

HOW THE STREET-SWEEPER BECAME A MINISTER.

"A penny, ma'am?" said a pale-faced, blue-eyed, thinly-clad little boy to a lady, as she was crossing one of the streets down town, some years ago. Taking out her purse, she gave the little street-sweeper a half dime, and passed on. In her haste she dropped her purse, which the little boy picked up, and was in the act of following the lady to return it, when he was surrounded by several others, who, like himself, were engaged in sweeping the crossings.

"How much is in it?" "What will you do with it?" were some of the questions put to him.

"I am going to give it to the lady," was his noble answer.

"What a fool!" shouted the others. "Catch us so green as that!" "No, no, come!" says the biggest of them; "we will have a good time."

"No, I won't; and breaking from them, the little fellow started off in the direction the lady had gone.

After running several blocks, and making some mistakes, he found the lady, and taking off his torn cap, he handed her the purse. Surprised, not till then discovering her loss, she asked him where he got it. The little boy told his story. The lady, interested in him, asked his name. "Robert M——." And where he lived?"

"I live nowhere?"

"Why, have you no father, no mother?"

"No, ma'am; my father died when I was a child, and my mother was buried some months ago;" and passing his coat sleeve across his eyes, he wiped away the tears that were beginning to flow.

"And what do you do for a living?"

"I sweep the crossings, and do what little I can to buy bread; then at night I sleep in some wagon, or on some step.

"Are you not afraid, little boy?"

"Sometimes; but mother told me before she died that if I would pray every day to God, and read this book"—taking a well-worn Testament from the breast of his jacket—"that God would send some one to care for me."

This was enough for the kind-hearted woman. She had lost a boy—her only boy—some short time ago, just about the age of the little street-sweeper. So, following him off into one of the back streets, where the boy said his mother had lived, she had his statement confirmed; and taking the little fellow to her own beautiful home, she cared for him as if he were her own child. He was sent to school, and finding his desire was to be a preacher, he was sent to college, and last spring he became a minister, and is now preaching the gospel.

Little children, do you think Robert ever regretted his returning the purse, or his daily prayer to God and reading the Bible?—Youth's Temperance Banner.

A WORD TO BOYS.

A writer in an educational journal, the title of which we have unfortunately lost, has the following pertinent and truthful remarks

"Boys, listen! The first thing you want to learn, to develop what force there is in you, is self-reliance; that is, as regards your relations to man. If I were going to give a formula for developing the most forcible set of men, I should say: Turn them upon their own resources, with their minds well stored with moral and religious truth when they are boys, and teach them to depend on self, and not on father. If a boy is thrown upon his own resources at fifteen, with the world all before him where to choose, and he fights the battle of life single-handed up to manhood, and don't develop more than an average share of executive ability, then there is no stuff in him worth talking about. He may learn to plough, and sow, and reap, and mow, but this can all be done with machines and horses, and man wants to be something better than either of these. Wipe out of your vocabulary every such word as fail, give up wishing for improbable results, put your hand to the plough, or whatever tool you take to, and then drive on and never look back. Don't even sight your person to see if it is straight; don't be consistent, but be simply true.' If you go out 'to see a reed shaken by the wind,' it is pretty likely you will never see anything of more consequence —Phrenological Journal.

MAKING OTHERS HAPPY.

A mother who was in the habit of asking her children, before they retired for the night, what they had done that day to make others happy, found her twin daughters silent. The question was repeated

"I can remember nothing good all this day, dear mother, only that one of my schoolmates was happy, because she had gained the head of the class, and I smiled on her and ran to kiss her; so she said I was good. That is all, dear mother."

The other spoke still more timidly. "A little girl who sat with me on the bench at school has lost a little brother. I saw that, while she studied her lesson, she hid her face in her book and wept. I felt sorry, and laid my face on the same book and wept with her. She then looked up and was comforted, and put her arms around my neck; but I do not know why she said I had done her good.'

"Come to my arms, my darlings!" said the mother; "to rejoice with those that rejoice, and weep with those that weep," is to obey our blessed Redeemer.

A WORD TO LITTLE GIRLS.

Who is lovely? It is the little girl who drops sweet words, kind remarks, and pleasant smiles as she passes along; who has a kind word of sympathy for every girl or boy she meets in trouble, and a kind hand to help her companions out of difficulty; who never scolds, never contends, never teases her mother, nor seeks in any way to diminish, but always to increase her happiness. Would it not please you to pick up a string of pearls, drops of gold, diamonds, or precious stones, as you pass along the street? But these are the precious stones which can never be lost. Take the hand of the friendless. Smile on the sad and dejected. Sympathize with those in trouble. Strive everywhere to diffuse around you sunshine and joy. If you do this, you will be sure to be beloved.

DO GOOD DEEDS.—One pound of gold may be drawn into a wire that would extend round the globe. So one good deed may be felt through all time, and cast its influence into eternity. Though done in the first flush of youth, it may gild the last hours of a long life, and form the brightest spot in it.

I SHALL WAKEN.

I shall waken in the morning,
When the night of death is gone,—
When the angel's trump of warning
Cites the world before the throne.

In the fairy days of Childhood,
Wandering by the flower-edged stream,
Or in the solemn shady wildwood,
Mused I Youth's delusive dream.

The path I tread will lead to Eden;
Somewhere sure that garden blooms;
In some lovely land 'tis hidden—
Sure the world is not all tombs.

True, the showers of grief descended
From the clouds of morning years:
But a bow of promise bended
O'er those transient mists of tears.

Long the pathway grew and dreary;
Frightful deserts round me spread;
In search of Eden, worn and weary,
I reached the dwellings of the dead.

Dark the heavens are brooding o'er me,
Across their blackness bends no bow;
And the iron gate before me
Opens to the grave below;

But a voice from heaven calls me—
"Pilgrim, walk the dreadful way;
The horrid darkness that appals thee,
Curtains an eternal day."

"Death shall not of hope bereave thee,
Thou shalt find an Eden home;
The heavenly word shall not deceive thee,
That garden's in the world to come."

I shall waken in the morning,
When the night of death is past;
When the angel's trump of warning
Calls to Paradise at last.

SPEAKING IN MEETING.

AN EXCITING NARRATIVE AND TRUE.

I spoke in meeting once—and, as I was afterwards assured, to a very good purpose. It chanced on this wise. I sat among the children, happily telling them stories—we were alone in the house. A knock at the door preluded the entrance of a gentleman who had come to invite me to attend a lecture by a Jesuit priest, at the Catholic church, saying that the lecture was to Protestants, and the lecturer a very eloquent and interesting speaker. So urgent and pleasant was the gentleman, whose wife had sent half a mile in the cold to get me, that I did not feel willing to refuse to go. Reluctantly I started. It was already late when we reached the church, and we were not able to find seats together. The subject was the Host, and before the lecture began there was a great burning of incense, and a great singing of praise to the Virgin. Seven times to her and once to the Son was the censer swung, and the song of praise offered. This was repeated till it became tiresome. The large church was crowded, galleries and all, with people, many of them Protestants. Officers from Fort Leavenworth (this was in Leavenworth City) were there, and other Union soldiers.

The orator of the evening began—shade of Cicero! did any educated man think that Jesuit an eloquent speaker? It was never my unhappy fate to listen to a more absolutely disgusting harangue. The man lacked not in garrulity; he could flourish, and twaddle, and bluster fast enough, and because he was thus airing his astonishing powers in a bad cause, men ran to hear him, and sat silent, if not content, to listen to his vicious and false spouting. Nobody would have endured him had he been a Protestant minister. He had not spoken three minutes ere I became indignant that my escort should have brought me to waste an evening listening to such a ranter. Then I thought—no matter what; it is safe to leave this to be imagined—of the judgment of any one who could endure him; but soon all other thoughts became absorbed in astonished indignation, that Protestant gentlemen of education and intelligence should sit listening to such disgraceful lies as the priest was uttering. One falsehood after another fell roundly from his impure lips, until he said, pointing to the Host, "Martin Luther, having had an argument with the devil and been beaten, yielded the worship of the Host, and taught this fatal omission to the Protestants. This is the reason why this day you are without a sacrifice. This Luther himself owns. You will find his confession in the book of Martin Luther, vol. —, page —.

"Who is your author?" I was impelled to ask, but was unheard.

"Yes," cried the Jesuit, boldly, "you have no sacrifice for sin—you are the only people under heaven of whom this can be said. Why, the Jews had a sacrifice, even the heathen had a sacrifice. We have this—you Protestants have no sacrifice. What sacrifice have you, Protestant?"

O how my ears and my heart longed to hear at least one noble voice cry out in acknowledgement of the real sacrifice; but all was silence. I looked about, up to the galleries, wondered how they could keep silence—how they dared to. To me it seemed as though the earth must presently open and swallow us all up together—blasphemer, and we who consented to his crime. Would no one confess Him now, when his name was impiously and impudently blasphemed? Yes, He should not be utterly put to shame and denied, let the consequences be what they might.

"What sacrifice have you, Protestants?" was again triumphantly asked, when a voice that astonished nobody so completely as it did its owner, cried out with strength and clearness such that it was heard in every part of the church, and caused great commotion,—

"Jesus Christ, crucified once for all! "The priest attempted to proceed. "Once for all!" repeated the voice with resolute and solemn emphasis. At this the priest swayed backwards, as if one had struck him, and cried out angrily,—

"Put her out! Put her out!"

She fully expected to be "put out." She almost expected to be torn to pieces. She did not fear at all, that hour, what man might do unto her. She will always know how the martyrs felt. Why, it never hurt them to kill them. They were raised above the reach of pain. I shall waste no more pity on the christian martyrs—they were conquering heroes all, to be envied, never pitied. Could one but walk through life, passing among its woes as that woman sat among the swaying mass that hissed, and groaned, and glared around her, one might truly say, "the world is under my feet."

But she was not destitute of friends and protectors even there. There was a great stir and many exclamations in the church, but for reasons unknown to me then, no one attempted to obey the Jesuit. He watched the proceedings narrowly, but did not think it best to repeat his order. Was it because he saw, forcing their way over pews and through people, into the pew behind her who had broken his discourse, armed men, determined to shoot down the first one who dared to lay hand upon her? I was told that Colonel Jennison, with a revolver in each hand, came close beside the offender, and that others, well known in Kansas as men not to be trifled with, were ready at a word. Very little did I then suspect it; but the first movement to put that woman out would have been the signal for the shedding of blood, of terrible confusion, and of conflagration. It is well for the Jesuit that he did not insist on being obeyed. He now attempted to go on, but the first words he said were, "Yes, crucified once for all;" he seemed then so much confused and worried that he scarce knew what to say. His lecture that evening was not, it is safe to say, even in his own estimation, a success.

The next noon, at dinner, my friend was very merry over the commotion which my "flooring" the priest had caused in the city. He was quite delighted at the turn affairs were taking.

The clergy took it up. I understood that one old minister made quite an eloquent discourse upon the subject of "That one lone voice crying out against the Mystery of Iniquity," which he declared was more powerful, through righteousness, than the whole Romish church, or something to that effect, and another blessed me publicly and with unction and energy, laying his "right hand of fellowship" (though he was a Baptist) warmly upon my shoulder, and saying, "God bless you, sister. You have spoken in meeting once to good purpose, if you keep silent all the rest of your life."

Lectures were at once commenced. The papers, too, came out against Samarius, and he soon departed. Leavenworth is strongly Catholic, the city officers, and officers of the fort are, I was told, all of that belief. But it was an officer belonging to Fort Leavenworth who said he was never was so much pleased in his life, "as when a woman from the midst of the congregation, by one clear, true sentence, stopped and ruined the whole discourse of Samarius."

I have only to say to that officer, "Why could not you have said those true words?" And yet all finally agreed that 'twas better as it was. Had a man made that interruption there would most certainly have been a dreadful row and bloodshed. The resistless impulse and the smiting voice were given as God saw good. He does choose the "weak things of the world to confound the mighty. —N. Y. Evangelist.

THE DARK DAY.

Hon. Wheeler Martin has favored us with the following recollections of the dark day in 1780:—

The day was on the 19th of May, 1780. Where I resided at the time, the darkness at eleven o'clock was so great that a candle was lighted and placed upon the table, the fowls went to roost; the sheep all huddled around in a circle, with their heads inward. The grass, to look at it through the window, seemed of a yellow green, the same as to look through smoked glass upon green grass.

I well remember that the gentleman of the house read the following scripture to his numerous family: "The sun shall be turned to darkness, and the moon into blood, before that great and terrible day of the Lord come."

The darkness was so great in the night time that it was said by one Dr. Blackington, who resided near the northeast part of Rehoboth, who had occasion to be out among sick patients that night, that he could not see his white pocket-handkerchief placed before his eyes. The darkness was so thick that it could be felt.

The year 1780 was celebrated for its many northern lights; they covered the whole horizon over; they would flash like lightning, and fill the air with sulphur. The lights were so red that the flashes would bring warmth against the face.

The great snow fall was in December, 1779, or January, 1780. It snowed seven days; the snow was estimated to be four feet on a level, and the drifts from eight to ten feet high. The snow came moist and coarse, and it was so cold that it congealed very hard. The banks were so high that the sheep were buried up in them, and there remained for forty days, until they were found by their air holes and then dug out alive.

This year the whole of the Narragansett Bay was frozen over so thick and hard that the late Hon. John Brown passed from Providence, on the river of ice, to Newport and back, and I believe some went on skating parties the whole range. Gen. William Valentine sleighed wood from Fall River to Newport on the ice, through Bristol Ferry.

The people of Newport burnt their furniture to keep from freezing. The British army had left the island of Rhode Island in November, 1779, and stripped the people of their valuables. In a manner, the years of 1779 and 1780 were the hardest known for a century last past.

The weather was so severe in the winter of 1780, that many people were frozen to death. A man went from Attleboro, Mass., with a load of hoops, to Boston, and was caught in a great storm, and returning home was frozen to death, coming off Boston Neck. His oxen were frozen to death, and were found standing on their feet, as the snow was deep enough to support them.—American Baptist.

1866

The historic eye of four thousand years looks down upon this point, the year 1866, and sees the issue fairly made up—is man capable of self-government. During that long, tedious march man has demonstrated a thousand times, and upon as many battle-fields, his capabilities to fight, has shown beyond question his physical prowess. And the last great showing on that issue was the grandest of them all, the crushing of the rebellion. The question for 1866 is to see if the broken fragments of war, a disorganized nation, can be harmoniously combined, "the many in one," by the diplomacy of peace, so that virtue and intelligence shall enable the people to make love of country its bulwark, and not its army and navy. For

"A union of hearts, a union of hands,
A union of lakes, and a union of lands,"

must be the bonds of a Republic, or it ceases to be a Republic. Well, the result sought is the most important man ever attempted to accomplish.

But 1866 is a year of note to the world. As an epoch it stands at the head of consummating grand events. The four quarters of the globe, at the dawn of this year, stand in strange and significant juxtapositions, as to coming troubles. A net-work of surroundings, not the devisings of human ingenuity, mysteriously enthralls the nations. All Europe watches Turkey. That appears to be the key of the arch of government of that continent. The Suez canal during this year will make "Palestine the highway of nations," and knock the last prop from beneath the rotten bottom of the worm-eaten Ottoman Empire. In 1866 the Emperor of the French will control the "short line route" to the East. On the first of May he is to withdraw his troops from Rome and leave the Pope to take care of himself. And already that venerable successor of the "rock-bottom" Galilean fisherman is looking out for a home, and the "Empire of Malta," the "kingdom of the sea," is talked of.

There is not a nation on earth that is at rest. The great cry is, "More rights to the people." The British empire is troubled. Fenians and pauperism are causing the corruptions of that government to quake. But why numerate the trials of the nations and the people. They are without end.—Warren Republican.

THE PRESENT STATE OF AFFAIRS.

Under the above heading an interesting article appears in an English monthly, from which we extract the following:—ED.

The present state of affairs is no easy subject to deal with amidst so many conflicting rumors, and in such a labyrinth of political embarassments. Yet one thing, and one alone, is clear—that no nation within the limits of the prophetic earth is, at this moment, perfectly settled, much less perfectly secure—or, rather there is no nation which is not in such a position that it might not at a day's notice be involved in war or revolution. The only settled thing is the universal disettlement of nations; the only thing sure is that no nation can be sure of one day's peace. Like the forerunners of a tropical hurricane we see the little clouds flitting here and there "with the rapidity of birds"—while the air below and around us is as calm as death—the storm is high above our heads—when will it rush down?

If we move from north to south we find Russia at war in Central Asia, advancing to India as surely as the night is stealing on the day. Italy all but bankrupt, yet compelled to maintain her army at its utmost strength—and to prepare for an attack, sooner or later, on Venetia. Bankruptcy, if the army should be kept up much longer—tumult or revolution, inevitable, if the army shall be disbanded, or Venetia left permanently under Austria. We need not speak now of Rome or of the Pope, for that subject is before the minds of all the world, and, besides, the time has not come for seeing it in all its outlines and dimensions. Look next to the east and west, and you will find ubiquitous Russia in Central Asia, and at the centre of Asiatic centres, Samarcand. India always ready for revolt, America full of confusion, and preparing for war. China in the furthest east, in a state of permanent rebellion—the remotest western nations of America always in a state of feud. As for Europe itself—every nation and country, except Holland and Portugal, is more or less embroiled either at home, or with its neighbors. Germany is seething like a cauldron; and Spain is always in confusion—as well it may, being the masterpiece of Palmerstonian statesmanship. What real good could come from such a source? In short "the whole earth sitteth still and is at rest," and yet all is undermined by subterranean fires—and the subterranean smoke issues out through many a yawning chasm. Christendom has grown hard and dry—christianity, in man's vile hands, and under his very feet, has been moulded into idolatry, or trampled into dust! And the weary earth opens her mouth to swallow up the imposter and the imposture. Man is the impostor and man's christianity is the imposture, and both shall be swallowed up together. The thick smoke issuing through a thousand chasms, gives warning of the earthquake. . . .

Russia struggling on the brink of ruin, with internal difficulties, yet contriving to conquer Central Asia and to advance to India, at the same time. Italy growing in power and prosperity, yet on the verge of bankruptcy. America longing to fold her arms in peace, yet preparing for war. The Fenians put down under ineffable scorn, yet stronger than ever, and preparing for an outbreak in some unknown direction. An ambitious emperor renouncing all schemes of conquest, and converted in a moment into a kind of President of the Peace Society. Giving up Belgium, giving up the Rhine, reducing his army, reducing even his favorite naval establishments, yet keeping both army and navy just as efficient as before! What an odd combination of apparent tranquility, and real, deep, unfathomable agitation. A calm on the surface, an earthquake shaking the bottom of the deep—a calm on the level of the horizon, a tempest in the heights of the atmosphere. . .

It is well known that the Emperor Napoleon promised to the Jews, three years ago, that he would restore them to their native land in due time, requiring only that the choice of the fittest time should be left to his own decision. It is also confidently asserted that a numerous meeting was held in Paris last summer, on the subject of the restoration of Israel, and that the meeting was presided over by the Emperor's cousin, Prince Napoleon. This would lead the most incredulous to suspect that the restoration of the Jews may very soon become a real fact, and that the Emperor who restores them will become their champion and their patron. . . .

Confining ourselves at present to the passing moment, we may perceive some strange things lying at our feet. We cannot advance a step further without taking them up to look at them, as a philosopher in his daily walks takes up the shells and pebbles which happen to lie on the pathway. An American envoy has arrived in Paris on a mission so secret that no one can make it out, and the longer he remains the stranger the mystery becomes. Now there is always a French minister at Washington, and an American minister at Paris, and therefore no additional envoy was in the least required, unless in this one case—namely: if any negotiations were being carried on between France and America so delicate that they could not be entrusted to paper. In that case a special envoy would be absolutely necessary, in order to communicate with the French government by word of mouth. It is therefore very much to be suspected that some secret negotiation is now being carried on between America and France—something relative to England, Canada, and the Fenians. At the same time the two principal Fenians, the two heads of the entire conspiracy, are both of them in Paris, in the neighborhood of the Tuileries and the Foreign Office. Can all this be accidental? Is our best ally likely to encourage the near approach of our bitterest enemies? Are secret messages sent from Washington to Paris on Mexican business which has been for years before the world? Certainly not. There is something more in this than accident or Mexico.

Another suspicious feature in the present state of affairs is this: The French journals have spoken loudly and boldly of the Mexican difficulty, and even said that Gen. Schofield has been sent to Paris with something like a threatening message from the American government. Now it is well known that the French government will not allow any journal whatsoever to circulate reports that are either alarming or derogatory. This is the general rule, yet in the present case it has been departed from. The journals have been permitted to say what they will concerning Mexico. This is unaccountable except upon one supposition. Suppose a secret transaction between France and the United States—suppose it to refer to England, Canada, and the Fenians. In such a case anything would be permitted that would divert our attention from the secret negotiations, and give us a false idea of what is being carried on by the two governments. Mexico serves as a screen to conceal Canada and the Fenians, and therefore the French journals have been permitted to speak with so little reserve about General Schofield and Mexican affairs. We throw out this suggestion; time will soon lift up the veil.

A third remarkable feature is this. The French government has just given notice of its intention to rescind the treaty of extradition within six months. And not only this, but the reasons publicly assigned are, neither more nor less than a direct public charge of dishonesty and falsehood brought against this whole nation! France in an official manifesto, sets forth the honesty and loyalty of her own government; and then proceeds to contrast with this the duplicity, almost the perfidy of England in the fulfillment of her stipulations. It is asserted that for twenty-two years we have in every case evaded our engagements. This is a serious charge—a national insult! But what is the motive? Why this sudden and abrupt attack just at this moment; when not a hint was given in the case of the Orsini conspirators, or in the recent case of Mazzini not two years ago? Why so silent then, when there was so much reason for complaint; and why so decisive now, when there is no trace of any additional provocation? Is it not because the time has come? Suppose we should be at war with America, France wishes to remain neutral, or perhaps the Emperor means to turn directly against us. Again—Suppose the Fenians defeated and obliged to fly to save their heads. Or rather, suppose the Fenians to wish, beforehand, to provide a place of shelter in case of an emergency. In each and in all of these cases the abandonment of the extradition treaty is a manifest advantage. It provides in France a place of shelter for the Fenians in an emergency, and at the same time our frequent violations of the treaty afford the Emperor a just excuse for remaining neutral, or for doing worse. The encouragement which this new measure will give to Fenianism, is evident at first sight. The two leading men are in Paris at present, perhaps in constant communication with the government; and the whole Fenian body is encouraged and invigorated by the knowledge that happen what may, they shall always be safe when once they have reached the French territory, not only in Europe but in the French West Indies! This will greatly increase their audacity and confidence, and strengthen their hands for mischief. For let it be remembered that Fenianism is not simply a political crime, in which case it could not have been affected by the treaty; but it is also most likely to end in those civil offences which are comprehended in the treaty—murder, pillage, and incendiarism. The abandonment of the treaty of extradition is, therefore, a most singular and suspicious measure, and may be pronounced to be the most singular, perhaps the most important, measure of the day.

TWELVE QUESTIONS FOR A WET SUNDAY.

1. If it were any other day would I be kept at home by the weather?
2. Did I ever stay away from my business, from a party, from an amusement, for such a rain or snow as this?
3. If it were a public meeting for some other purpose than divine worship, would I think it too bad a day to go out?
4. Would I go to church if I could make or save a dollar by it, or gain a customer?
5. If my own church be distant, is there none that is near where I may be sure of finding a vacant seat?
6. If I am afraid of spoiling my best clothes, had I not better go in my common dress, than lose the benefit of the meeting, and neglect my duty?
7 Have I not overcoat, overshoes, and umbrella, that will keep me from taking cold, and preserve my Sunday dress from injury?
8 Am I not nearer to the church than many who are never kept away by bad weather?
9 If every one should find an excuse for absence as easily as I do, what would be the appearance of our churches on the Lord's day?
10. Is it not a dishonor to my maker, if for reasons that would not influence me in worldly matters, I keep from the stated worship of the sanctuary?
11. Is not a wet Sunday at home a more dreary day than one that is diversified by going out to church?
12. Am I willing that my children should learn by my example that they may go to school, to market, to store, to shows, in all weather—but not to church?—Presbyterian.

For the World's Crisis.

WE ARE PASSING AWAY.

Having been favored with the privilege of visiting the old homestead for a few weeks past, as I cast my eye over the hills and through the vales, where once my childish feet were wont to roam, and there beheld the sad changes which a few brief years had made, these words, "we are passing away," seemed to vibrate heavily upon my ears.

As I view the same rippling waves of the Coaticooke, that glideth by as in former years, it gently murmurs, "we are passing away." I pass on half a mile or more, and inquire for the old familiar school-house; but the answer comes, "It is not here." The blight of years has taken it from our view, and another is erected on the opposite side of the river.

Turning away with a heavy heart, I pass on in quest of some of the old neighbors. A few rods walk brings me to the house of one highly esteemed. I tap gently at the door. But ah! new occupants are there. I inquire for the grandma, to whom I had so often carried flowers in my youthful days, and as often ran to meet when I had seen her tottering limbs bearing her over the meadow;—but the response comes, "She is not here." She lies quietly sleeping in yonder graveyard, as it were, pensively whispering, "we are passing away." Thus I pass on, and on, hoping to find the loved spot where I may shake the friendly hand of some schoolmate. But oh! strangers answer one lies here, another there, and a third has removed to a far distant country. I can tread no farther until I sit down and give vent to my feelings in a flood of tears, crying, "'Come, Lord Jesus, and come quickly!' bring back our loved ones from the tomb, and wipe the falling tears from off our faces."

Now we view the changing seasons of the year. It is cheering in spring to hear the birds warble forth their soft melody as they flit from branch to branch. Earth, relieved of her icy chains, brings forth the green herb, causing all nature to rejoice. And the buds burst out, thus telling us the leaves will soon appear. So passes a few days; when another season rolls around, and summer has come, bringing with her blooming flowers, and robing the earth in richest verdure; awakening all the finer sensibilities of the human heart, and pointing us to a land where sweeter flowers will bloom, and soft and balmy breezes will forever float over those delightsome plains.

Thus, as we pause and look around, and behold every thing so beautiful, we picture to our imagination that we have arrived at our destined heaven. But ah! how soon are we undeceived. Those unwelcome words come, "We are passing away." The flowers fall off; the leaves, but a few days since of the brightest green, have begun to fade, and soon the forest is stripped of her foliage; and autumn, with her bleak winds and gloomy aspect, comes. Nor does change stop here: she strikes a last, fatal blow; earth falls beneath her power, and hills and valleys clad in snow and ice show that her victory is won.

With such a mirror before our eyes, how vividly is portrayed the four different stages of human life,—childhood, youth, middle age, and old age, each with their startling evidences of our mortality. Oh, may we be humble, and seek for that happy Eden home where the inhabitants will no more be heard to say, "We are passing away."

ENOCH AND ELIJAH.

A Question.—"If, as Jesus declares, in John 3: 13, 'No man hath ascended up to heaven, but he that came down from heaven, even the Son of man which is in heaven,'—where are E[illegible] and Elijah? for we read that they 'went up into heaven.'" (2 Kings 2: 11; Heb. 11: 5). S. L. C.

Clear Lake, Iowa.

The declaration of Christ that no man hath ascended to heaven, and the statements of other scripture that two men have ascended, are to be harmonized on the same principle as that by which we harmonize a general rule with its exceptions. There is no general rule without exceptions. Hence, in the Bible, as in other books, all general statements are to be qualified by such exceptions and limitations as the nature of the subject or the teachings of other scripture demand.

For example: Paul says, in one place (Rom 5: 12), "DEATH hath passed upon ALL men;" this, without qualification, is equivalent to saying, "all men must die." Yet, to this general rule, other passages give the following exceptions,—Enoch, Elijah, and the last-day saints. "Enoch was translated, that he should not see death." (Heb. 11: 5); "Elijah went up into heaven" without dying." (2 Kings 2: 11); and the saints who "are alive and remain unto the coming of the Lord," shall "not all sleep. but shall all be changed in a moment, in the twinkling of an eye, at the last trump," and, like Enoch and Elijah, caught up, together with the resurrected saints, to meet the Lord in the air, and so be forever with the Lord. (1 Cor. 15: 51; 1 Thess. 4: 17.)

Here, qualifying the general statement by its evident exceptions, no real inconsistency is discovered between them, and all apparent contradiction disappears.

Just so with regard to the seemingly conflicting statements about going to heaven. "No man hath ascended to heaven," is plainly the general rule; the translation of Enoch and Elijah are no less plainly exceptions. Up to the time when the words were uttered, so far as the evidence of scripture goes to show, they were the only exceptions. Besides the Son of man, they are doubtless the only exceptions still. As, therefore, they "went up into heaven" "without seeing death," they must have gone there alive; and as we have no evidence to show that they have since died, or departed to some other place, we conclude that they are living in heaven now,—waiting for that long-expected day, prophesied of by the one and foreshadowed on the Mount of Transfiguration to the other, when the Lord shall come, with ten thousand of his saints, to execute judgment upon all, and establish on the earth that kingdom whose majesty and glory shall be resplendent and eternal.—Young Pilgrim.

THE LAST TIMES.

Remarks of the Bishop of Oxford at a late Missionary Meeting in England.

I have no doubt myself that the last attempt upon the truth of Christ will come in, not with any open denial of its verity, but with a courteous admission of its truth. At the same time there will be a sapping of its distinctive features. I think that the aspect of men's minds at the present time shows us that this will be the form of danger, universal toleration, toleration not only among christian sects, one towards another, but a deep respect for religiousness everywhere, always providing that it is not that troublesome thing which, by being believed, affects men's conduct, is any limitation upon their thoughts, or even troubles what is called the course of society. That they will all agree together to put out. I have no doubt myself that unbelief contains within itself the seed of the most intensely hating persecution the world has ever yet seen. Instead of being tolerant, I believe it is the very perfection of intolerance. I believe that the very moment it has achieved its own victory, toleration will be the thing above all others it will hate with an intensity short only of the hatred the evil spirit himself has for the simple faith of the gospel of the Lord Jesus Christ. It must be so, I think, because unbelief, in whatever form it comes, is the exaltation of the human intellect and the human will, over the voice of revelation and revealed knowledge. It is thwarted to the utmost the very moment that it is met and confronted by the mighty rock of revealed truth. The stream flows on with the most delicious smoothness when there is nothing to thwart it. "Let us all love one another. Let us be tolerant of each other's views. If you choose to worship the devil, worship him, if you only do it quietly. If you choose to worship an anti-devil, do so, if you do so quietly. Let us go on altogether in our worldly ways and worldly thoughts, holding nothing that may be troublesome or disagreeable. Any thing disagreeable in religion is such a shocking thing."

Well, then comes the most disagreeable thing possible, the revelation of an absolute truth, which says, "We will have nothing to do with this fellowship of evil. You are leading men into absolute destruction; you are promising them liberty and making them slaves; you are handing them over to the devil under the pretence of liberty and emancipation from their shackles," and forthwith these men turn upon this stern declaration of the eternal verity of God with all the hatred of the human heart which the great rebel himself can stir up within it. Believing, then, as I do, that there may be heard upon the winds these footfalls of the coming of the great Antichrist; that this which we hear whispered thus, and see spreading, we know not how, through the air, is just the precursing atmosphere which comes before his advent, I say it is the time, if ever the time was, for those who fear and love the Lord to rouse themselves up and to be working mightily that they may establish indeed the hiding-places of his face throughout the earth. Yes, the very desires of spiritual men point to the same thing. I suppose one of the greatest desires with those who are in earnest in religion, and which is altogether new to the present times is the longing for greater unity in Christendom.—"The Guardian," Aug. 23d, 1865.

SHREWD RETORT.

A preacher of the gospel, on being introduced to a skeptic, with the explanation that the man was a skeptic, in the midst of an extended circle of friends, said to him, "I suppose, then, you do not believe anything." "O yes," replied the skeptic, "I do believe many things." "Will you then," said the preacher, "be so good as to tell us what you believe?" The skeptic replied, "I do not believe that old story of the Bible about Cain obtaining a wife in the land of Nod, where there was no body living." "Never mind what you don't believe," said the preacher, "no doubt there is much of that; but tell us what you do believe." The skeptic rallied and said, "Well, I will tell you; I don't believe the account given by Moses, that God commanded the Midianites to be destroyed." "I am not inquiring for what you don't believe, but what you do believe. Tell us what you do believe." Recovering himself a little, and clearing up his voice, he made a desperate effort, saying, "I don't believe that old fable of the Bible, that God commanded the Canaanites to be destroyed." His belief was all disbelief. It commences all the time with "I don't believe."

A Romanist once said to a christian, "You Protestants could not prove your Bible, if it were not for the Holy Catholic Church, and her great men." "True," said the christian, "for the Bible predicted that there would be just such an apostate church and priesthood, and here you are, just as the Bible said."

After hearing a discourse, in which much was said by the preacher about God, a skeptic said to him, "What is this God about whom you have been saying so much?" The preacher replied, "God is a spirit." The skeptic fiercely followed up, "What is a spirit?" The preacher quickly turned on him, and inquired, "What is a cornstalk?" "Why—why—why, it is a cornstalk." "Yes, sir," replied the preacher, "a spirit is a spirit, and if you cannot tell what a cornstalk is, which you have seen thousands of times, and know has an existence, why do you ask me to tell you what the Infinite Spirit is, or doubt his existence?"

A skeptic once said to a preacher, "If the human body, after death, decomposes and returns to its original elements, how is it raised from the dead and identified?" The preacher replied, "And if the child seven years old has not one particle of the matter in it that was in it when it was born, and if there is not one particle of the matter in it when it is fourteen years old that was in it when it was seven, and if all the old matter has been superseded by new once every seven years till the person is seventy years old, or if all the old matter has been superseded by new matter ten times, as scientific men maintain, and the identity is not lost; why may not the person do through one more change, in death and the resurrection, and not lose his identity? and why may not this last change take place, as it will require no more power or wisdom to accomplish it, than any of the former changes?"—Ex.

DO NOT SWEAR!—Profane swearing is very justly regarded by all true gentlemen as a most debasing practice. The utterance of an oath quickly sinks a man in the estimation of all who entertain proper notions of true manhood. We have noticed that the habit is quite too common among our mechanics; and we would urge upon them to quit it. If a man happens to pound his finger with a hammer, the injury and pain are made none the less severe by swearing about it. The tongue is an unruly member and needs constant watching lest it become fouled with immoral sediment.

BE POLITE.

It is said that George McDuffie, of South Carolina, was very polite even when a little boy. One evening he was holding a little calf by the ears while his mother milked the cow; and a gentleman passing by said, "Good evening, my little son."

George returned, "Good evening, sir," with such a polite bow, that the gentleman noticed him and said, "Why didn't you pull off your hat, my little man?"

George answered, "If you will get down and hold my calf for me, I will pull off my hat to you."

George's politeness and shrewd remark were the making of him. That gentleman said to his mother, "Your son is a smart boy, and if properly trained, will make a great man some day. If you will permit me, I will give George a good education, and give him a start in the world."

The mother thanked the gentlemen for his kindness, and let him take charge of her son. George rose from taking care of a calf to be a clever and successful lawyer; afterwards he became a member of Congress, and then was made Governor of South Carolina.

I wish all my little nephews and cousins to be polite. A polite bow and a "Good evening, sir," costs nothing, but are sometimes worth a good deal. One courteous bow was worth a fortune to little George McDuffie. Everybody likes polite children.

When I used to go to school my teachers made it a rule that every boy should make a bow and every girl a curtsey, as we entered the door every morning, and do the same as we left at evening. And our instructor would invariably notice us with a polite bow, unless he happened not to see us. I like every rule that helps to refine our manners and improve our hearts.

My little readers—scholars—salute your teacher every morning with a graceful bow, and a "Good morning, Mr. ——;" and at evening, if convenient, part with him in the same way; and be polite to everybody, especially to old persons.

HOW THE STREET-SWEEPER BECAME A MINISTER.

"A penny, ma'am?" said a pale-faced, blue-eyed, thinly-clad little boy to a lady, as she was crossing one of the streets down town, some years ago. Taking out her purse, she gave the little street-sweeper a half dime, and passed on. In her haste she dropped her purse, which the little boy picked up, and was in the act of following the lady to return it, when he was surrounded by several others, who, like himself, were engaged in sweeping the crossings.

"How much is in it?" "What will you do with it?" were some of the questions put to him.

"I am going to give it to the lady," was his noble answer.

"What a fool!" shouted the others. "Catch us so green as that!" "No, no, come!" says the biggest of them; "we will have a good time."

"No, I won't; and breaking from them, the little fellow started off in the direction the lady had gone.

After running several blocks, and making some mistakes, he found the lady, and taking off his torn cap, he handed her the purse. Surprised, not till then discovering her loss, she asked him where he got it. The little boy told his story. The lady, interested in him, asked his name. "Robert M——." And where he lived?"

"I live nowhere?"

"Why, have you no father, no mother?"

"No, ma'am; my father died when I was a child, and my mother was buried some months ago;" and passing his coat sleeve across his eyes, he wiped away the tears that were beginning to flow.

"And what do you do for a living?"

"I sweep the crossings, and do what little I can to buy bread; then at night I sleep in some wagon, or on some step.

"Are you not afraid, little boy?"

"Sometimes; but mother told me before she died that if I would pray every day to God, and read this book"—taking a well-worn Testament from the breast of his jacket—"that God would send some one to care for me."

This was enough for the kind-hearted woman. She had lost a boy—her only boy—some short time ago, just about the age of the little street-sweeper. So, following him off into one of the back streets, where the boy said his mother had lived, she had his statement confirmed; and taking the little fellow to her own beautiful home, she cared for him as if he were her own child. He was sent to school, and finding his desire was to be a preacher, he was sent to college, and last spring he became a minister, and is now preaching the gospel.

Little children, do you think Robert ever regretted his returning the purse, or his daily prayer to God and reading the Bible?—Youth's Temperance Banner.

A WORD TO BOYS.

A writer in an educational journal, the title of which we have unfortunately lost, has the following pertinent and truthful remarks:

"Boys, listen! The first thing you want to learn, to develop what force there is in you, is self-reliance; that is, as regards your relations to man. If I were going to give a formula for developing the most forcible set of men, I should say: Turn them upon their own resources, with their minds well stored with moral and religious truth when they are boys, and teach them to depend on self, and not on father. If a boy is thrown upon his own resources at fifteen, with the world all before him where to choose, and he fights the battle of life single-handed up to manhood, and don't develop more than an average share of executive ability, then there is no stuff in him worth talking about. He may learn to plough, and sow, and reap, and mow, but this can all be done with machines and horses, and man wants to be something better than either of these. Wipe out of your vocabulary every such word as fail, give up wishing for improbable results, put your hand to the plough, or whatever tool you take to, and then drive on and never look back. Don't even sight your person to see if it is straight; 'don't be consistent, but be simply true' If you go out 'to see a reed shaken by the wind,' it is pretty likely you will never see anything of more consequence.—Phrenological Journal.

MAKING OTHERS HAPPY.

A mother who was in the habit of asking her children, before they retired for the night, what they had done that day to make others happy, found her twin daughters silent. The question was repeated.

"I can remember nothing good all this day, dear mother, only that one of my schoolmates was happy, because she had gained the head of the class, and I smiled on her and ran to kiss her; so she said I was good. That is all, dear mother."

The other spoke still more timidly. "A little girl who sat with me on the bench at school has lost a little brother. I saw that, while she studied her lesson, she hid her face in her book and wept. I felt sorry, and laid my face on the same book and wept with her. She then looked up and was comforted, and put her arms around my neck; but I do not know why she said I had done her good."

"Come to my arms, my darlings!" said the mother; "to rejoice with those that rejoice, and weep with those that weep," is to obey our blessed Redeemer.

A WORD TO LITTLE GIRLS.

Who is lovely? It is the little girl who drops sweet words, kind remarks, and pleasant smiles as she passes along; who has a kind word of sympathy for every girl or boy she meets in trouble, and a kind hand to help her companions out of difficulty; who never scolds, never contends, never teases her mother, nor seeks in any way to diminish, but always to increase her happiness. Would it not please you to pick up a string of pearls, drops of gold, diamonds, or precious stones, as you pass along the street? But these are the precious stones which can never be lost. Take the hand of the friendless. Smile on the sad and dejected. Sympathize with those in trouble. Strive everywhere to diffuse around you sunshine and joy. If you do this, you will be sure to be beloved.

DO GOOD DEEDS.—One pound of gold may be drawn into a wire that would extend round the globe. So one good deed may be felt through all time, and cast its influence into eternity. Though done in the first flush of youth, it may gild the last hours of a long life, and form the brightest spot in it.

For the World's Crisis.

I SHALL WAKEN.

I shall waken in the morning,
  When the night of death is gone,—
When the angel's trump of warning
  Cites the world before the throne.

In the fairy days of Childhood,
  Wandering by the flower-edged stream,
Or in the solemn shady wildwood,
  Mused I Youth's delusive dream.

The path I tread will lead to Eden;
  Somewhere sure that garden blooms;
In some lovely land 'tis hidden—
  Sure the world is not all tombs.

True, the showers of grief descended
  From the clouds of morning years;
But a bow of promise bended
  O'er those transient mists of tears.

Long the pathway grew and dreary;
  Frightful deserts round me spread;
In search of Eden, worn and weary,
  I reached the dwellings of the dead.

Dark the heavens are brooding o'er me,
  Across their blackness bends no bow;
And the iron gate before me
  Opens to the grave below;

But a voice from heaven calls me—
  "Pilgrim, walk the dreadful way;
The horrid darkness that appals thee,
  Curtains an eternal day."

"Death shall not of hope bereave thee,
  Thou shalt find an Eden home;
The heavenly word shall not deceive thee,
  That garden's in the world to come."

I shall waken in the morning,
  When the night of death is past;
When the angel's trump of warning
  Calls to Paradise at last.

SPEAKING IN MEETING.

AN EXCITING NARRATIVE AND TRUE.

I spoke in meeting once—and, as I was afterwards assured, to a very good purpose. It chanced on this wise. I sat among the children, happily telling them stories—we were alone in the house. A knock at the door preluded the entrance of a gentleman who had come to invite me to attend a lecture by a Jesuit priest, at the Catholic church, saying that the lecture was to Protestants, and the lecturer a very eloquent and interesting speaker. So urgent and pleasant was the gentleman, whose wife had sent half a mile in the cold to get me, that I did not feel willing to refuse to go. Reluctantly I started. It was already late when we reached the church, and we were not able to find seats together. The subject was the Host, and before the lecture began there was a great burning of incense, and a great singing of praise to the Virgin. Seven times to her and once to the Son was the censer swung, and the song of praise offered. This was repeated till it became tiresome. The large church was crowded, galleries and all, with people, many of them Protestants. Officers from Fort Leavenworth (this was in Leavenworth City) were there, and other Union soldiers.

The orator of the evening began—shade of Cicero! did any educated man think that Jesuit an eloquent speaker? It was never my unhappy fate to listen to a more absolutely disgusting harangue. The man lacked not in garrulity; he could flourish, and twaddle, and bluster fast enough, and because he was thus airing his astonishing powers in a bad cause, men ran to hear him, and sat silent, if not content, to listen to his vicious and false spouting. Nobody would have endured him had he been a Protestant minister. He had not spoken three minutes ere I became indignant that my escort should have brought me to waste an evening listening to such a ranter. Then I thought—no matter what; it is safe to leave this to be imagined—of the judgment of any one who could endure him; but soon all other thoughts became absorbed in astonished indignation, that Protestant gentlemen of education and intelligence should sit listening to such disgraceful lies as the priest was uttering. One falsehood after another fell roundly from his impure lips, until he said, pointing to the Host, "Martin Luther, having had an argument with the devil and been beaten, yielded the worship of the Host, and taught this fatal omission to the Protestants. This is the reason why this day you are without a sacrifice. This Luther himself owns. You will find his confession in the book of Martin Luther, vol. —, page —.

"Who is your author?" I was impelled to ask, but was unheard.

"Yes," cried the Jesuit, boldly, "you have no sacrifice for sin—you are the only people under heaven of whom this can be said. Why, the Jews had a sacrifice, even the heathen had a sacrifice. We have this—you Protestants have no sacrifice. What sacrifice have you, Protestant?"

O how my ears and my heart longed to hear at least one noble voice cry out in acknowledgement of the real sacrifice; but all was silence. I looked about, up to the galleries, wondered how they could keep silence—how they dared to. To me it seemed as though the earth must presently open and swallow us all up together—blasphemer, and we who consented to his crime. Would no one confess Him now, when his name was impiously and impudently blasphemed? Yes, He should not be utterly put to shame and denied, let the consequences be what they might.

"What sacrifice have you, Protestants?" was again triumphantly asked, when a voice that astonished nobody so completely as it did its owner, cried out with strength and clearness such that it was heard in every part of the church, and caused great commotion,—

"Jesus Christ, crucified once for all!" The priest attempted to proceed. "Once for all!" repeated the voice with resolute and solemn emphasis. At this the priest swayed backwards, as if one had struck him, and cried out angrily,—

"Put her out! Put her out!"

She fully expected to be "put out." She almost expected to be torn to pieces. She did not fear at all, that hour, what man might do unto her. She will always know how the martyrs felt. Why, it never hurt them to kill them. They were raised above the reach of pain. I shall waste no more pity on the christian martyrs—they were conquering heroes all, to be envied, never pitied. Could one but walk through life, passing among its woes as that woman sat among the swaying mass that hissed, and groaned, and glared around her, one might truly say, "the world is under my feet."

But she was not destitute of friends and protectors even there. There was a great stir and many exclamations in the church, but for reasons unknown to me then, no one attempted to obey the Jesuit. He watched the proceedings narrowly, but did not think it best to repeat his order. Was it because he saw, forcing their way over pews and through people, into the pew behind her who had broken his discourse, armed men, determined to shoot down the first one who dared to lay hand upon her? I was told that Colonel Jennison, with a revolver in each hand, came close beside the offender, and that others, well known in Kansas as men not to be trifled with, were ready at a word. Very little did I then suspect it; but the first movement to put that woman out would have been the signal for the shedding of blood, of terrible confusion, and of conflagration. It is well for the Jesuit that he did not insist on being obeyed. He now attempted to go on, but the first words he said were, "Yes, crucified once for all;" he seemed then so much confused and worried that he scarce knew what to say. His lecture that evening was not, it is safe to say, even in his own estimation, a success.

The next noon, at dinner, my friend was very merry over the commotion which my "flooring" the priest had caused in the city. He was quite delighted at the turn affairs were taking.

The clergy took it up. I understood that one old minister made quite an eloquent discourse upon the subject of "That one lone voice crying out against the Mystery of Iniquity," which he declared was more powerful, through righteousness, than the whole Romish church, or something to that effect, and another blessed me publicly and with unction and energy, laying his "right hand of fellowship" (though he was a Baptist) warmly upon my shoulder, and saying, "God bless you, sister. You have spoken in meeting once to good purpose, if you keep silent all the rest of your life."

Lectures were at once commenced. The papers, too, came out against Samarius, and he soon departed. Leavenworth is strongly Catholic, the city officers, and officers of the fort are, I was told, all of that belief. But it was an officer belonging to Fort Leavenworth who said he was never was so much pleased in his life, "as when a woman from the midst of the congregation, by one clear, true sentence, stopped and ruined the whole discourse of Samarius."

I have only to say to that officer, "Why could not you have said those true words?" And yet all finally agreed that 'twas better as it was. Had a man made that interruption there would most certainly have been a dreadful row and bloodshed. The resistless impulse and the smiting voice were given as God saw good. He does choose the "weak things of the world to confound the mighty. —N. Y. Evangelist.

THE DARK DAY.

Hon. Wheeler Martin has favored us with the following recollections of the dark day in 1780:—

The day was on the 19th of May, 1780 Where I resided at the time, the darkness at eleven o'clock was so great that a candle was lighted and placed upon the table; the fowls went to roost; the sheep all huddled around in a circle, with their heads inward. The grass, to look at it through the window, seemed of a yellow green, the same as to look through smoked glass upon green grass.

I well remember that the gentleman of the house read the following scripture to his numerous family: "The sun shall be turned to darkness, and the moon into blood, before that great and terrible day of the Lord come."

The darkness was so great in the night time that it was said by one Dr. Blackington, who resided near the northeast part of Rehoboth, who had occasion to be out among sick patients that night, that he could not see his white pocket-handkerchief placed before his eyes. The darkness was so thick that it could be felt.

The year 1780 was celebrated for its many northern lights; they covered the whole horizon over; they would flash like lightning, and fill the air with sulphur. The lights were so red that the flashes would bring warmth against the face.

The great snow fall was in December, 1779, or January, 1780. It snowed seven days; the snow was estimated to be four feet on a level, and the drifts from eight to ten feet high. The snow came moist and coarse, and it was so cold that it congealed very hard. The banks were so high that the sheep were buried up in them, and there remained for forty days, until they were found by their air holes and then dug out alive.

This year the whole of the Narragansett Bay was frozen over so thick and hard that the late Hon. John Brown passed from Providence, on the river of ice, to Newport and back, and I believe some went on skating parties the whole range. Gen. William Valentine sleighed wood from Fall River to Newport on the ice, through Bristol Ferry.

The people of Newport burnt their furniture to keep from freezing. The British army had left the island of Rhode Island in November, 1779, and stripped the people of their valuables. In a manner, the years of 1779 and 1780 were the hardest known for a century last past.

The weather was so severe in the winter of 1780, that many people were frozen to death. A man went from Attleboro, Mass., with a load of hoops, to Boston, and was caught in a great storm, and returning home was frozen to death, coming off Boston Neck. His oxen were frozen to death, and were found standing on their feet, as the snow was deep enough to support them.—American Baptist.

1866.

The historic eye of four thousand years looks down upon this point, the year 1866, and sees the issue fairly made up—is man capable of self-government. During that long, tedious march man has demonstrated a thousand times, and upon as many battle-fields, his capabilities to fight, has shown beyond question his physical prowess. And the last great showing on that issue was the grandest of them all, the crushing of the rebellion. The question for 1866 is to see if the broken fragments of war, a disorganized nation, can be harmoniously combined, "the many in one," by the diplomacy of peace, so that virtue and intelligence shall enable the people to make love of country its bulwark, and not its army and navy. For

"A union of hearts, a union of hands,
A union of lakes, and a union of lands,"

must be the bonds of a Republic, or it ceases to be a Republic. Well, the result sought is the most important man ever attempted to accomplish.

But 1866 is a year of note to the world. As an epoch it stands at the head of consummating grand events. The four quarters of the globe, at the dawn of this year, stand in strange and significant juxtapositions, as to coming troubles. A net-work of surroundings, not the devisings of human ingenuity, mysteriously enthralls the nations. All Europe watches Turkey. That appears to be the key of the arch of government of that continent. The Suez canal during this year will make "Palestine the highway of nations," and knock the last prop from beneath the rotten bottom of the worm-eaten Ottoman Empire. In 1866 the Emperor of the French will control the "short line route" to the East. On the first of May he is to withdraw his troops from Rome and leave the Pope to take care of himself. And already that venerable successor of the "rock-bottom" Galilean fisherman is looking out for a home, and the "Empire of Malta," the "kingdom of the sea," is talked of.

There is not a nation on earth that is at rest. The great cry is, "More rights to the people." The British empire is troubled. Fenians and pauperism are causing the corruptions of that government to quake. But why numerate the trials of the nations and the people. They are without end.—Warren Republican.

THE PRESENT STATE OF AFFAIRS.

Under the above heading an interesting article appears in an English monthly, from which we extract the following:—ED.

The present state of affairs is no easy subject to deal with amidst so many conflicting rumors, and in such a labyrinth of political embarassements. Yet one thing, and one alone, is clear—that no nation within the limits of the prophetic earth is, at this moment, perfectly settled, much less perfectly secure—or, rather there is no nation which is not in such a position that it might not at a day's notice be involved in war or revolution. The only settled thing is the universal dissettlement of nations; the only thing sure is that no nation can be sure of one day's peace. Like the forerunners of a tropical hurricane we see the little clouds flitting here and there "with the rapidity of birds"—while the air below and around us is as calm as death—the storm is high above our heads—when will it rush down?

If we move from north to south we find Russia at war in Central Asia, advancing to India as surely as the night is stealing on the day. Italy all but bankrupt, yet compelled to maintain her army at its utmost strength—and to prepare for an attack, sooner or later, on Venetia. Bankruptcy, if the army should be kept up much longer—tumult or revolution, inevitable, if the army shall be disbanded, or Venetia left permanently under Austria. We need not speak now of Rome or of the Pope, for that subject is before the minds of all the world, and, besides, the time has not come for seeing it in all its outlines and dimensions. Look next to the east and west, and you will find ubiquitous Russia in Central Asia, and at the centre of Asiatic centres, Samarcand. India always ready for revolt. America full of confusion, and preparing for war. China in the furthest east, in a state of permanent rebellion—the remotest western nations of America always in a state of feud. As for Europe itself—every nation and country, except Holland and Portugal, is more or less embroiled either at home, or with its neighbors. Germany is seething like a cauldron; and Spain is always in confusion—as well it may, being the masterpiece of Palmerstonian statesmanship. What real good could come from such a source? In short "the whole earth sitteth still and is at rest," and yet all is undermined by subterranean fires—and the subterranean smoke issues out through many a yawning chasm. Christendom has grown hard and dry—christianity, in man's vile hands, and under his very feet, has been moulded into idolatry, or trampled into dust! And the weary earth opens her mouth to swallow up the imposter and the imposture. Man is the impostor and man's christianity is the imposture, and both shall be swallowed up together. The thick smoke issuing through a thousand chasms, gives warning of the earthquake . . .

Russia struggling on the brink of ruin, with internal difficulties, yet contriving to conquer Central Asia and to advance to India, at the same time Italy growing in power and prosperity, yet on the verge of bankruptcy. America longing to fold her arms in peace, yet preparing for war. The Fenians put down under ineffable scorn, yet stronger than ever, and preparing for an outbreak in some unknown direction. An ambitious emperor renouncing all schemes of conquest, and converted in a moment into a kind of President of the Peace Society. Giving up Belgium, giving up the Rhine, reducing his army, reducing even his favorite naval establishments, yet keeping both army and navy just as efficient as before! What an odd combination of apparent tranquility, and real, deep, unfathomable agitation. A calm on the surface, an earthquake shaking the bottom of the deep—a calm on the level of the horizon, a tempest in the heights of the atmosphere. . .

It is well known that the Emperor Napoleon promised to the Jews, three years ago, that he would restore them to their native land in due time, requiring only that the choice of the fittest time should be left to his own decision. It is also confidently asserted that a numerous meeting was held in Paris last summer, on the subject of the restoration of Israel, and that the meeting was presided over by the Emperor's cousin, Prince Napoleon. This would lead the most incredulous to suspect that the restoration of the Jews may very soon become a real fact, and that the Emperor who restores them will become their champion and their patron. . . .

Confining ourselves at present to the passing moment, we may perceive some strange things lying at our feet. We cannot advance a step further without taking them up to look at them, as a philosopher in his daily walks takes up the shells and pebbles which happen to lie on the pathway. An American envoy has arrived in Paris on a mission so secret that no one can make it out, and the longer he remains the stranger the mystery becomes. Now there is always a French minister at Washington, and an American minister at Paris, and therefore no additional envoy was in the least required, unless in this one case—namely: if any negotiations were being carried on between France and America so delicate that they could not be entrusted to paper. In that case a special envoy would be absolutely necessary, in order to communicate with the French government by word of mouth. It is therefore very much to be suspected that some secret negotiation is now being carried on between America and France—something relative to England, Canada, and the Fenians. At the same time the two principal Fenians, the two heads of the entire conspiracy, are both of them in Paris, in the neighborhood of the Tuileries and the Foreign Office. Can all this be accidental? Is our best ally likely to encourage the near approach of our bitterest enemies? Are secret messages sent from Washington to Paris on Mexican business which has been for years before the world? Certainly not. There is something more in this than accident or Mexico.

Another suspicious feature in the present state of affairs is this: The French journals have spoken loudly and boldly of the Mexican difficulty, and even said that Gen. Schofield has been sent to Paris with something like a threatening message from the American government. Now it is well known that the French government will not allow any journal whatsoever to circulate reports that are either alarming or derogatory. This is the general rule, yet in the present case it has been departed from. The journals have been permitted to say what they will concerning Mexico. This is unaccountable except upon one supposition. Suppose a secret transaction between France and the United States—suppose it to refer to England, Canada, and the Fenians. In such a case anything would be permitted that would divert our attention from the secret negotiations, and give us a false idea of what is being carried on by the two governments. Mexico serves as a screen to conceal Canada and the Fenians, and therefore the French journals have been permitted to speak with so little reserve about General Schofield and Mexican affairs. We throw out this suggestion; time will soon lift up the veil.

A third remarkable feature is this. The French government has just given notice of its intention to rescind the treaty of extradition within six months. And not only this, but the reasons publicly assigned are, neither more nor less than a direct public charge of dishonesty and falsehood brought against this whole nation! France in an official manifesto, sets forth the honesty and loyalty of her own government; and then proceeds to contrast with this the duplicity, almost the perfidy of England in the fulfillment of her stipulations. It is asserted that for twenty-two years we have in every case evaded our engagements. This is a serious charge—a national insult! But what is the motive? Why this sudden and abrupt attack just at this moment; when not a hint was given in the case of the Orsini conspirators, or in the recent case of Mazzini not two years ago? Why so silent then, when there was so much reason for complaint; and why so decisive now, when there is no trace of any additional provocation? Is it not because the time has come? Suppose we should be at war with America, France wishes to remain neutral, or perhaps the Emperor means to turn directly against us. Again—Suppose the Fenians defeated and obliged to fly to save their heads. Or rather, suppose the Fenians to wish, beforehand, to provide a place of shelter in case of an emergency. In each and in all of these cases the abandonment of the extradition treaty is a manifest advantage. It provides in France a place of shelter for the Fenians in an emergency, and at the same time our frequent violations of the treaty afford the Emperor a just excuse for remaining neutral, or for doing worse. The encouragement which this new measure will give to Fenianism, is evident at first sight. The two leading men are in Paris at present, perhaps in constant communication with the government; and the whole Fenian body is encouraged and invigorated by the knowledge that happen what may, they shall always be safe when once they have reached the French territory, not only in Europe but in the French West Indies! This will greatly increase their audacity and confidence, and strengthen their hands for mischief. For let it be remembered that Fenianism is not simply a political crime, in which case it could not have been affected by the treaty; but it is also most likely to end in those civil offences which are comprehended in the treaty—murder, pillage, and incendiarism. The abandonment of the treaty of extradition is, therefore, a most singular and suspicious measure, and may be pronounced to be the most singular, perhaps the most important, measure of the day.

TWELVE QUESTIONS FOR A WET SUNDAY.

1. If it were any other day would I be kept at home by the weather?

2. Did I ever stay away from my business, from a party, from an amusement, for such a rain or snow as this?

3. If it were a public meeting for some other purpose than divine worship, would I think it too bad a day to go out?

4. Would I go to church if I could make or save a dollar by it, or gain a customer?

5. If my own church be distant, is there none that is near where I may be sure of finding a vacant seat?

6. If I am afraid of spoiling my best clothes, had I not better go in my common dress, than lose the benefit of the meeting, and neglect my duty?

7. Have I not overcoat, overshoes, and umbrella, that will keep me from taking cold, and preserve my Sunday dress from injury?

8. Am I not nearer to the church than many who are never kept away by bad weather?

9. If every one should find an excuse for absence as easily as I do, what would be the appearance of our churches on the Lord's day?

10. Is it not a dishonor to my maker, if for reasons that would not influence me in worldly matters, I keep from the stated worship of the sanctuary?

11. Is not a wet Sunday at home a more dreary day than one that is diversified by going out to church?

12. Am I willing that my children should learn by my example that they may go to school, to market, to store, to shows, in all weather—but not to church?—Presbyterian.

For the World's Crisis.

WE ARE PASSING AWAY.

Having been favored with the privilege of visiting the old homestead for a few weeks past, as I cast my eye over the hills and through the vales, where once my childish feet were wont to roam, and there beheld the sad changes which a few brief years had made, these words, "we are passing away," seemed to vibrate heavily upon my ears.

As I view the same rippling waves of the Coaticooke, that glideth by as in former years, it gently murmurs, "we are passing away." I pass on half a mile or more, and inquire for the old familiar school-house; but the answer comes, "It is not here." The blight of years has taken it from our view, and another is erected on the opposite side of the river.

Turning away with a heavy heart, I pass on in quest of some of the old neighbors. A few rods walk brings me to the house of one highly esteemed. I tap gently at the door. But ah! new occupants are there. I inquire for the grandma, to whom I had so often carried flowers in my youthful days, and as often ran to meet when I had seen her tottering limbs bearing her over the meadow;—but the response comes, "She is not here." She lies quietly sleeping in yonder graveyard, as it were, pensively whispering, "we are passing away." Thus I pass on, and on, hoping to find the loved spot where I may shake the friendly hand of some schoolmate. But oh! strangers answer one lies here, another there, and a third has removed to a far distant country. I can tread no farther until I sit down and give vent to my feelings in a flood of tears, crying, "'Come, Lord Jesus, and come quickly!' bring back our loved ones from the tomb, and wipe the falling tears from off our faces."

Now we view the changing seasons of the year. It is cheering in spring to hear the birds warble forth their soft melody as they flit from branch to branch. Earth, relieved of her icy chains, brings forth the green herb, causing all nature to rejoice. And the buds burst out, thus telling us the leaves will soon appear. So passes a few days; when another season rolls around, and summer has come, bringing with her blooming flowers, and robing the earth in richest verdure; awakening all the finer sensibilities of the human heart, and pointing us to a land where sweeter flowers will bloom, and soft and balmy breezes will forever float over those delightsome plains. Thus, as we pause and look around, and behold every thing so beautiful, we picture to our imagination that we have arrived at our destined heaven. But ah! how soon are we undeceived. Those unwelcome words come, "We are passing away." The flowers fall off; the leaves, but a few days since of the brightest green, have begun to fade, and soon the forest is stripped of her foliage; and autumn, with her bleak winds and gloomy aspect, comes. Nor does change stop here: she strikes a last, fatal blow; earth falls beneath her power, and hills and valleys clad in snow and ice show that her victory is won.

With such a mirror before our eyes, how vividly is portrayed the four different stages of human life,—childhood, youth, middle age, and old age, each with their startling evidences of our mortality. Oh, may we be humble, and seek for that happy Eden home where the inhabitants will no more be heard to say, "We are passing away."

ENOCH AND ELIJAH.

A Question.—"If, as Jesus declares, in John 3: 13, 'No man hath ascended up to heaven, but he that came down from heaven, even the Son of man which is in heaven,'—where are Enoch and Elijah? for we read that they 'went up into heaven.'" (2 Kings 2: 11; Heb. 11: 5). R. L. C.
Clear Lake, Iowa.

The declaration of Christ that no man hath ascended to heaven, and the statements of other scripture that two men have ascended, are to be harmonized on the same principle as that by which we harmonize a general rule with its exceptions. There is no general rule without exceptions. Hence, in the Bible, as in other books, all general statements are to be qualified by such exceptions and limitations as the nature of the subject or the teachings of other scripture demand.

For example: Paul says, in one place (Rom. 5; 12), "DEATH hath passed upon ALL men;" this, without qualification, is equivalent to saying, "all men must die." Yet, to this general rule, other passages give the following exceptions,—Enoch, Elijah, and the last-day saints. "Enoch was translated, that he should not see death." (Heb. 11: 5); "Elijah went up into heaven" without dying." (2 Kings 2: 11); and the saints who "are alive and remain unto the coming of the Lord," shall "not all sleep but shall all be changed in a moment, in the twinkling of an eye, at the last trump," and, like Enoch and Elijah, caught up, together with the resurrected saints, to meet the Lord in the air, and so be forever with the Lord. (1 Cor. 15: 51; 1 Thess. 4: 17)

Here, qualifying the general statement by its evident exceptions, no real inconsistency is discovered between them, and all apparent contradiction disappears.

Just so with regard to the seemingly conflicting statements about going to heaven. "No man hath ascended to heaven," is plainly the general rule; the translation of Enoch and Elijah are no less plainly exceptions. Up to the time when the words were uttered, so far as the evidence of scripture goes to show, they were the only exceptions. Besides the Son of man, they are doubtless the only exceptions still. As, therefore, they "went up into heaven" "without seeing death," they must have gone there alive; and as we have no evidence to show that they have since died, or departed to some other place, we conclude that they are living in heaven now,—waiting for that long-expected day, prophesied of by the one and foreshadowed on the Mount of Transfiguration to the other, when the Lord shall come, with ten thousand of his saints, to execute judgment upon all, and establish on the earth that kingdom whose majesty and glory shall be resplendent and eternal.—Young Pilgrim.

THE LAST TIMES.

Remarks of the Bishop of Oxford at a late Missionary Meeting in England.

I have no doubt myself that the last attempt upon the truth of Christ will come in, not with any open denial of its verity, but with a courteous admission of its truth. At the same time there will be a sapping of its distinctive features. I think that the aspect of men's minds at the present time shows us that this will be the form of danger, universal toleration, toleration not only among christian sects, one towards another, but a deep respect for religiousness everywhere, always providing that it is not that troublesome thing which, by being believed, affects men's conduct, is any limitation upon their thoughts, or even troubles what is called the course of society. That they will all agree together to put out. I have no doubt myself that unbelief contains within itself the seed of the most intensely hating persecution the world has ever yet seen. Instead of being tolerant, I believe it is the very perfection of intolerance. I believe that the very moment it has achieved its own victory, toleration will be the thing above all others it will hate with an intensity short only of the hatred the evil spirit himself has for the simple faith of the gospel of the Lord Jesus Christ. It must be so, I think, because unbelief, in whatever form it comes, is the exaltation of the human intellect and the human will, over the voice of revelation and revealed knowledge. It is thwarted to the utmost the very moment that it is met and confronted by the mighty rock of revealed truth. The stream flows on with the most delicious smoothness when there is nothing to thwart it. "Let us all love one another. Let us be tolerant of each other's views. If you choose to worship the devil, worship him, if you only do it quietly. If you choose to worship an anti-devil, do so, if you do so quietly. Let us go on altogether in our worldly ways and worldly thoughts, holding nothing that may be troublesome or disagreeable. Any thing disagreeable in religion is such a shocking thing."

Well, then comes the most disagreeable thing possible, the revelation of an absolute truth, which says, "We will have nothing to do with this fellowship of evil. You are leading men into absolute destruction; you are promising them liberty and making them slaves; you are handing them over to the devil under the pretence of liberty and emancipation from their shackles," and forthwith these men turn upon this stern declaration of the eternal verity of God with all the hatred of the human heart which the great rebel himself can stir up within it. Believing, then, as I do, that there may be heard upon the winds these footfalls of the coming of the great Antichrist; that this which we hear whispered thus, and see spreading, we know not how, through the air, is just the precursing atmosphere which comes before his advent, I say it is the time, if ever the time was, for those who fear and love the Lord to rouse themselves up and to be working mightily that they may establish indeed the hiding-places of his face throughout the earth. Yes, the very desires of spiritual men point to the same thing. I suppose one of the greatest desires with those who are in earnest in religion, and which is altogether new to the present times is the longing for greater unity in Christendom.—"The Guardian," Aug. 23d, 1865.

SHREWD RETORT.

A preacher of the gospel, on being introduced to a skeptic, with the explanation that the man was a skeptic, in the midst of an extended circle of friends, said to him, "I suppose, then, you do not believe anything." "O yes," replied the skeptic, "I do believe many things." "Will you then," said the preacher, "be so good as to tell us what you believe?" The skeptic replied, "I do not believe that old story of the Bible about Cain obtaining a wife in the land of Nod, where there was no body living." "Never mind what you don't believe," said the preacher, "no doubt there is much of that; but tell us what you do believe." The skeptic rallied and said, "Well, I will tell you; I don't believe the account given by Moses, that God commanded the Midianites to be destroyed." "I am not inquiring for what you don't believe, but what you do believe. Tell us what you do believe." Recovering himself a little, and clearing up his voice, he made a desperate effort, saying, "I don't believe that old fable of the Bible, that God commanded the Canaanites to be destroyed." His belief was all disbelief. It commences all the time with "I don't believe."

A Romanist once said to a christian, "You Protestants could not prove your Bible, if it were not for the Holy Catholic Church, and her great men." "True," said the christian, "for the Bible predicted that there would be just such an apostate church and priesthood, and here you are, just as the Bible said."

After hearing a discourse, in which much was said by the preacher about God, a skeptic said to him, "What is this God about whom you have been saying so much?" The preacher replied, "God is a spirit." The skeptic fiercely followed up, "What is a spirit?" The preacher quickly turned on him, and inquired, "What is a cornstalk?" "Why—why—why, it is a cornstalk." "Yes, sir," replied the preacher, "a spirit is a spirit, and if you cannot tell what a cornstalk is, which you have seen thousands of times, and know has an existence, why do you ask me to tell you what the Infinite Spirit is, or doubt his existence?"

A skeptic once said to a preacher, "If the human body, after death, decomposes and returns to its original elements, how is it raised from the dead and identified?" The preacher replied, "And if the child seven years old has not one particle of the matter in it that was in it when it was born, and if there is not one particle of the matter in it when it is fourteen years old that was in it when it was seven, and if all the old matter has been superseded by new ones every seven years till the person is seventy years old, or if all the old matter has been superseded by new matter ten times, as scientific men maintain, and the identity is not lost; why may not the person do through one more change, in death and the resurrection, and not lose his identity? and why may not this last change take place, as it will require no more power or wisdom to accomplish it, than any of the former changes?"—Ex.

DO NOT SWEAR!—Profane swearing is very justly regarded by all true gentlemen as a most debasing practice. The utterance of an oath quickly sinks a man in the estimation of all who entertain proper notions of true manhood. We have noticed that the habit is quite too common among our mechanics, and we would urge upon them to quit it. If a man happens to pound his finger with a hammer, the injury and pain are made none the less severe by swearing about it. The tongue is an unruly member and needs constant watching lest it become fouled with immoral sediment.

BE POLITE.

It is said that George McDuffie, of South Carolina, was very polite even when a little boy. One evening he was holding a little calf by the ears while his mother milked the cow; and a gentleman passing by said, "Good evening, my little son."

George returned, "Good evening, sir," with such a polite bow, that the gentleman noticed him and said, "Why didn't you pull off your hat, my little man?"

George answered, "If you will get down and hold my calf for me, I will pull off my hat to you."

George's politeness and shrewd remark were the making of him. That gentleman said to his mother, "Your son is a smart boy, and if properly trained, will make a great man some day. If you will permit me, I will give George a good education, and give him a start in the world."

The mother thanked the gentlemen for his kindness, and let him take charge of her son. George rose from taking care of a calf to be a clever and successful lawyer; afterwards he became a member of Congress, and then was made Governor of South Carolina.

I wish all my little nephews and cousins to be polite. A polite bow and a "Good evening, sir," costs nothing, but are sometimes worth a good deal. One courteous bow was worth a fortune to little George McDuffie. Everybody likes polite children.

When I used to go to school my teachers made it a rule that every boy should make a bow and every girl a curtsey, as we entered the door every morning, and do the same as we left at evening. And our instructor would invariably notice us with a polite bow, unless he happened not to see us. I like every rule that helps to refine our manners and improve our hearts.

My little readers—scholars—salute your teacher every morning with a graceful bow, and a "Good morning, Mr. ——;" and at evening, if convenient, part with him in the same way; and be polite to everybody, especially to old persons.

HOW THE STREET-SWEEPER BECAME A MINISTER.

"A penny, ma'am?" said a pale-faced, blue-eyed, thinly-clad little boy to a lady, as she was crossing one of the streets down town, some years ago. Taking out her purse, she gave the little street-sweeper a half dime, and passed on. In her haste she dropped her purse, which the little boy picked up, and was in the act of following the lady to return it, when he was surrounded by several others, who, like himself, were engaged in sweeping the crossings.

"How much is in it?" "What will you do with it?" were some of the questions put to him.

"I am going to give it to the lady," was his noble answer.

"What a fool!" shouted the others. "Catch us so green as that!" "No, no, come!" says the biggest of them; "we will have a good time."

"No, I won't; and breaking from them, the little fellow started off in the direction the lady had gone.

After running several blocks, and making some mistakes, he found the lady, and taking off his torn cap, he handed her the purse. Surprised, not till then discovering her loss, she asked him where he got it. The little boy told his story. The lady, interested in him, asked his name. "Robert M——." And where he lived?

"I live nowhere!"

"Why, have you no father, no mother?"

"No, ma'am; my father died when I was a child, and my mother was buried some months ago;" and passing his coat sleeve across his eyes, he wiped away the tears that were beginning to flow.

"And what do you do for a living?"

"I sweep the crossings, and do what little I can to buy bread; then at night I sleep in some wagon, or on some step.

"Are you not afraid, little boy?"

"Sometimes; but mother told me before she died that if I would pray every day to God, and read this book"—taking a well-worn Testament from the breast of his jacket—"that God would send some one to care for me."

This was enough for the kind-hearted woman. She had lost a boy—her only boy—some short time ago, just about the age of the little street-sweeper. So, following him off into one of the back streets, where the boy said his mother had lived, she had his statement confirmed; and taking the little fellow to her own beautiful home, she cared for him as if he were her own child. He was sent to school, and finding his desire was to be a preacher, he was sent to college, and last spring he became a minister, and is now preaching the gospel.

Little children, do you think Robert ever regretted his returning the purse, or his daily prayer to God and reading the Bible?—Youth's Temperance Banner.

A WORD TO BOYS.

A writer in an educational journal, the title of which we have unfortunately lost, has the following pertinent and truthful remarks:

"Boys, listen! The first thing you want to learn, to develop what force there is in you, is self-reliance; that is, as regards your relations to man. If I were going to give a formula for developing the most forcible set of men, I should say: Turn them upon their own resources, with their minds well stored with moral and religious truth when they are boys, and teach them to depend on self, and not on father. If a boy is thrown upon his own resources at fifteen, with the world all before him where to choose, and he fights the battle of life single-handed up to manhood, and don't develop more than an average share of executive ability, then there is no stuff in him worth talking about. He may learn to plough, and sow, and reap, and mow, but this can all be done with machines and horses, and man wants to be something better than either of these. Wipe out of your vocabulary every such word as fail, give up wishing for improbable results, put your hand to the plough, or whatever tool you take to, and then drive on and never look back. Don't even sight your person to see if it is straight; 'don't be consistent, but be simply true.' If you go out 'to see a reed shaken by the wind,' it is pretty likely you will never see anything of more consequence.—Phrenological Journal.

MAKING OTHERS HAPPY.

A mother who was in the habit of asking her children, before they retired for the night, what they had done that day to make others happy, found her twin daughters silent. The question was repeated.

"I can remember nothing good all this day, dear mother, only that one of my schoolmates was happy, because she had gained the head of the class, and I smiled on her and ran to kiss her; so she said I was good. That is all, dear mother."

The other spoke still more timidly. "A little girl who sat with me on the bench at school has lost a little brother. I saw that, while she studied her lesson, she hid her face in her book and wept. I felt sorry, and laid my face on the same book and wept with her. She then looked up and was comforted, and put her arms around my neck; but I do not know why she said I had done her good."

"Come to my arms, my darlings!" said the mother; "to rejoice with those that rejoice, and weep with those that weep," is to obey our blessed Redeemer.

A WORD TO LITTLE GIRLS.

Who is lovely? It is the little girl who drops sweet words, kind remarks, and pleasant smiles as she passes along; who has a kind word of sympathy for every girl or boy she meets in trouble, and a kind hand to help her companions out of difficulty; who never scolds, never contends, never teases her mother, nor seeks in any way to diminish, but always to increase her happiness. Would it not please you to pick up a string of pearls, drops of gold, diamonds, or precious stones, as you pass along the street? But these are the precious stones which can never be lost. Take the hand of the friendless. Smile on the sad and dejected. Sympathize with those in trouble. Strive everywhere to diffuse around you sunshine and joy. If you do this, you will be sure to be beloved.

DO GOOD DEEDS.—One pound of gold may be drawn into a wire that would extend round the globe. So one good deed may be felt through all time, and cast its influence into eternity. Though done in the first flush of youth, it may gild the last hours of a long life, and form the brightest spot in it.

THE RESURRECTION.

"A seed found in the hand of a mummy two thousand years old, when planted, bloomed into a beautiful flower."

Two thousand years ago, a flower
Bloomed brightly in a far-off land;
Two thousand years ago, its seed
Was placed within a dead man's hand.

Before the Savior came to earth,
That man had lived and loved and died;
And even in that far-off time
The flower had spread its perfume wide.

Suns rose and set, years came and went,
The dead hand kept its treasure well;
Nations were born and turned to dust,
While life was hidden in that shell.

The shrivelled hand is robbed at last,
The seed is buried in the earth;
When lo, the life long hidden there,
Into a glorious flower bursts forth.

Just such a plant as that which grew
From such a seed when buried low;
Just such a flower in Egypt bloomed
And died two thousand years ago.

And will not He who watched the seed,
And kept the life within the shell,
When those he loves are laid to rest,
Watch o'er their buried dust as well?

And will he not from 'neath the sod
Cause something glorious to arise?
Aye, though it sleep two thousand years,
Yet all that buried dust shall rise.

Just such a face as greets you now,
Just such a form as here we wear,
Only more glorious far, will rise
To meet the Savior in the air.

Then will I lay me down in peace,
When called to leave this vale of tears,
For "in my flesh I shall see God,"
E'en though I sleep two thousand years.

THOUGHTS ON PROPHECY.

THE FRENCH EXPOSITION.

Editor World's Crisis :—

Dear Brother,—In agreement with the inspired intimation that a coming potentate shall "by his policy cause craft to prosper in his hand, and by peace shall destroy many," it may not be untimely to scrutinize the import of the approaching grand convocation of the nations through their representatives at the Paris Exposition. It is no rash or idle affirmation, to say that in the number of invited and represented nationalities, in the eagerness of competition, and in the magnificence of the display, this great assemblage of the various products of industrial art, and modern human enterprise and invention, will be far beyond all precedent. It will be interesting in this connection, to refer to some features in the recent report of a committee of the New York Chamber of Commerce.

In answer to the suggested impolicy of contributing to enhance the splendor and vastness of this exhibition on the part of the United States, occurs the following:—

"The committee regret to be obliged to notice an opinion somewhat earnestly expressed, that it is not expedient or proper for the United States in any way to encourage or sanction the proposed Exposition at Paris, for the alleged reason that its real object is to aggrandize a sovereign, whose Mexican policy has seriously offended the American people. Your committee cannot perceive the force or propriety of this object. Among the various independent nations, at least thirty in number, who will meet in the coming 'concours,' it would be strange indeed, if no political differences should exist between any two of them. It surely is enough to say that the government of the United States has formally and deliberately accepted the invitation of the government of France, and in the face of the world has agreed to be present. It surely is not impossible that long before the opening of the Exposition, the subject of Mexico may cease to agitate either nation."

Notwithstanding the apparent propriety of illustrating American achievement on such an attractive and imposing arena, there are some who heartily believe that the tendency, the intention and the result of this gigantic Napoleonic device, will be the "aggrandizement" of its imperial originator. It appears that this exposition "was established by an imperial decree of Napoleon III., in Feb., 1865, and is to last for seven months from the 1st of April, 1867." The interval, therefore, yet to elapse before the completion of all the arrangements designed to ensure the success and perfect the conception of this enterprise, will give an idea of its intended magnificence. We quote:—

"We must not forget that the proposed exhibition, officially denominated the 'Exposition Universelle,' is expressly intended for the products, not of any particular nation or continent, but of the whole world, whether civilized or savage. The Imperial Commission has allotted separate compartments, not alone to the Christian governments of Europe and America, but also to the Mahometan and Pagan nations of Turkey, Persia, and Central Asia, Africa and Oceanica. Ample space is also provided for displaying different races of savages at work in their rude industry. The diagram of the 'Palace' and its interior divisions shows it to be a building of elliptical form, about 1,610 feet long and 1,245 feet broad; covering an area of about 38 acres, in the centre of the 'Champ de Mars,' a spacious open square or 'Park' of about 150 acres. In the centre of the Palace is an open interior court or garden, about 533 feet long and 164 feet broad. The Palace covers an elliptical ring around this interior garden of about 490 feet in breadth, with a total area of 143,848 square metres, very nearly equal, at 10½ square feet to the metre, to 1,510,000 square feet.

The elliptical building is subdivided by three concentric passage-ways into seven separate galleries, each about fifty feet broad, which was respectively allotted to the first seven grand divisions or 'groups' of objects to be exhibited. By a single walk around either of the galleries, the visitor may successfully review and compare the products of the respective nations, of the particular character embraced in the 'group.' There are ten 'groups' in all, of which three will be outside of the palace, in the 'Park' adjacent, principally embracing living products of agriculture, and horticulture, with several objects of miscellaneous character."

The total area within the palace is divided among the different nations in the following proportions:—

TO EUROPEAN NATIONS.	Square Metres.
France	64,056
Great Britain and dependencies	23,002
Prussia	7,628
Austria	7,528
Other German States	7,528
Belgium	7,249
Italy	3,858
Russia	2,916
Switzerland	2,418
Sweden and Norway	2,091
Spain	1,911
Portugal	1,134
Denmark	650
Greece	648
Roumania	648
Papal States	300

TO AMERICAN NATIONS	Square Metres.
To the United States	2,788
Brazil	972
Mexico and Central America	648
South American States	810

TO MOHAMMEDAN AND PAGAN NATIONS	Square Metres.
To Turkey	1,296
Persia and Central Asia	648
China, Japan and Southern Asia	810
African and Oceanica	810

"It thus appears that the proportion of space allotted to the United States is 0 020, or one-fiftieth part of the whole, being 2,788 square metres, about 29,234 square feet. From this must be deducted the necessary spaces for the open passage-ways running through it, leaving an available space remaining of only 15,824 square feet, not quite equal to the area of seven ordinary building lots in New York. It forms a narrow wedged figure, about 450 feet long and 100 feet broad at the exterior line of the palace, converging to a front of about 11 feet on the interior garden. It is subdivided as follows:

For group No. 1, 'works of art,' 665 square feet, (with 1,296 feet of wall room for pictures.)
For group No. 2, materials for liberal arts	1,833 feet
For group No. 3, furniture, etc.	1,082 feet
For group No. 4, garments, etc.	2,467 feet
For group No. 5, products, etc	3,880 feet
For group No. 6, machines, etc.	5,010 feet
For group No. 7, food	1,190 feet
Total	16,824 feet

It must be apparent at once that these spaces will not suffice to adequately exhibit the products of the United States, and that it will be indispensably necessary for our government to erect a supplemental building.

The applications for space already made to Mr. Derby, the agent of the United States at New York, far more than fill the whole of the space above described. The government of Belgium already finds the space allotted to her quite insufficient, although nearly three times that of the United States, and is to erect a supplemental building in the Park.

The government of France assumes the whole expense of erecting the spacious building for the exposition, called 'The Palace,' estimated at 20,000,000 of francs, but are to receive the proceeds of the tickets of admission, estimated at 8,000,000 of francs, leaving a clear expenditure of 12,600,000 of francs, about $2,400,000, which will, however, be practically reimbursed to France, at least in a measure, by the general expenditure at the concourse in Paris."

We have thus presented before us some hints, from which to derive a conception of the vastness of the design in this rightly named "Exposition Universelle." Every nation, kingdom, and tribe under heaven is solicited to participate in this great festivity of art. Not alone into every part of Christendom, but into the vast interior of heathen countries, has the Gallic message of invitation penetrated. Not a latitude nor a continent is forgotten. Neither the burning tropics, nor the frozen poles, are passed by. Not even the islands of the sea, not the meanest, nor remotest, nor obscurest organized community of human beings, neither despotisms nor republics, are overlooked. Protestant and Catholic, Brahmin and Mohammedan, European, African, and Indian, are summoned to send tribute of their most cunning workmanship, and the strangest and most varied productions of nature, to enhance the magnitude and the miracle of this jubilee of seven months of seeing and wondering. Every most experienced faculty and most adroit art of description, will be tasked to report through every territory and community of the habitable globe, the splendor and extent of this mighty aggregate of wonders. Thus will the Cæsar of the nineteenth century be aggrandized. Thus will the way be prepared for the subtlest and most dangerous of all monarchs of all ages to attain the coveted supremacy in influence and power.

There is certainly something significant in the term of duration allotted to this exhibition. In Daniel it is said, "the prince shall make a covenant with many for one week." And we have here at least a week of months specified, during which the nations of all the earth may be said to be covenanted with the foremost European sovereign in this great conception and enterprise. If this does not really fulfill the prophecy, it would certainly seem to be a shadow immediately going before the fulfillment:

A lady in Philadelphia, deeply interested in observing the prophetic developments of these most significant times, recently wrote me in reference to this subject. She says; "There are some very interesting letters from a converted priest in Germany, published in the "Israelite Indeed," which represent that the covenant between Napoleon and the Jews is about to be made, and the information seems to be well authenticated. There are frequent items of news, all tending in the same direction."

Before concluding, we may barely refer to a single other fact mentioned in this report. It is this. "In such a study, America might well seek to learn the processes of statesmanship by which the reigning sovereign of France has been enabled, in twelve short years, to double the assessed money value of his empire, raising it from 124,000 millions of francs in 1852, to 249,000 millions of francs in 1864." When has such astonishing increase ever occurred in history before? This looks like the financiering of the willful king, "who shall have power over the treasures of gold and silver."

Let no one be misled by the apparently pacific language of the Emperor's January speech, in reference to Mexico. Though seeming to imply concessions to the United States, and hinting at a return of the French army to Europe, the stability of the new empire of Maximilian must be guaranteed. This is a sine qua non. Nor indeed does the language employed give the slightest intimation of an immediate recall. The period of withdrawal may be indefinitely postponed or protracted. The imperial policy is undoubtedly indeed pacific, but it is aggressive, ambitious, and persistent. It contemplates no retractions, and scruple nothing (at the opportune time) about a war, in which its interest and predominance will be promoted. Momentous days are these! Period most emphatically critical! Exigency full of peril! C. COLEGROVE.

For the World's Crisis.

FOUR HUNDRED AND NINETY TIMES:

OR, THE WAY OF JESUS THE BEST WAY YET.

In this age of improvements (so called), when all the ways of Jesus are altered over, and every branch of the "doctrine of Christ" changed or improved so as to suit the world, and the demands of cold-hearted professors, and the old mode of a future life by "the resurrection of the dead," is out of fashion, and men must improve on it so as to have a "shorter cut," or to "climb up some other way," and slip off to heaven when they die; in such an age as this, no wonder that they hate to hear "sound doctrine," or any thing on "time," or "times," or "time, times and a half." Well it is not my purpose now to write any thing on the time of Jesus' coming to take to himself his great power and reign, but to write something about the conversation Jesus had with his followers, when he was giving them to "understand the mysteries of the kingdom of heaven." It is about forgiveness that I wish to write a few lines, coming right from the heart, and praying that it may reach the heart of some.

I know we are in a time when it don't take much to make a fuss, whereby families are divided, churches are torn to pieces, and societies are set to quarreling. Jesus knew how things would be, and tried to instruct his followers so that they might be at peace among themselves, and great is that peace when people "take heed" to Jesus's words. Jesus had been teaching them what to do if a brother trespassed against them, but Peter was hardly satisfied, and wanted to know, "How oft shall my brother trespass against me and I forgive him? till seven times? Jesus saith unto him, I say not unto thee until seven times; but until seventy times seven," or four hundred and ninety times. Think of this, you that can't forgive one trespass of a brother. Well, the response may be how can I forgive my brother if he don't come and ask my forgiveness? How? by doing just as Jesus says in Matt. 18: 15. "If thy brother trespass against thee, go and tell him his fault between him and thee alone: if he shall hear thee, thou hast gained thy brother. But if he will not hear thee, then take with thee one or two more, that in the mouth of two or three witnesses every word may be established." I verily believe if the above instruction was carried out, we should see peace restored where now we see "hatred" and "variance." How is it? "If thy brother (or sister) trespass against thee, go and tell him his fault between him and thee alone." O how few are willing to do that. When one feels that a brother has trespassed against him, instead of obeying the Lord, they follow the "old man," and go and tell some brother or sister, and try to gain their sympathy, and talk it over until it increases and becomes in their estimation so great a trespass, that it ought not to be forgiven.

Bro. A. feels that Bro. B. has injured him in some way. So, instead of going to Bro. B. with the spirit of Jesus in his heart, and telling him about it to his face, so that Bro. B. can be "gained," and confess and humbly ask forgiveness, he goes to Sr. C., and tells how B. has misused him, and they talk it over, and bring up every failing of B.'s, and talk about him until A. gets such a feeling in his heart that if, after the matter has gone through the church, and B. hears that A. has something against him, and goes to him to find out what the matter is, B. can get no satisfaction whatever, and turns away and leaves him to let the fire burn, until many became "defiled" by the "root of bitterness," that has been nourished so long. This is the order of the day. O how long will it be till christians will "cease to do evil and learn to do well." If, when A. felt that B. had trespassed against him, he had obeyed Jesus, and gone and told him of his fault alone, in the spirit of Jesus, B.'s heart would have been touched, and he would most heartily have exclaimed, I am very, very sorry, and hope you will forgive me, and there the matter would have ended. O how much better are the ways of Jesus than man's ways.

My dear brethren and sisters, cultivate that forgiving spirit, so that "if thy brother trespass against thee" "seven times in a day, and seven times in a day turn again unto thee, saying, I repent," you can freely "forgive him." We are yet in an enemy's land. We are frail. We are all liable to trespass. We must have the forgiving spirit of Jesus, or we are "none of his." Think of the "wicked servant" that would not forgive. Jesus says, "So likewise shall my heavenly Father do unto you, if ye from your hearts forgive not every one his brother his trespasses." When you think that some brother or sister has trespassed against you in any way, go to him alone with it, and not to some one else.

I believe that ninety-nine out of every hundred roots of bitterness, that are allowed to spring up and grow, would be avoided and "nipped in the bud," if men would only obey Jesus. Dear brethren and sisters, will we do it? God help us so to live that we may show to the world that we believe with all our heart that Jesus is very soon coming, and we expect to be saved, because we have his Spirit.

For the World's Crisis.

DOES THE LITTLE HORN SYMBOLIZE THE GREEK EMPIRE?

What power is symbolized by the little horn of the 7th chapter of Daniel's prophecy? There is no possible escape from the conclusion that it symbolizes Papacy in its civil and ecclesiastical forms. To claim that it simply symbolizes the Greek Empire, is rashly absurd. That the Greek Empire was an ingredient of the civil element of the horn, is the most that can be claimed with truthfulness. The ecclesiastical element was predominant, as will be seen by analyzing the prophecy, and the civil element was subservient; hence the fallacy of the claim that only the Greek Empire was symbolized by the horn, because it is used as an agent in doing a part of the work assigned to the horn (the plucking up), while it was an ingredient of the horn.—These civil ingredients of the horn were vacillating, one passing away and another filling its place, which was true in the history of the Greek Empire; while the ecclesiastical element was substantial and unfailing. Let it be remembered that the ecclesiastical element "reigneth over the kings of the earth" (Rev. 17: 18), and therefore they have yielded obedience thereto, and thus helped do the work ascribed to it.

Let us look at several features of the prophecy, and see whether they will apply as well to the Greek Empire as to Papacy in its civil and ecclesiastical forms combined.

1st. "He shall subdue three kings," or pluck up three of the ten horns. The Greek Empire, at the time, being the predominant ingredient of the civil element of the Papacy, engaged in this work, as a component part of the horn; and if this were all the work to be done by the horn, there might be a show of plausibility in the claim that the Greek Empire was the horn, instead of being a mere component ingredient—the civil element interwoven with the ecclesiastical.

2d. This horn was to make war with the saints, and they were to be given into his hands for a "time, times, and the dividing of time," or 1260 years; which is not true of the Greek Empire. As an ingredient of this horn—the predominant civil element, for the time being—the Greek Empire helped do this work of butchery for a while (as did other civil powers), but it did not continue to do so for 1260 years, while the horn did. This fact alone is fatal to this theory.

3d. This horn was to prevail till the Ancient of Days should come, while the Greek Empire was subjugated by the Ottomans, or Turks, A. D. 1453, and has remained under Mohammedan rule ever since. This grand fact is utterly subversive of the claim that the Greek Empire was ever the little horn. But Papacy fills the prophetic picture; Papacy in its ecclesiastical form taking the lead, and using Papacy in its civil form as an appendage, the Greek Empire being for a while a prominent part of the civil element, and helping do the work assigned to the little horn. Thus it is clear that this little horn is the Papal horn, synchronizing with the Papal "abomination that maketh desolate," which was "set up" when arms stood on the part of the "man of sin" (Dan. 11: 35), A. D. 533, and from this epoch 1335 days measure to the resurrection. Thus the statement that it makes no difference when the "little horn" arose, falls to the ground. It does make a difference, for this papal horn, and the papal "abomination that maketh desolate," ARE THE SAME; therefore the 1335 days do begin with the rise of this horn; and its rise was prior to 534.

EXPERIMENTAL RELIGION.

The religion of Jesus Christ is the only experimental religion that has ever been made known to fallen man. There are, indeed, many other religions, but of none of them can it be said that the greatest proof of their superiority can be found in so immediate and happy a change of heart as in nearly every instance characterizes the conversion of souls to Christ. Spiritualism may boast of its wonderful progress in the exploration of the "spheres," but we defy its champions, one and all, to name a single instance where its "converts" have experienced the happiness edjoyed by those favored with the baptism of the Holy Ghost.

Yes, here is the test, "A tree is known by its fruits." Man's greatest good is joy and peace of soul; and is it time that the gospel tree bears this variety of fruit? Have you ever read the history of experimental religion? You certainly have, if you have read of Pentecost; and its triumphs you have seen if you have attended a Whitefieldian campmeeting.

But "modern experimental religion" has its enemies, even in the house of its friends. Before me lies a pamphlet containing a lecture on the subject, in which the author is pleased to even denounce and ridicule the means and manner of the outpouring of the Spirit, as witnessed in the revivals of our day; and worst of all, this man is a professed follower of Christ, and one of those looking for the speedy advent of Omega. Is it possible that such men have never read the language of the Savior on the sin of speaking against the Holy Spirit?

But what do these men propose to give us in exchange for the religion thus repudiated? Do they worship another God? Have they found another Savior? another Spirit? Do they proclaim to the sinful-hearted world, "Ye must be born again?" Do they repeat the promise made by God to every repentant child of Adam, "I will pour out my Spirit unto you?" In short, on what do they insist as essential to the salvation of the soul?

The pamphlet above referred to informs us, first, that we must believe the future possession and home of the redeemed and glorified is to consist of a portion of the Sultan's dominions, being situated at the east of the Mediterranean Sea, a country called Syria, or Palestine, the land of the Hebrews. In this belief we are to be "immersed," thereafter to be outwardly moral; these three things to constitute a fitness for "an abundant entrance into the everlasting kingdom!"

But, ye friends of the experimental religion taught by Jesus, by Peter, and by Paul, do we yet find any thing to equal "the everlasting gospel?"—even that very same gospel promulgated and confirmed by our Lord for eighteen centuries? Can we yet conclude the whole gospel church in fanatical foolishness? Does it not seem proper that this religion, which has successfully stood all the tests made from Pentecost till now, should at least be made the subject of experiment by those who fain would build upon the Foundation with materials of human invention? Oh! when will men become humble enough to "let God be true?" "Thou had made man upright, but they have sought out many inventions."

Isa. 41: 17, 18. How readest thou?—"When the poor and needy seek water, and there is none, and their tongue faileth for thirst, I the Lord will hear them, I the God of Israel will not forsake them. I will open rivers in high places, and fountains in the midst of the valleys: I will make the wilderness a pool of water, and the dry land springs of water." Who has not read of the miraculous spring at Andersonville; and who has not read of modern outpourings of the water of life as promised in the last paragraph of the Bible, and as witnessed under the preaching of the apostles and evangelists of later times?

We conclude, then, that "experimental religion" still lives, and is worthy the experiments of all sincere lovers of their own souls. Prov. 19: 8. And I venture the prophecy that the "righteousness, peace and joy," which is "in the Holy Ghost," the "unsearchable riches of Christ" on man bestowed,—the summum bonum of christianity, will be still proclaimed and still "received into good and honest hearts," until He of whom it is said, "Behold he cometh with clouds," shall, by his glorious presence, disrobe his followers of the spirit of intolerance and dogmatic love of theory, and bring a startled world to wonder that they had so long resisted the experimental religion of Him before whom they shall stand in judgment. DAY OF THE FIRST FRUIT OFFERING.

"And the Lord spake unto Moses, saying, Speak unto the children of Israel, and say unto them, When ye be come into the land which I give unto you, and shall reap the harvest thereof, then shall ye bring a sheaf of the first-fruits of your harvest unto the priest; and he shall wave the sheaf before the Lord to be accepted for you: on the morrow after the Sabbath the priest shall wave it. . . And ye shall eat neither bread, nor parched corn, nor green ears, until the self-same day that ye have brought an offering unto your God."—LEV. 23: 9, 14.

Some have thought that the Sabbath referred to in the above quotation, was the seventh day Sabbath, notwithstanding the testimony of Josephus, that this offering was made on the sixteenth of the first month, clearly implying that the Sabbath referred to was the fifteenth day of the first month. According to verses fifteen and sixteen, they were required to count from the day when they brought the wave sheaf, "seven Sabbaths complete; even unto the morrow after the seventh Sabbath, shall ye number fifty days." Here it may be claimed that there are no seven Sabbaths complete, making fifty days unto the morrow after the seventh day Sabbath. But it should be known that the word Sabbath was used to denote a week, and that in accordance therewith the Septuagint reads, "seven sevens," instead of seven Sabbaths.

The week is not a natural, but an artificial division of time, to keep in memory the fact that God created heaven and earth in six days, and rested the seventh, which was the Sabbath. This Sabbath, therefore, implied a period of seven days, and so was sometimes used to denote a period of seven days. For every week, whether reckoned from the first day after the seventh, or from any other day, included a seventh day Sabbath, and so the week came to be represented by the principal day that made this artificial division of time by sevens. Hence, "seven Sabbaths complete" would not denote seven weeks ending with the seventh day Sabbath, unless they were appointed to begin with the first day of the week; of which there is no evidence. For Josephus, who was fully acquainted with the Jewish customs, declares that "the offering" was made on the sixteenth day of the first month (Ant. Book 3, chap. 10, sec. 5); and since this was the point from which the seven weeks were to be reckoned, it is clear that they would have to be reckoned from whatever day of the week the sixteenth happened to fall, except it fell on the seventh day. For in this case, the fifteenth being a Sabbath, followed by the seventh day, there would be a Sabbath of two days duration, and so "the morrow after the Sabbath" would not come till the seventeenth day of the month, and first day of the regular week.

According to the quotation at the head of this article, the offering of the first fruits was to be made before the harvest was fully ripe, for they were not to eat "green ears" until the self-same day that they offered the sheaf of first fruits; which, had it been after the harvest was wholly ripe, would have prevented them from ever eating thereof in its green state. And since their first month, "Abib," signifies the month of green ears, the offering of the sheaf of first fruits must have taken place in this first month, since it was to be in that month, or moon, when their grain could be eaten in its green state. And as it was to be offered "on the morrow after the Sabbath," some particular Sabbath, peculiar to this month, must be referred to. It could not, however, relate to any of the seventh day Sabbaths, for that would make it uncertain whether the offering was to be made at the beginning, middle, or end of the first month.

Some Sabbaths, specially referred to in the connection, must therefore be understood to relieve the command of absolute indefiniteness. Such a Sabbath was the fifteenth day of the first month, specially referred to in the connection in verses six and seven. That was worthy to be called "the Sabbath," in distinction from every other Sabbath of that month, being the great anniversary day of their deliverance from Egyptian bondage, and a day wherein no servile work was to be done.

Had our Savior been crucified on the fourteenth day of the first month, and on a Thursday, this great Sabbath day would have followed the next day; and that being succeeded by Saturday, the seventh day Sabbath, the offering of the first fruits would have come on the first day of the week; because the Sabbath, in that case, continued throughout both days. Hence Christ, our Passover, was sacrificed for us, at the time indicated by the type, and Christ, the first fruits, arose from the dead on the morrow after the Sabbath.

TEMPORAL TND SPIRITUAL FOOD.

If we would be found in harmony with the saints, enjoy their faith, and serve God with a pure heart, we must "eat that which is good,"—spiritual and heavenly food; it will enliven, cherish and animate the soul, and consequently lead us to the realms of glory. Eat that which is good. This is the declaration and admonition of Holy Writ. It is spoken in reference to the selection of moral food;—food for the mind, support for the spiritual man. The mind needs good food as well as the body. And he who takes care to provide for the outward, and neglects the inward man, abuses the best part of himself, fails of justly understanding the dignity, capacities and wants of his nature, and consequently fails of happiness. Thus many do. Hence the world is filled with complaint. Man feeds his body, yet starves his mind; supplies the animal and neglects the spiritual. He crawls on the earth when he should aspire to heaven. Debasement and degeneration consequently rule the day, and the image of God is shrouded in the depravity of man.

Instead of going to the fountain of living waters, "man hews out to himself cisterns, broken cisterns, that can hold no water." Instead of eating the bread of life, he eats the bread of death. He is miserable. A sensual, gluttonous appetite cannot satisfy the mind, else would sensuality be happiness, and animal indulgence harmony and peace. Thus man appeared to the Prophet when he wrote the following words: Eat that which is good. Man's soul was unfed, or, if otherwise, fed only with the husks of error and worldly dissipation. Alas! that it should be so now, that many hunger when there is bread enough and to spare; that many thirst when there are heavenly waters enough to satisfy the soul.

Eat that which is good, delight your soul in fatness. This admonition holds as good in this day as it did in the days of the prophet. When will this admonition be heeded? Not until we learn that there are two kinds of food in the world,—truth and error. The first is life, the last death, to the mind. These two kinds of food are better known by their tastes than by their names; for in relation to spiritual food names have been strangely misapplied. Infidelity has been called philosophy; sin, pleasure, and a partial salvation the doctrine of Christ. At this table, men have fed and turned away unsatisfied, and hunger still. It is not that feast of fat things prepared before the face of all people. He that eats most at this temporal table hungers most. No one ever left it satisfied. Not so with the feast of divine truth. That satisfies; it fills the mind with good, it strengthens the inward man,—it feeds the soul with joy divine.

How beautiful is the simplicity of God's truth. May God speed the day when all his dear children shall be brought into the knowledge of the truth, to entertain right views of God's character, just views of his goodness, and a proper understanding of his will concerning them. Then will sin and all its attendant evils be banished from the world, and righteousness, joy and peace fill the whole earth. Let us ponder well these serious things, and act as duty shall call. Let us be true to God, to ourselves; true to our faith, and true to our fellowmen, and a rich blessing will rest upon us.

As the dew from heaven nourishes the earth and causeth vegetation to spring forth in brightness and beauty, so doth spiritual food nourish the soul of man.

"Eternal Wisdom has prepared
A soul-reviving feast,
And bids your longing appetites
The rich provision taste."

BOSANQUET'S CHRONOLOGY.

Bosanquet, in his valuable work on Chronology, by reference to the recent discoveries among the ruins of Nineveh, and the authority of the most ancient historians, has proved the incorrectness of the received Chronology.

In his Introduction, he says: "It has pleased the Almighty in these latter days to reveal to us historical truths, which have been hidden for more than two thousand years. . . Within the last year, a most important addition to our knowledge of Assyrian history has been made by Colonel Rawlinson, who has deciphered the annals of Sennacherib, king of Assyrian, from the marbles of Nineveh." But as those who are interested in the subject of chronology would prefer seeing the work itself, instead of making large quotations from it, we shall here only give the result of his investigation, and, for the convenience of the reader, we will give a table of the most essential points in his chronology, compared with Bishop Usher's chronology and mine.

Bishop Usher's chronology is the one generally received; and the dates, as given in the margin of your Bibles, are according to his, which are based alone upon the authority of Ptolemy's Canon. Bosanquet also considers Ptolemy's Canon reliable from the beginning down as far as the reign of Nabopalassar; and I am of the same opinion; so thus far we are all agreed as to that, although we differ as to the time of the reign of the kings of Israel, as seen from the following table:—

A table exhibiting and comparing the Chronology of Bishop Usher, Bosanquet and Thurman.

Usher.	Bosanquet.	Thurman.
B. C.	B. C.	B. C.
1012	990	983	The 4th year of Solomon.
721	695	681	The 6th year of Hezekiah.
713	688	674	The 14th year of Hezekiah.
588	560	547	The 11th year of Zedekiah.
538	493	491	The first scriptural year of Darius.
536	523	489	The first scriptural year of Cyrus.
4	3	4	The birth of Christ.

It will be seen from the foregoing table that I am agreed with the received chronology as to the time of the birth of Christ, while Bosanquet is at variance in every date; yet, by correcting a few errors into which he has fallen, his chronology will be the same with mine, as I intend to show; but Bishop Usher's being based alone upon Ptolemy's Canon, cannot be reconciled, either with the Bible, Bosanquet's chronology, nor mine.

1. It will be observed that Bosanquet gives just seven years more for the time of the fourth of Solomon than I have; and that he is just seven years in error here we have proved by the eclipse of Amos, which is found to have occurred B. C. 755. (See page 75 of the Book of Daniel Opened.)

2. For the sixth of Hezekiah, Bosanquet gives just fourteen years more than I have. His authority is Demetrius, a learned Jew, living about two hundred years before the christian era. His words are thus given by Clemens:—"Demetrius says in his work concerning the kings of Judea, that the tribes of Benjamin and Levi were not carried into captivity by Senacherim; but that from this captivity to the last captivity from Jerusalem by Nebuchadnezzar, was a period of a hundred and twenty-eight years and six months. And that from the time when the ten tribes were made captive from Samaria (i. e. in the reign of Shalmanezer) to the reign of the fourth Ptolemy (Philopater) was four hundred* and seventy-three years and nine months. And from the carrying away from Jerusalem, three hundred and thirty-eight years and three months.†

Bosanquet has well asked, "Whose authority could be better" than that of this Demetrius? for I suppose that, outside of the Bible, better authority cannot be found. But the point to which I wish to call the attention of the reader is, that Bosanquet, failing to notice the express language of Demetrius, has fallen into an error of fourteen years. In the first place, he is in error one year as to the beginning of "the reign of the fourth Ptolemy." He places it in B. C. 221. But Josephus gives us B. C. 220 as the time of the beginning of his reign; for he informs us that the second Ptolemy reigned thirty nine years; and since Demetrius was also a Jew, it is more reasonable to suppose that they both used the same date. But supposition is not enough; we must prove it; which may be done by the three odd months given by Demetrius; for it is said that the reign of each of the Egyptian kings is to be reckoned from the beginning of the Egyptian first month; and since it is well known that the captivity commenced on the tenth day of the fifth month, these three odd months give the tenth day of the eighth month for the beginning of the reign to which Demetrius had reference; and in B. C. 220, the beginning of the Egyptian year did fall on the tenth day of the Jewish eighth month. But in B. C. 221, the beginning of the Egyptian year fell on the twenty-ninth day of the Jewish seventh month. This would give the twenty-ninth day of the fourth month for the beginning of the captivity, on which day no one places it.

Having then proved that the dates used by Demetrius are to be reckoned from the tenth day of the eighth month, B. C. 220, we are now ready to examine the matter. Demetrius' words are as follows:—"From the time when the ten tribes were made captive from Samaria (i. e., in the reign of Shalmanezer), to the reign of the fourth Ptolemy (Philopater), was four hundred and seventy-three years and nine months"; which placed against the beginning of the reign of Ptolemy, in B. C. 220, gives the tenth day of the eleventh month, B. C. 694, for the beginning of the captivity of the Gentiles. This is within one year of the time given by Bosanquet, which he gives as the sixth year of Hezekiah; and it is true that with the sixth year of Hezekiah, the desolation and everlasting ruin of the ten tribes is to be dated (2 Kings 18: 10); but

THE RESURRECTION.

"A seed found in the hand of a mummy two thousand years old, when planted, bloomed into a beautiful flower."

Two thousand years ago, a flower
 Bloomed brightly in a far-off land;
Two thousand years ago, its seed
 Was placed within a dead man's hand.

Before the Savior came to earth,
 That man had lived and loved and died;
And even in that far-off time
 The flower had spread its perfume wide.

Suns rose and set, years came and went,
 The dead hand kept its treasure well;
Nations were born and turned to dust,
 While life was hidden in that shell.

The shrivelled hand is robbed at last,
 The seed is buried in the earth;
When lo, the life long hidden there,
 Into a glorious flower bursts forth.

Just such a plant as that which grew
 From such a seed when buried low;
Just such a flower in Egypt bloomed
 And died two thousand years ago.

And will not He who watched the seed,
 And kept the life within the shell,
When those he loves are laid to rest,
 Watch o'er their buried dust as well?

And will he not from 'neath the sod
 Cause something glorious to arise?
Aye, though it sleep two thousand years,
 Yet all that buried dust shall rise.

Just such a face as greets you now,
 Just such a form as here we wear,
Only more glorious far, will rise
 To meet the Savior in the air.

Then will I lay me down in peace,
 When called to leave this vale of tears,
For "in my flesh I shall see God,"
 E'en though I sleep two thousand years.

THOUGHTS ON PROPHECY.

THE FRENCH EXPOSITION.

Editor World's Crisis:—

Dear Brother,—In agreement with the inspired intimation that a coming potentate shall "by his policy cause craft to prosper in his hand, and by peace shall destroy many," it may not be untimely to scrutinize the import of the approaching grand convocation of the nations through their representatives at the Paris Exposition. It is no rash or idle affirmation, to say that in the number of invited and represented nationalities, in the eagerness of competition, and in the magnificence of the display, this great assemblage of the various products of industrial art, and modern human enterprise and invention, will be far beyond all precedent. It will be interesting in this connection, to refer to some features in the recent report of a committee of the New York Chamber of Commerce.

In answer to the suggested impolicy of contributing to enhance the splendor and vastness of this exhibition on the part of the United States, occurs the following:—

"The committee regret to be obliged to notice an opinion somewhat earnestly expressed, that it is not expedient or proper for the United States in any way to encourage or sanction the proposed Exposition at Paris, for the alleged reason that its real object is to aggrandize a sovereign, whose Mexican policy has seriously offended the American people. Your committee cannot perceive the force or propriety of this object. Among the various independent nations, at least thirty in number, who will meet in the coming 'concours,' it would be strange indeed, if no political differences should exist between any two of them. It surely is enough to say that the government of the United States has formally and deliberately accepted the invitation of the government of France, and in the face of the world has agreed to be present. It surely is not impossible that long before the opening of the Exposition, the subject of Mexico may cease to agitate either nation."

Notwithstanding the apparent propriety of illustrating American achievement on such an attractive and imposing arena, there are some who heartily believe that the tendency, the intention and the result of this gigantic Napoleonic device, will be the "aggrandizement" of its imperial originator. It appears that this exposition "was established by an imperial decree of Napoleon III., in Feb., 1865, and is to last for seven months from the 1st of April, 1867." The interval, therefore, yet to elapse before the completion of all the arrangements designed to ensure the success and perfect the conception of this enterprise, will give an idea of its intended magnificence. We quote:—

"We must not forget that the proposed exhibition, officially denominated the 'Exposition Universelle,' is expressly intended for the products, not of any particular nation or continent, but of the whole world, whether civilized or savage. The Imperial Commission has allotted separate compartments, not alone to the Christian governments of Europe and America, but also to the Mahometan and Pagan nations of Turkey, Persia, and Central Asia, Africa and Oceanica. Ample space is also provided for displaying different races of savages at work in their rude industry.

The diagram of the 'Palace' and its interior divisions shows it to be a building of elliptical form, about 1,610 feet long and 1,245 feet broad, covering an area of about 35 acres, in the centre of the 'Champ de Mars,' a spacious open square or 'Park' of about 150 acres. In the centre of the Palace is an open interior court or garden, about 533 feet long and 184 feet broad. The Palace covers an elliptical ring around this interior garden of about 490 feet in breadth, with a total area of 143,848 square metres, very nearly equal, at 10½ square feet to the metre, to 1,510,000 square feet.

The elliptical building is subdivided by three concentric passage-ways into seven separate galleries, each about fifty feet broad, which was respectively allotted to the first seven grand divisions or 'groups' of objects to be exhibited. By a single walk around either of the galleries, the visitor may successfully review and compare the products of the respective nations, of the particular character embraced in the 'group.' There are ten 'groups' in all, of which three will be outside of the palace, in the 'Park' adjacent, principally embracing living products of agriculture, and horticulture, with several objects of miscellaneous character."

The total area within the palace is divided among the different nations in the following proportions:—

TO EUROPEAN NATIONS.	Square Metres.
France	64,056
Great Britain and dependencies	23,003
Prussia	7,628
Austria	7,528
Other German States	7,528
Belgium	7,249
Italy	3,888
Russia	2,916
Switzerland	2,416
Sweden and Norway	2,091
Spain	1,944
Portugal	1,134
Denmark	650
Greece	648
Roumania	648
Papal States	300

TO AMERICAN NATIONS.	Square Metres.
To the United States	2,788
Brazil	972
Mexico and Central America	648
South American States	810

TO MOHAMMEDAN AND PAGAN NATIONS.	Square Metres.
To Turkey	1,296
Persia and Central Asia	648
China, Japan and Southern Asia	810
African and Oceanica	810

"It thus appears that the proportion of space allotted to the United States is 0 020, or one-fiftieth part of the whole, being 2,788 square metres, about 29,234 square feet. From this must be deducted the necessary spaces for the open passage-ways running through it, leaving an available space remaining of only 15,824 square feet, not quite equal to the area of seven ordinary building lots in New York. It forms a narrow wedged figure, about 450 feet long and 100 feet broad at the exterior line of the palace, converging to a front of about 11 feet on the interior garden It is subdivided as follows:

For group No. 1, 'works of art,' 665 square feet, (with 1,296 feet of wall room for pictures.)
For group No. 2, materials for liberal arts	1,830 feet
For group No. 3, furniture, etc.	1,082 feet
For group No. 4, garments, etc.	2,467 feet
For group No. 5, products, etc	3,880 feet
For group No. 6, machines, etc.	5,610 feet
For group No 7, food	1,190 feet
Total	16,824 feet

It must be apparent at once that these spaces will not suffice to adequately exhibit the products of the United States, and that it will be indispensably necessary for our government to erect a supplemental building.

The applications for space already made to Mr. Derby, the agent of the United States at New York, far more than fill the whole of the space above described. The government of Belgium already finds the space allotted to her quite insufficient, although nearly three times that of the United States, and is to erect a supplemental building in the Park.

The government of France assumes the whole expense of erecting the spacious building for the exposition, called 'The Palace,' estimated at 20,000,000 of francs, but are to receive the proceeds of the tickets of admission, estimated at 8,000,000 of francs, leaving a clear expenditure of 12,600,000 of francs, about $2,400,000, which will, however, be practically reimbursed to France, at least in a measure, by the general expenditure at the concourse in Paris."

We have thus presented before us some hints, from which to derive a conception of the vastness of the design in this rightly named "Exposition Universelle." Every nation, kingdom, and tribe under heaven is solicited to participate in this great festivity of art. Not alone into every part of Christendom, but into the vast interior of heathen countries, has the Gælic message of invitation penetrated. Not a latitude nor a continent is forgotten. Neither the burning tropics, nor the frozen poles, are passed by. Not even the islands of the sea, not the meanest, nor remotest, nor obscurest organized community of human beings, neither despotisms nor republics, are overlooked. Protestant and Catholic, Brahmin and Mohammedan, European, African, and Indian, are summoned to send tribute of their most cunning workmanship, and the strangest and most varied productions of nature, to enhance the magnitude and the miracle of this jubilee of seven months of seeing and wondering. Every most experienced faculty and most adroit art of description, will be tasked to report through every territory and community of the habitable globe, the splendor and extent of this mighty aggregate of wonders. Thus will the Cæsar of the nineteenth century be aggrandized. Thus will the way be prepared for the subtlest and most dangerous of all monarchs of all ages to attain the coveted supremacy in influence and power.

There is certainly something significant in the term of duration allotted to this exhibition. In Daniel it is said, "the prince shall make a covenant with many for one week." And we have here at least a week of months specified, during which the nations of all the earth may be said to be covenanted with the foremost European sovereign in this great conception and enterprise. If this does not really fulfill the prophecy, it would certainly seem to be a shadow immediately going before the fulfillment:

A lady in Philadelphia, deeply interested in observing the prophetic developments of these most significant times, recently wrote me in reference to this subject. She says: "There are some very interesting letters from a converted priest in Germany, published in the "Israelite Indeed," which represent that the covenant between Napoleon and the Jews is about to be made, and the information seems to be well authenticated. There are frequent items of news, all tending in the same direction."

Before concluding, we may barely refer to a single other fact mentioned in this report. It is this. "In such a study, America might well seek to learn the processes of statesmanship by which the reigning sovereign of France has been enabled, in twelve short years, to double the assessed money value of his empire, raising it from 124,000 millions of francs in 1852, to 249,000 millions of francs in 1864." When has such astonishing increase ever occurred in history before? This looks like the financiering of the willful king, "who shall have power over the treasures of gold and silver."

Let no one be misled by the apparently pacific language of the Emperor's January speech, in reference to Mexico. Though seeming to imply concessions to the United States, and hinting at a return of the French army to Europe, the stability of the new empire of Maximilian must be guaranteed. This is a sine qua non. Nor indeed does the language employed give the slightest intimation of an immediate recall. The period of withdrawal may be indefinitely postponed or protracted. The imperial policy is undoubtedly indeed pacific, but it is aggressive, ambitious, and persistent. It contemplates no retractions, and scruple nothing (at the opportune time) about a war, in which its interest and predominance will be promoted. Momentous days are these! Period most emphatically critical! Exigency full of peril! C. COLEGROVE.

For the World's Crisis.

FOUR HUNDRED AND NINETY TIMES:

OR, THE WAY OF JESUS THE BEST WAY YET.

In this age of improvements (so called), when all the ways of Jesus are altered over, and every branch of the "doctrine of Christ" changed or improved so as to suit the world, and the demands of cold-hearted professors, and the old mode of a future life by "the resurrection of the dead," is out of fashion, and men must improve on it so as to have a "shorter cut," or to "climb up some other way," and slip off to heaven when they die; in such an age as this, no wonder that they hate to hear "sound doctrine," or any thing on "time," or "times," or "time, times and a half." Well it is not my purpose now to write any thing on the time of Jesus' coming to take to himself his great power and reign, but to write something about the conversation Jesus had with his followers, when he was giving them to "understand the mysteries of the kingdom of heaven." It is about forgiveness that I wish to write a few lines, coming right from the heart, and praying that it may reach the heart of some.

I know we are in a time when it don't take much to make a fuss, whereby families are divided, churches are torn to pieces, and societies are set to quarreling. Jesus knew how things would be, and tried to instruct his followers so that they might be at peace among themselves, and great is that peace when people "take heed" to Jesus's words. Jesus had been teaching them what to do if a brother trespassed against them; but Peter was hardly satisfied, and wanted to know, "How oft shall my brother trespass against me and I forgive him? till seven times? Jesus saith unto him, I say not unto thee until seven times; but until seventy times seven," or four hundred and ninety times. Think of this, you that can't forgive one trespass of a brother. Well, the response may be how can I forgive my brother if he don't come and ask my forgiveness? How? by doing just as Jesus says in Matt. 18: 15. "If thy brother trespass against thee, go and tell him his fault between him and thee alone: if he shall hear thee, thou hast gained thy brother. But if he will not hear thee, then take with thee one or two more, that in the mouth of two or three witnesses every word may be established." I verily believe if the above instruction was carried out, we should see peace restored where now we see "hatred" and "variance." How is it? "If thy brother (or sister) trespass against thee, go and tell him his fault between him and thee alone." O how few are willing to do that. When one feels that a brother has trespassed against him, instead of obeying the Lord, they follow the "old man," and go and tell some brother or sister, and try to gain their sympathy, and talk it over until it increases and becomes in their estimation so great a trespass, that it ought not to be forgiven.

Bro. A. feels that Bro. B. has injured him in some way. So, instead of going to Bro. B. with the spirit of Jesus in his heart, and telling him about it to his face, so that Bro. B. can be "gained," and confess and humbly ask forgiveness, he goes to Sr. C., and tells how B. has misused him, and they talk it over, and bring up every failing of B.'s, and talk about him until A. gets such a feeling in his heart that if, after the matter has gone through the church, and B. hears that A. has something against him, and goes to him to find out what the matter is, B. can get no satisfaction whatever, and turns away and leaves him to let the fire burn, until many became "defiled" by the "root of bitterness," that has been nourished so long. This is the order of the day. O how long will it be till christians will "cease to do evil and learn to do well." If, when A. felt that B. had trespassed against him, he had obeyed Jesus, and gone and told him of his fault alone, in the spirit of Jesus, B.'s heart would have been touched, and he would most heartily have exclaimed, I am very, very sorry, and hope you will forgive me, and there the matter would have ended. O how much better are the ways of Jesus than man's ways.

My dear brethren and sisters, cultivate that forgiving spirit, so that "if thy brother trespass against thee" "seven times in a day, and seven times in a day turn again unto thee, saying unto thee, I repent," you can freely "forgive him." We are yet in an enemy's land. We are frail. We are all liable to trespass. We must have the forgiving spirit of Jesus, or we are "none of his." Think of the "wicked servant" that would not forgive. Jesus says, "So likewise shall my heavenly Father do unto you, if ye from your hearts forgive not every one his brother his trespasses." When you think that some brother or sister has trespassed against you in any way, go to him alone with it, and not to some one else.

I believe that ninety-nine out of every hundred roots of bitterness, that are allowed to spring up and grow, would be avoided and "nipped in the bud," if men would only obey Jesus. Dear brethren and sisters, will we do it? God help us so to live that we may show to the world that we believe with all our heart that Jesus is very soon coming, and we expect to be saved, because we have his Spirit.

DOES THE LITTLE HORN SYMBOLIZE THE GREEK EMPIRE?

What power is symbolized by the little horn of the 7th chapter of Daniel's prophecy? There is no possible escape from the conclusion that it symbolizes Papacy in its civil and ecclesiastical forms. To claim that it simply symbolizes the Greek Empire, is rashly absurd. That the Greek Empire was an ingredient of the civil element of the horn, is the most that can be claimed with truthfulness. The ecclesiastical element was predominant, as will be seen by analyzing the prophecy, and the civil element was subservient; hence the fallacy of the claim that only the Greek Empire was symbolized by the horn, because it is used as an agent in doing a part of the work assigned to the horn (the plucking up), while it was an ingredient of the horn.—These civil ingredients of the horn were vacillating, one passing away and another filling its place, which was true in the history of the Greek Empire; while the ecclesiastical element was substantial and unfailing. Let it be remembered that the ecclesiastical element "reigneth over the kings of the earth" (Rev 17: 18), and therefore they have yielded obedience thereto, and thus helped do the work ascribed to it.

Let us look at several features of the prophecy, and see whether they will apply as well to the Greek Empire as to Papacy in its civil and ecclesiastical forms combined.

1st. "He shall subdue three kings," or pluck up three of the ten horns. The Greek Empire, at the time, being the predominant ingredient of the civil element of the Papacy, engaged in this work, as a component part of the horn; and if this were all the work to be done by the horn, there might be a show of plausibility in the claim that the Greek Empire was the horn, instead of being a mere component ingredient—the civil element interwoven with the ecclesiastical.

2d. This horn was to make war with the saints, and they were to be given into his hands for a "time, times, and the dividing of time," or 1260 years; which is not true of the Greek Empire. As an ingredient of this horn—the predominant civil element, for the time being—the Greek Empire helped do this work of butchery for a while (as did other civil powers), but it did not continue to do so for 1260 years, while the horn did. This fact alone is fatal to this theory.

3d. This horn was to prevail till the Ancient of Days should come, while the Greek Empire was subjugated by the Ottomans, or Turks, A D. 1453, and has remained under Mohammedan rule ever since. This grand fact is utterly subversive of the claim that the Greek Empire was ever the little horn. But Papacy fills the prophetic picture; Papacy in its ecclesiastical form taking the lead, and using Papacy in its civil form as an appendage, the Greek Empire being for a while a prominent part of the civil element, and helping do the work assigned to the little horn. Thus it is clear that this little horn is the Papal horn, synchronizing with the Papal "abomination that maketh desolate," which was "set up" when arms stood on the part of the "man of sin" (Dan. 11: 35), A. D. 533, and from this epoch 1335 days measure to the resurrection. Thus the statement that it makes no difference when the "little horn" arose, falls to the ground. It does make a difference, for this papal horn, and the papal "abomination that maketh desolate," ARE THE SAME; therefore the 1335 days do begin with the rise of this horn; and its rise was prior to 534.

EXPERIMENTAL RELIGION.

The religion of Jesus Christ is the only experimental religion that has ever been made known to fallen man. There are, indeed, many other religions, but of none of them can it be said that the greatest proof of their superiority can be found in so immediate and happy a change of heart as in nearly every instance characterizes the conversion of souls to Christ. Spiritualism may boast of its wonderful progress in the exploration of the "spheres," but we defy its champions, one and all, to name a single instance where its "converts" have experienced the happiness edjoyed by those favored with the baptism of the Holy Ghost.

Yes, here is the test, "A tree is known by its fruits." Man's greatest good is joy and peace of soul; and is it time that the gospel tree bears this variety of fruit? Have you ever read the history of experimental religion? You certainly have, if you have read of Pentecost; and its triumphs you have seen if you have attended a Whitefieldian campmeeting.

But "modern experimental religion" has its enemies, even in the house of its friends. Before me lies a pamphlet containing a lecture on the subject, in which the author is pleased to even denounce and ridicule the means and manner of the outpouring of the Spirit, as witnessed in the revivals of our day; and worst of all, this man is a professed follower of Christ, and one of those looking for the speedy advent of Omega. Is it possible that such men have never read the language of the Savior on the sin of speaking against the Holy Spirit?

But what do these men propose to give us in exchange for the religion thus repudiated? Do they worship another God? Have they found another Savior? another Spirit? Do they proclaim to the sinful-hearted world, "Ye must be born again?" Do they repeat the promise made by God to every repentant child of Adam, "I will pour out my Spirit unto you?" In short, on what do they insist as essential to the salvation of the soul?

The pamphlet above referred to informs us, first, that we must believe the future possession and home of the redeemed and glorified is to consist of a portion of the Sultan's dominions, being situated at the east of the Mediterranean Sea, a country called Syria, or Palestine, the land of the Hebrews. In this belief we are to be "immersed," thereafter to be outwardly moral; these three things to constitute a fitness for "an abundant entrance into the everlasting kingdom!"

But, ye friends of the experimental religion taught by Jesus, by Peter, and by Paul, do we yet find any thing to equal "the everlasting gospel?"—even that very same gospel promulgated and confirmed by our Lord for eighteen centuries? Can we yet conclude the whole gospel church in fanatical foolishness? Does it not seem proper that this religion, which has successfully stood all the tests made from Pentecost till now, should at least be made the subject of experiment by those who fain would build upon the Foundation with materials of human invention? Oh! when will men become humble enough to "let God be true?" "Thou had made man upright, but they have sought out many inventions."

Isa. 41: 17, 18 How readest thou?—"When the poor and needy seek water, and there is none, and their tongue faileth for thirst, I the Lord will hear them, I the God of Israel will not forsake them. I will open rivers in high places, and fountains in the midst of the valleys: I will make the wilderness a pool of water, and the dry land springs of water." Who has not read of the miraculous spring at Andersonville; and who has not read of modern outpourings of the water of life as promised in the last paragraph of the Bible, and as witnessed under the preaching of the apostles and evangelists of later times?

We conclude, then, that "experimental religion" still lives, and is worthy the experiments of all sincere lovers of their own souls. Prov. 19: 8. And I venture the prophecy that the "righteousness, peace and joy," which is "in the Holy Ghost," the "unsearchable riches of Christ" on man bestowed,—the sumum bonum of christianity, will be still proclaimed and still "received into good and honest hearts," until He of whom it is said, "Behold he cometh with clouds," shall, by his glorious presence, disrobe his followers of the spirit of intolerance and dogmatic love of theory, and bring a startled world to wonder that they had so long resisted the experimental religion of Him before whom they shall stand in judgment. DAY OF THE FIRST FRUIT OFFERING.

"And the Lord spake unto Moses, saying Speak unto the children of Israel, and say unto them, When ye be come into the land which I give unto you, and shall reap the harvest thereof, then shall ye bring a sheaf of the first-fruits of your harvest unto the priest, and he shall wave the sheaf before the Lord to be accepted for you on the morrow after the Sabbath the priest shall wave it. . And ye shall eat neither bread, nor parched corn, nor green ears, until the self-same day that ye have brought an offering unto your God."—Lev. 23 9, 14.

Some have thought that the Sabbath referred to in the above quotation, was the seventh day Sabbath, notwithstanding the testimony of Josephus, that this offering was made on the sixteenth of the first month, clearly implying that the Sabbath referred to was the fifteenth day of the first month. According to verses fifteen and sixteen, they were required to count from the day when they brought the wave sheaf, "seven Sabbaths complete; even unto the morrow after the seventh Sabbath, shall ye number fifty days." Here it may be claimed that there are no seven Sabbaths complete, making fifty days unto the morrow after the seventh day Sabbath. But it should be known that the word Sabbath was used to denote a week, and that in accordance therewith the Septuagint reads, "seven sevens," instead of seven Sabbaths.

The week is not a natural, but an artificial division of time, to keep in memory the fact that God created heaven and earth in six days, and rested the seventh, which was the Sabbath. This Sabbath, therefore, implied a period of seven days, and so was sometimes used to denote a period of seven days. For every week, whether reckoned from the first day after the seventh, or from any other day, included a seventh day Sabbath, and so the week came to be represented by the principal day that made this artificial division of time by sevens. Hence, "seven Sabbaths complete" would not denote seven weeks ending with the seventh day Sabbath, unless they were appointed to begin with the first day of the week; of which there is no evidence. For Josephus, who was fully acquainted with the Jewish customs, declares that "the offering" was made on the sixteenth day of the first month (Ant. Book 3, chap. 10, sec. 5); and since this was the point from which the seven weeks were to be reckoned, it is clear that they would have to be reckoned from whatever day of the week the sixteenth happened to fall, except it fell on the seventh day. For in this case, the fifteenth being a Sabbath, followed by the seventh day, there would be a Sabbath of two days duration, and so "the morrow after the Sabbath" would not come till the seventeenth day of the month, and first day of the regular week.

According to the quotation at the head of this article, the offering of the first fruits was to be made before the harvest was fully ripe, for they were not to eat "green ears" until the self-same day that they offered the sheaf of first fruits; which, had it been after the harvest was wholly ripe, would have prevented them from ever eating thereof in its green state. And since their first month, "Abib," signifies the month of green ears, the offering of the sheaf of first fruits must have taken place in this first month, since it was to be in that month, or moon, when their grain could be eaten in its green state. And as it was to be offered "on the morrow after the Sabbath," some particular Sabbath, peculiar to this month, must be referred to. It could not, however, relate to any of the seventh day Sabbaths, for that would make it uncertain whether the offering was to be made at the beginning, middle, or end of the first month.

Some Sabbaths, specially referred to in the connection, must therefore be understood to relieve the command of absolute indefiniteness. Such a Sabbath was the fifteenth day of the first month, specially referred to in the connection in verses six and seven. That was worthy to be called "the Sabbath," in distinction from every other Sabbath of that month, being the great anniversary day of their deliverance from Egyptian bondage, and a day wherein no servile work was to be done.

Had our Savior been crucified on the fourteenth day of the first month, and on a Thursday, this great Sabbath day would have followed the next day; and that being succeeded by Saturday, the seventh day Sabbath, the offering of the first fruits would have come on the first day of the week; because the Sabbath, in that case, continued throughout both days. Hence Christ, our Passover, was sacrificed for us, at the time indicated by the type; and Christ, the first fruits, arose from the dead on the morrow after the Sabbath.

TEMPORAL TND SPIRITUAL FOOD.

If we would be found in harmony with the saints, enjoy their faith, and serve God with a pure heart, we must "eat that which is good,"—spiritual and heavenly food; it will enliven, cherish and animate the soul, and consequently lead us to the realms of glory. Eat that which is good. This is the declaration and admonition of Holy Writ. It is spoken in reference to the selection of moral food;—food for the mind, support for the spiritual man. The mind needs good food as well as the body. And he who takes care to provide for the outward, and neglects the inward man, abuses the best part of himself, fails of justly understanding the dignity, capacities and wants of his nature, and consequently fails of happiness. Thus many do. Hence the world is filled with complaint. Man feeds his body, yet starves his mind; supplies the animal and neglects the spiritual. He crawls on the earth when he should aspire to heaven. Debasement and degeneration consequently rule the day, and the image of God is shrouded in the depravity of man.

Instead of going to the fountain of living waters, "man hews out to himself cisterns, broken cisterns, that can hold no water." Instead of eating the bread of life, he eats the bread of death. He is miserable. A sensual, gluttonous appetite cannot satisfy the mind, else would sensuality be happiness, and animal indulgence harmony and peace. Thus man appeared to the Prophet when he wrote the following words: Eat that which is good. Man's soul was unfed, or, if otherwise, fed only with the husks of error and worldly dissipation. Alas! that it should be so now, that many hunger when there is bread enough and to spare; that many thirst when there are heavenly waters enough to satisfy the soul.

Eat that which is good, delight your soul in fatness. This admonition holds as good in this day as it did in the days of the prophet. When will this admonition be heeded? Not until we learn that there are two kinds of food in the world,—truth and error. The first is life, the last death, to the mind. These two kinds of food are better known by their tastes than by their names; for in relation to spiritual food names have been strangely misapplied. Infidelity has been called philosophy; sin, pleasure, and a partial salvation the doctrine of Christ At this table, men have fed and turned away unsatisfied, and hunger still. It is not that feast of fat things prepared before the face of all people. He that eats most at this temporal table hungers most. No one ever left it satisfied. Not so with the feast of divine truth. That satisfies; it fills the mind with good, it strengthens the inward man,—it feeds the soul with joy divine.

How beautiful is the simplicity of God's truth. May God speed the day when all his dear children shall be brought into the knowledge of the truth, to entertain right views of God's character, just views of his goodness, and a proper understanding of his will concerning them. Then will sin and all its attendant evils be banished from the world, and righteousness, joy and peace fill the whole earth. Let us ponder well these serious things, and act as duty shall call. Let us be true to God, to ourselves; true to our faith, and true to our fellowmen, and a rich blessing will rest upon us.

As the dew from heaven nourishes the earth and causeth vegetation to spring forth in brightness and beauty, so doth spiritual food nourish the soul of man.

"Eternal Wisdom has prepared
 A soul-reviving feast,
And bids your longing appetites
 The rich provision taste."

BOSANQUET'S CHRONOLOGY.

Bosanquet, in his valuable work on Chronology, by reference to the recent discoveries among the ruins of Nineveh, and the authority of the most ancient historians, has proved the incorrectness of the received Chronology.

In his Introduction, he says: "It has pleased the Almighty in these latter days to reveal to us historical truths, which have been hidden for more than two thousand years. . . Within the last year, a most important addition to our knowledge of Assyrian history has been made by Colonel Rawlinson, who has deciphered the annals of Sennacherib, king of Assyrian, from the marbles of Nineveh." But as those who are interested in the subject of chronology would prefer seeing the work itself, instead of making large quotations from it, we shall here only give the result of his investigation, and, for the convenience of the reader, we will give a table of the most essential points in his chronology, compared with Bishop Usher's chronology and mine.

Bishop Usher's chronology is the one generally received; and the dates, as given in the margin of your Bibles, are according to his, which are based alone upon the authority of Ptolemy's Canon. Bosanquet also considers Ptolemy's Canon reliable from the beginning down as far as the reign of Nabopalassar; and I am of the same opinion; so thus far we are all agreed as to that, although we differ as to the time of the reign of the kings of Israel, as seen from the following table:—

A table exhibiting and comparing the Chronology of Bishop Usher, Bosanquet and Thurman.

Usher.	Bosanquet.	Thurman.
B. C.	B. C.	B. C.
10 12	990	983	The 4th year of Solomon.
721	695	681	The 6th year of Hezekiah.
713	688	674	The 14th year of Hezekiah.
588	560	547	The 11th year of Zedekiah.
538	493	491	The first scriptural year of Darius.
536	523	488	The first scriptural year of Cyrus.
5	3	5	The birth of Christ.

It will be seen from the foregoing table that I am agreed with the received chronology as to the time of the birth of Christ, while Bosanquet is at variance in every date; yet, by correcting a few errors into which he has fallen, his chronology will be the same with mine, as I intend to show; but Bishop Usher's being based alone upon Ptolemy's Canon, cannot be reconciled, either with the Bible, Bosanquet's chronology, nor mine.

1. It will be observed that Bosanquet gives just seven years more for the time of the fourth of Solomon than I have; and that he is just seven years in error here we have proved by the eclipse of Amos, which is found to have occurred B. C. 755. (See page 75 of the Book of Daniel Opened.)

2. For the sixth of Hezekiah, Bosanquet gives just fourteen years more than I have. His authority is Demetrius, a learned Jew, living about two hundred years before the christian era. His words are thus given by Clemens:—"Demetrius says in his work concerning the kings of Judea, that the tribes of Benjamin and Levi were not carried into captivity by Senacherim; but that from this captivity to the last captivity from Jerusalem by Nebuchadnezzar, was a period of a hundred and twenty-eight years and six months. And that from the time when the ten tribes were made captive from Samaria (i. e. in the reign of Shalmanezer) to the reign of the fourth Ptolemy (Philopater) was four hundred* and seventy-three years and nine months. And from the carrying away from Jerusalem, three hundred and thirty-eight years and three months.†

Bosanquet has well asked, "Whose authority could be better" than that of this Demetrius? for I suppose that, outside of the Bible, better authority cannot be found. But the point to which I wish to call the attention of the reader is, that Bosanquet, failing to notice the express language of Demetrius, has fallen into an error of fourteen years. In the first place, he is in error one year as to the beginning of "the reign of the fourth Ptolemy." He places it in B. C. 221. But Josephus gives us B. C. 220 as the time of the beginning of his reign; for he informs us that the second Ptolemy reigned thirty nine years; and since Demetrius was also a Jew, it is more reasonable to suppose that they both used the same date. But supposition is not enough; we must prove it; which may be done by the three odd months given by Demetrius; for it is said that the reign of each of the Egyptian kings is to be reckoned from the beginning of the Egyptian first month; and since it is well known that the captivity commenced on the tenth day of the fifth month, these three odd months give the tenth day of the eighth month for the beginning of the reign to which Demetrius had reference; and in B. C. 220, the beginning of the Egyptian year did fall on the tenth day of the Jewish eighth month. But in B. C. 221, the beginning of the Egyptian year fell on the twenty-ninth day of the Jewish seventh month. This would give the twenty-ninth day of the fourth month for the beginning of the captivity, on which day no one places it.

Having then proved that the dates used by Demetrius are to be reckoned from the tenth day of the eighth month, B. C. 220, we are now ready to examine the matter. Demetrius' words are as follows:—"From the time when the ten tribes were made captive from Samaria (i. e., in the reign of Shalmanezer), to the reign of the fourth Ptolemy (Philopater), was four hundred and seventy-three years and nine months"; which placed against the beginning of the reign of Ptolemy, in B. C. 220, gives the tenth day of the eleventh month, B. C. 694, for the beginning of the captivity of the Gentiles. This is within one year of the time given by Bosanquet, which he gives as the sixth year of Hezekiah; and it is true that with the sixth year of Hezekiah, the desolation and everlasting ruin of the ten tribes is to be dated (2 Kings 18: 10); but

* In the original the word is pentakosia, five hundred, instead of tetrakosia, four hundred. The emendation required is so obvious from the context, that it needs no comment.

† Clemens, Alex. Strom I.

of this desolation Demetrius says nothing. He dates "from the time when the ten tribes were made captive," which Bosanquet himself admits was in the first year of Shalmaneser. He says, "The inscriptions relate that Shalmaneser, in his first year, . . . came against Samaria; and Isaiah, writing while Ahaz and Pekah were both reigning, . . . predicts that before his son shall be able to cry, My father and my mother, . . . the spoil of Samaria shall be taken." (Isa. 8: 4.) The predicted invasion is that recorded at Khorsabad, when 27,000 families and upwards were carried away."—Sacred and Profane Chronology, Appendix, pp. 8, 23.

Says Bosanquet, Isaiah wrote "while Ahaz and Pekah were both reigning." Pekah's reign commenced B. C. 718, and he reigned 20 years, which gives us B. C. 698 for the death of Pekah. This, then, would give us B. C. 697 for the time of the birth of Isaiah's son, and now about three years is as much as we can reasonably allow for the age of the child, before it was able "to cry, My father and my mother," within which time "the spoil of Samaria shall be taken away before the king of Assyria."—Isa. 8: 4. Three from 697 leaves B. C. 694 as the latest period to which Isaiah's prediction could extend, which wants thirteen years to reach the sixth of Hezekiah. This proves that Isaiah's allusion here was not to the breaking up of Israel in the sixth of Hezekiah, but to that captivity of Israel which occurred according "to the inscription" in the first year of Shalmaneser; that is, B. C. 694. Thus proving Demetrius to be correct in giving 473 years and 9 months from this to the beginning of the reign of the fourth Ptolemy, that is, the tenth day of the eighth month, B. C. 220.

Bosanquet's next important date is the fourteenth of Hezekiah, which he places in B C. 688, or fourteen years earlier than I have. This he gets by adding Demetrius' 128 years and 6 months to B. C. 560, in which year he places the last captivity of Nebuchadnezzar; so to correct this, his date for the ruin of the city, will be to correct the former, or the time of the fourteenth of Hezekiah. The way he obtains this last date for the destruction of the city, is by placing the 338 years and 3 months as given by Demetrius against B C 221, which gives him B. C. 560 But we have already observed that the reign of the fourth Ptolemy commenced on the tenth day of the eighth month, B. C. 220. And 338 years and 3 months placed against this gives us B C 558. But now it should be observed that Demetrius is not reckoning from the desolation of the city, but the captivity. His express language is, "From the carrying away from Jerusalem", and the time at which Nebuchadnezzar "carried away all Jerusalem" (2 Kings 24: 14), was in the "eighth year of his reign" (24: 12), not the 19th; and from this epoch Zedekiah reigned eleven years, which gives B. C. 547 for the time of the desolation, thus proving an error of just thirteen years in Bosanquet's chronology.

This, the end of Zedekiah's eleventh year, was the last captivity; and, according to Demetrius, from this "the last captivity from Jerusalem," to the invasion by "Senacherim," there were 128 years and 6 months, which gives the tenth day of the eleventh month, B. C. 676, for the date at which Sennacherib invaded the land of Judea. Says Sennacherib, "In my third year, I went up to the country of the Ketta. Luliya, king of Sidon, . . . had thrown off the yoke of allegiance On my approach from Abiri, he fled to Yetnan, which was on the seacoast. I reduced his entire country. . . . I placed Tubaal on the throne, in the place of Luliya, and imposed on him the regulated amount of tribute; . . . and because Hezekiah, king of Judea, did not submit to my yoke, forty-six of his strong fenced cities, and innumerable small towns, which depended on them, I took and plundered, . . . and because Hezekiah still refused to pay me homage, I attacked and carried off the whole population, fixed and nomad, which dwelled about Jerusalem, with thirty talents of gold, and eight hundred talents of silver."—Sacred and Profane Chronology, p. 59. Each of these invasions are mentioned in 2 Chron. 32: 1–22. The second was in the fourteenth year of Hezekiah (2 Kings 18: 13), hence the first was before that. That there may be no mistake about this, observe that the "thirty talents of gold," mentioned by Sennacherib, are the same as mentioned in 2 Kings 18: 14. "Hezekiah gave him all of the silver that was found in the house of the Lord," which was five hundred talents more than the king of Assyria demanded. If we allow Sennacherib something less than a year to subjugate the "king of Sidon," we will have the fourth year of his reign for the time of his first invasion of the land of Judea; and since his first year was B. C. 680, his fourth year must have been B. C. 676, which is the very year given by Demetrius. The interval between the two invasions of Sennacherib is generally believed to be three years; for this was the duration of the siege against Egypt (Isa. 22: 3), and this gives us B. C. 674 for the fourteenth of Hezekiah. Thus it will be seen that when the errors into which Bosanquet has fallen are corrected, his chronology will be the same with mine.

Bosanquet gives B. C. 493 for the first scriptural year of Darius, which is but two years more than I have given, and that he is here in error just two years, we prove thus: that the first scriptural year of Darius begins with the fall of Babylon is clear from Daniel (5: 30, 31); and, according to Clemens, "Babylon was destroyed 186 years before the death of Alexander," who died B. C. 305; to which add 186 years, and we have B. C. 491, the exact year I had given for the fall of Babylon.

For the first scriptural year of Cyrus, Bosanquet gives B. C. 523. This is the greatest blunder he has made, for we know for certain, from Dan. 9: 25, that the first of Cyrus was B. C. 488. After "the first year of Darius, the son of Ahasuerus," Daniel saw another vision, which he places in "the third year of Cyrus, king of Persia." But, strange to tell, Bosanquet places "the first of the same Darius" thirty years after the death of Cyrus.

For the birth of Christ, Bosanquet gives B. C. 3. But since Christ was born in the days of Herod the king, it has been abundantly proved that his birth could not have been later than B. C. 5. Bosanquet's reason for placing the birth of Christ in B. C. 3, is the supposition, on his part, that Daniel's seventy weeks must reach the birth of Christ. But Daniel was informed that they measured the length of time (not to the birth of Christ, but) determined upon his people and holy city; therefore, they cannot end before the beginning of that war during which the city [was] destroyed.

DISCUSSION AT SPRINGFIELD.

Our discussion with Mr. J. G. Fish in Springfield, Mass., was one of great interest. He is a noted Spiritualist, who was formerly a Baptist preacher. He is now President of the State organization of Spiritualists in Massachusetts. He is a ready speaker, and a bold advocate of Spiritualism in its advanced degrees, and seems to glory in its defense.

The discussion began on Monday evening, March 19th, and continued five evenings. It was held in Music Hall, which will seat about fourteen hundred persons. The hall was crowded, and about one hundred could not find seats. The order and attention were excellent. We have great reason to rejoice that the discussion was held.

In order to sustain his ground as a Spiritualist, Mr. Fish took the position that the Bible account of the creation of man is false; that the apostles did not write the New Testament; that Moses copied his ritual from the Egyptians, "word for word, item by item;" that the record of Christ's birth, miracles, death, resurrection, and ascension, was copied from the Hindoo writings concerning their Crishna; that Christ was not the Son of God any more than Crishna was, or any good man; that he is to Christianity what St. Patrick is to the Catholics; that the accounts of his miraculous birth, resurrection and ascension are only "pious lies," unworthy to be believed; that the Bible is a mere human production, that the God of the Bible is but a human spirit, or demon, etc, etc In about every speech, he made an earnest effort to overthrow the Bible. His success reminded us of a little yelping dog which runs with all his fury to stop the lightning express train by barking at it Thank the Lord for his word, which all the combined efforts of infidels cannot overturn with any more success than they could blot out the sun by the smoke of a burning tar barrel. They are like millers fighting a blazing volcano; their success is but a continued series of failures.

After listening to the blasphemous harangues of our opponent, we felt like giving a hearty amen to an expression that we heard made by one of the audience,—"The Bible never looked so precious as now." Like pure gold, it stands the fires of the hottest crucibles and comes out unharmed.

Our opponent admitted that many of the spirits are liars, we urged him to tell us how he knew those were not lying ones whom he had been consulting? We received no answer It was very evident that no system can be more directly opposed to God and the Bible, than is Spiritualism.

It is well known that when man dies, his whole physical organism expires together, and no material part leaves him; yet, it is claimed by the Spiritualists that the spirits have material, tangible bodies, when they return. We pressed our opponent to tell us how they obtain their bodies before the resurrection of the dead? He finally said that they formed, or created their own bodies, by taking on particles of matter floating in the air. The most important item wanting in connection with this statement was the proof that any such thing ever took place

In his vain efforts to make out the God of the Bible was a human spirit, he referred to Acts 17: 22–25, which reads as follows —

"Then Paul stood in the midst of Mars' hill, and said, Ye men of Athens, I perceive that in all things ye are too superstitious. For as I passed by, and beheld your devotions, I found an altar with this inscription, TO THE UNKNOWN GOD. Whom therefore ye ignorantly worship, him declare I unto you. God that made the world and all things therein, seeing that he is Lord of heaven and earth, dwelleth not in temples made with hands; neither is worshiped with men's hands, as though he needed any thing, seeing he giveth to all life, and breath, and all things."

After he had quoted a part of the 23d verse, he said that the "UNKNOWN GOD," whom Paul declared to the Athenians, was a human spirit, or demon. We asked him to tell us what human spirit "made the world" before any man had an existence?

These are samples of the teachings of spirits and Spiritualists, who claim that "Spiritualism is ancient christianity revived."

FENIANISM.

The hour for positive action among the Fenians appears to be near at hand. The Canadians are much alarmed, and making great preparations for defense. They have reason for fears; but we think all Protestant nations would fare no better than England, if the Fenians had the power to control political matters.

At a large meeting of Fenians in Washington, D. C., March 2nd, Thomas B. Florance is reported to have said, "He did not know which he hated worse, Old England, or New England."

Alderman Dillon, member of the Imperial Parliament, when speaking about the Fenians, says:—"A great military power, destined, in all probability, at no distant day, to become the greatest power on the earth, has sprung suddenly into existence."

In the report of Capt. McCafferty, relative to the Fenians in England, he says:—"Two thirds of the British navy to day belong to James Stephens. The first blow to be made in the heart of England would be twenty per cent more severe than in Ireland. Stephens had been recognized by Napoleon as the greatest military organizer in Europe."

At a great meeting of Fenians in Music Hall, Boston, Gen. Sweeney's remarks are reported as follows:—

"He believed in attacking the enemy at its weakest point and on ground of their own selection, and as far from the strength of the enemy as possible. It was his intention to find England three thousand miles from her base, and in doing this he expected assistance from the United States and France. He did not think that either of these nations would throw obstacles in their way unless they committed some overt act, but they would not do this. They might, however, make an excursion into some neighboring place, but no one would be hurt unless they came in their way. In this excursion they might, perhaps, remain for a while on the visited territory, and have harbors in which to bring in English vessels captured by Irish privateers. Results, he thought, would follow from such an excursion which in two years would secure the independence of Ireland, and then he would be ready to die, having seen the great work of his heart accomplished."

The following is the report of Col. Robert's remarks at the same meeting:—

"Col. Roberts believed with Gen. Sweeney, in the plan of striking the English nation at its weakest point, and they had therefore determined to seize a territory on this continent, establish a temporary government there, and, if necessary, fight there for fifty generations to secure the freedom and independence of Ireland. With God's blessing and the assistance of friends they will very soon commence it at a point three thousand miles distant from the head of the English Government. He urged prompt and decisive co-operation, and an early strike for the independence of Ireland and the humiliation of England. . . .

In his further remarks Col. Roberts mentioned the name of President Johnson, which called forth a round of cheers In concluding, he appealed for aid to carry on their work of war against English tyranny, and promised that if this was furnished the blow would be struck within a month, and, he believed, crowned with success."

Mr. Morrison, of Kansas, followed Colonel Roberts. The reporter gives the following — "The blow, he thought, would be struck in a small province, and a province only a short distance from here."

SPIRITUALISM.—NO. 12.

THE POLITICS OF SPIRITUALISM

The political aspect of Spiritualism is an important item It is very evident that for some years the demons have been laying plans to control the governments of this world through the agency of their mediums For this reason, they have taken special pains to get the leading men in the world to embrace Spiritualism, and their success has been wonderful. Many of the prominent men in the American government are Spiritualists, including generals in the army, members of Congress, and other leading men; Napoleon III. is a Spiritualist, and it is said that other crowned heads are consulting the spirits, as well as many noted men who occupy very high positions in political circles. Col. John O'Mahony, the President of the Fenians, is also a Spiritualist.

We will now listen to the spirits and their followers, and hear what they have to say about political matters —

A few years since, the following editorial article appeared in the Spiritual Age, edited by Mr A. E. Newton, of Boston, now Superintendent of the Freedmen's schools in the District of Columbia:—

"There is a widespread and universal belief among all classes and all religious sects, at the present day, that some wonderful developments are soon to be manifested to the world, which shall materially revolutionize the existing phases of Church, Society, and State"

When speaking of the doctrines of Spiritualism, the editor goes on to say —

"We tell you, Spiritualists, that upon the base of the doctrines there put forth, you shall yet see reared the grandest political structures the world ever saw"

In an article headed, "The Angel Movement," we find the following announcement.

"New phase in Spiritualism! Great national symbolic outwrought spiritual manifestation! All sects, denominations, creeds, parties, nations, kindreds, tongues, and peoples, now existing on the face of the earth, to be dissolved and pass away, and a new divine governmental order to arise instead. The judgment day, millennial morn, and resurrection of the dead at hand."

In a communication on the "Mission of Spiritualism," the writer says.—

"It remains for us to apply the principles of a Rational Spiritualism to the practical reformation of the world. . . . The race has been doomed to bear a thousand crosses to the scenes of its mournful crucifixion. Spiritualism comes at last to deliver humanity from the bondage of this death. Let the quickened spiritual nature, freed from its long incarceration in the dungeons of ignorance, sensuality, superstition and crime, assume the government of the world, that we may be saved from the corruptions of flesh and sense."

"Spiritualism comes to lay—broad and deep on the eternal principles of Nature and the Soul—the foundations of new institutions, and to preside at the inauguration of the Divine Order and the Celestial Life on earth."

The following was published in the Spiritual Age —

"We all believe that the real, underlying ideas foreshadowed by what is popularly called 'Spiritualism,' look forward to the political, material regeneration of society, as well as to a Spiritual revolution, and it is high time that some public, formal action, looking in this direction, were taken. . . . Let us assume a political attitude, and make the world feel that we are no longer to be trampled on with impunity."

"In speaking of the new government, the writer denominates it,—'A political institution, such as the world has never yet seen, and of which now it has not the remotest idea.' He says, when we come under the approaching new government, 'There is no more voting for Presidents, Congressmen and Municipal officers.'"

In defining the purpose of Spiritualism, a spirit says:—

"The first great object is to convince skeptics of the immortality of the soul, disrobe death of its terrors, give to men a rational religion, and unite all men in one grand, sublime faith, in which angels, or spirits of the dead, hold intercourse with living men; thus raising the condition of the material world up to that of and in harmony with the spiritual."

"The design is, through this increase of knowledge and spiritual elevation, to crush, destroy, and break in pieces, all the existing forms of government on the face of the whole earth, . . . and in place of them build up one common form of government in all the earth, having one common head." "In this form of government, which will be a Theocratic Democracy, every man will be his own ruler, and his natural demands his highest law."

The first movement towards forming a new government, which came to our knowledge, was at the convention of Spiritualists held in Boston, March 16th, 1857, one object of which, as expressed in their call for the conference, was, "To consider the wisdom of taking incipient steps toward forming a new confederation, wherein distinctions of clime, of color, and of sex, will be no bar to equality."

In the Spiritual Telegraph of June 20, 1857, we have an account of a similar convention held in the city of New York. The report says, their "object is to overturn the inharmonies and evils of the present condition, and in their place to establish 'a new social order on the earth.'"

This "new social order" is more fully set forth in the Telegraph of June 13, 1857, under the head of "Practical Spiritualism, Purposes and Plans." The writer says:—

"For the last four or five years, a movement has been going forward, comparatively unobserved by the public at large, whose central purpose is no less than the entire regeneration . . . . of the whole human race. . . . It is hardly to be supposed that an enterprise so startling to the world as the last eight years have proved the spiritual movement to be, would have for its grand end anything like the presentation of mere phenomenal exhibitions, abstract philosophies, the incidental re-union and gratification of long-severed and lacerated affections, or even the generation of a new, a broader, and more living conviction of the truth of immortality. All these, indeed, and more in the same line, have been, and still are, very useful, and are not in the least to be undervalued; but if the movement itself rested in them as an end, it would seem that the end itself was quite unworthy of such a grand commencement, such a widespread interest, and such hopes and aspirations as have already been created."

"The great purpose of the spirit world, then, is of a much broader nature, and a more thoroughly practical spirit. . . . It aims, in short, at the establishment of a NEW SOCIAL ORDER on the earth, through whose mediatorial harmony alone the divine truth and its good can descend only upon and into a waiting and responsive race . . .

"It is also the purpose of Spiritualism to so educate a class of persons in certain practical functions, that they shall become pivots of groups in the coming new social order. . . . About two hundred and fifty persons have already been selected. . . These persons are scattered all over the United States and the provinces.

"Another purpose of the movement is the establishment of a new system of GOVERNMENT. It is a combination of the TWO elements of MONARCHY and REPUBLICANISM, making, therefore (partly because of the combination, and partly for other reasons), a new idea in government. It has already matured its plans to quite an extent. . .

"All these things grow out of a NEW CHURCH—a church of principles—not of dogmas. This church is to be both interior and exterior, or individual and organic. It is to reconcile both the Catholic and the Protestant phases of the religious idea, not overlooking the three great religions [See Rev 16: 13], which dogmatic Christianism does not recognize, viz., Hindooism, Mohammedanism, and Judaism. It is the grand unitizing church of the spiritual age, and blends into harmony the antagonized elements of the analytic ages. It is the mother of all institutions for external uses—therefore, the mother of the States, and in the combination takes place the "UNION OF CHURCH AND STATE."

All this might well be called an "image" of the Leopard beast, as it represents a union of Church and State on a grand scale.

In the foregoing, it stated that "about two hundred and fifty persons have already [in 1857] been selected," who "shall become pivots of groups in the coming new social order." These pivot men are as commanding officers in an army, when the time comes for action. They are to direct the movements in their division, in harmony with the general plan. The following, from the Educator, gives the manner of selecting the pivot men

"QUESTIONS FOR THE LEADERS IN THE NEW GOVERNMENT.

1. Do you understand that it requires two persons, male and female, to constitute a whole man?
2. Do you understand that each man, and each woman, if you please, has a perfect right, under all circumstances, in all conditions, and in whatever locality, to do as he or she pleases?
3 Do you know that government is but a temporary arrangement to be outgrown with the greatest possible speed"? To be answered "without the least equivocation, without the slightest qualification."

II.

"Is the person ready now to aid in constructing a government on these fundamental principles? . . . Are you willing to risk your reputation, your property, your life, if need be, in the new enterprise?"

If he cannot answer "without hesitation, he is not the man for the times."

III.

"Do you love these fundamental principles . . . more than all things else? . . . Are you willing to announce your allegiance to these fundamental principles, even though it may separate you from church, from state, from home, from land, from children, from the companion of your bosom? If the person questioned hesitates, then he is unfit for this struggle; he ought not to be engaged; for when the storm comes . . . this man will be missing."—Educator, pp. 412, 413.

"When . . . the people are ripe for action, let the decisive blow be struck . . . The next political revolution . . . will be the grandest the world has ever witnessed."—Educator, pp. 434–5.

The foregoing needs no comment. Rome never bound her votaries with a firmer oath to carry out her principles, than the spirits are now binding their leaders in this new political movement.

The spirits say, "The hour is at hand when a revolution must come. . . . It will be a fearful crisis—an hour when the passions of men will be excited to an extent seldom, if ever, known before. This Association proposes to place in the hands of its general agent a series of instructions which will be of the greatest use in that hour of peril."—Educator, p. 403. "Prominent persons will be placed at the helm of the new ship of state, whose motto shall be, 'ETERNAL PRINCIPLES, NOT PARTIES.'"

Already the talk has begun about "PRINCIPLES." What are these principles? The answer is found in the Educator, on pp. 136, 412, 526. It says:—

"The corner-stone of this new enterprise rests on the following eternal principles:

1. Man is immortal.
2. It requires two persons, male and female, to constitute a whole man.
3. Each man and each woman, if you please, has a perfect right, under all circumstances, in all conditions, and in whatever locations, to do as he or she pleases.
4. Government is but a temporary arrangement, to be outgrown with the greatest possible speed.
5. The highest possible human government is interior, and may at all times, in all places, and under all possible circumstances, be safely obeyed.
6. God . . . is man, and man is God. . . . No clearer idea of the divine existence can possibly be communicated to mind, than in the statement that he is One Grand Universal Man."

All of these principles are not set forth at first to every Spiritualist, but are taught as soon as it is thought they can bear them. The leading doctrine is the immortality of the soul. We learn from the spirits that an association has been formed among them, called "THE ASSOCIATION OF GOVERNMENTIZERS," said to be composed of the spirits of Robert Rantoul, Daniel Webster, John Quincy Adams, Martin Luther, Roger Williams, and Socrates, for the purpose of devising plans to reorganize the governments of the world, and establish them on an entire new basis. This "new basis" is fully given in the "Educator," and corresponds with the movements now going on among Spiritualists; yet these instructions were given some seven or eight years since, when there was no sign that Spiritualism would become a political power. Now there is left no room for a doubt when the facts are known.

The following extract is from "The Soldier's Tract," published July 4th, 1861. It has been circulated among the soldiers, and is said to be received by them with much interest, and preserved in preference to all others:—

"A spiritual prophecy, foreshowing the termination and final result as purposed by the Divine Spirit, to be effected by this strange American war." "Delivered in trance, by Mr. L. J Pardee, at Allston Hall, Boston, on Sunday afternoon, May 26th, 1861." "We hold that this administration has a mission to perform, though it is perhaps the last administration elected under the present constitution . . . Any man who believes that this grand [Spiritual] philosophy comes to do a little work and then die away, to stir the church up a little, and not to walk into the government to cleanse the Augean stables there with its fire-blood of divine light, . does not apprehend that this truly is the day of judgment. . . . You must be prepared for such times as you never yet dreamed. . . The higher life will control the secret springs which guide the nation. . . . This is not merely a political revolution; it is a spiritual revolution, reaching the heart of hearts of things in state, church, and society. First, indeed, the power of Spiritualism was felt in the church, somewhat; then, in the sphere of politics; now it has got to go back again into the church, and stir up a deeper religious sense of the wants and defects of the people

"The next government which shall arise over this people, and which is even now drawing nigh from out the angel world, will be a Theocratic Democracy—God ruling through mediumistic man . . . And then, as Spiritualism and celestialism march over the land, the master souls, once denizens of time, will influence men's acts; the spiritual congress above will guide in all wisdom and truth the councils assembled here below."

At a late picnic of the Spiritualists, held in Abington, Mass., Dr. A B Child, a prominent and intelligent Spiritualist, made a speech which was published in the Banner of Light, Aug. 5th 1865 In the course of the Dr.'s remarks, he is reported to have spoken as follows:—

"The time is speedily coming when every one who has opposed, scorned, reviled and persecuted spiritual communion will be brought to the altar of sacrifice; will suffer sorrow, regret, affliction. . . . It will be a bitter cup, but a necessary remedy for the present sickly morals and religions of men. It is in the power of the spiritual world to make any poor man rich in one day—to make any rich man poor in one day—to make a well man sick in a moment of time, or to make a sick man well—to take life or to continue it—to make woe in the human heart or joy and gladness there. . . .

Imminent and immediate dangers to earthly prosperity hang over all opposition to spiritual communion. Mark well, and you will soon see that the destruction of property, of health, even physical life will follow close upon the heels and overtake all the obstinate, persistent warriors against sin and the devil—all the military of the church militant—all who revile and scoff, and say all manner of things falsely against Spiritualism—against sins, sects, creeds, beliefs not their own. Disasters on sea and land, fires, failures, accidents, diseases, and early deaths will fall thick and fast and heavy, to harrow the peace and happiness of every bosom that is persistently turned with opposition and bitterness against this holy influx that comes down from heaven to earth to tell us the uses of sin and sorrow; to tell us of the realities of the world from whence man gets all his blessings; to tell him of the world from whence he came and whither he is going. . . .

Ay, more than blessed are ye, for a new era is beginning; a new religion is coming, a new day of morals is dawning; a new road for human progress is making; it is the road that the toiling hands of Spiritualism have graded, over lowlands and through highlands, over the swamps of humility and the mountains of pride. It is a straight road, it is a level road; it is a grand highway for all humanity; it is onward forever. Then take courage and be comforted, be not weary, for the work of Spiritualism is the work of well-doing. Relax no effort—seek to change no purpose in this great design, for it must make a revolution in the morals and religions of men that shall be a signal epoch in the history of the world's future, for the world's happiness."

We think the foregoing quite in harmony with the wishes and purposes of Satan.

In conclusion, we would say, that we have endeavored to lay before the reader, in a brief manner, the true origin of Spiritualism; also its morals, doctrines and politics, as taught by the leading spirits and Spiritualists. We think all must see the harmony of parts in this system, when it is admitted to be the work of demons. It is in perfect keeping with their character as seducing spirits." From the foregoing, it is very evident that they purpose to control the governments of the world. Imagine the state of things, when demons have established their religion, with its morals, doctrines, politics, and "new social order," as proposed; when "each man, and each woman" shall have "a perfect right, under all circumstance, in all conditions, and in whatever location, to do as he or she pleases." Is this "ancient christianity?"

Our prayer is, Lord keep us unspotted from its influence for ever and ever. Amen.

RUSSIA AND ENGLAND.

Our attention was recently called to the fact that the Russians are preparing to attack England in her eastern possessions in India and China. It is a fact that for some time Russia has been sending troops to Central Asia; and of course she has some definite object in view. It is thought by some who are watching her movements that she is fitting up in Asia a second Sebastopol. Should England be attacked by the Fenians, sustained by Napoleon, in Ireland and Canada, and by the Russians in Asia, she will have a hard struggle.

The following is from the St. Petersburg correspondent of the London Herald, dated Feb. 24th, 1866:—

The Voice has called attention to the Revue des Deux Mondes upon the progress of Russia in Eastern Asia. The French writer exposes the ambitious views of the government of this country, and points to the danger of a new Sebastopol being established at Hakodadi. But while expressing the apprehension that the Russians may become undisputed masters of the Sea of Japan, he finds some consolation in the fact that the vast province on the Amour, ceded to Russia by the Chinese, will prove a worthless acquisition. If the views of this country are as dangerous as the Revue believes them to be, the English government can hardly be ignorant of the fact. . . . The vicinity to China and Japan seems to give the settlement a great superiority in a commercial point of view.

In the event of a maritime war, the possession of the Amour would offer certain advantages to Russia, but they are purchased at a heavy rate; for the settlement is a very costly one"

AUSTRIA AND PRUSSIA.

The situation of Austria and Prussia is now very indicative of war. Austria must either fight or humble herself before Prussia. The news shows that the matter must be decided at once. The following is from the London Owl, March 8th.

"A German crisis is imminent. The Prussian government has despatched to Vienna a summons in respect to Holstein which is as peremptory in its tone as its demands. Bismark is ready to face a war and its consequences Austria must at once take up the gauntlet or yield to the pretensions of Prussia in a somewhat ignominious manner"

Says the London Standard of March 6th, —"A crisis is approaching in the relations between the two great German Powers, from which there are but two issues—war between the condomini of the Elbe duchies, or another surrender on the part of Austria. The Prussian government has used the power given it by the Gastien Convention to make Schleswig practically its own. It now wants to finish with the matter, and formerly annex Holstein and Schleswig But this project meets with a stubborn resistance from Austria."

We have strong reasons to believe that the present year will witness startling military movements in different parts of the world. Immense preparations are being made for the deadly conflict. It is time every christian was fully clad in "the whole armor of God," that he "may be able to stand," when the storm bursts forth upon the wicked.

DISCUSSION IN NORWAY.

We purpose to have a discussion in Norway, Me., with Mr. Gunnerson, a Universalist minister, commencing April 10th

CORRECTION.—In our last article on Spiritualism, in section 10, instead of "the divine existence is one grand universal mass," read grand universal man.

In the fifth column, third line from the top, for "work of destruction," read work of deception.

THE MEETINGS AT LOWELL ST.

The meetings at this place still continue, with increasing numbers and interest. Many sinners have been converted, and backsliders reclaimed. It is the Lord's work, and seems to be deep and thorough, and free from undue excitement. Fourteen were baptized Sunday, and others are waiting to go forward. The meetings will continue every afternoon and evening through the week, and as much longer as duty may call for.

For the World's Crisis.

LITTLE WANDERERS' HOME.

The Lord is giving me more proofs of his favor in this new enterprise. One eighth of the money is pledged, and about $250 00, or one tenth, has been received. Dear brethren and sisters, still pray that the Lord may knock upon the hearts of his children and all who feel interested in saving the children of the poor, the sick and the degraded from destruction, that the balance of the $2500 00 may be raised by April 2nd, 1866. Yours in faith and hope,

F. H. Burbank

THE YOUNG PILGRIM.

Bro. Herron:—I wish to say that I admire the variety, brevity, simplicity, interest, beauty, and sharp practical points of your selections for the Young Pilgrim. H. F. Carpenter.

My little girl, who was exceedingly delighted with the last number, wishes me to write the following from her —

From Lizzie.

I like the Pilgrim much. There are many pretty stories in the last one. I have saved a dollar for the poor children, which father will send soon. I hope it will do them good, for I pity them. I'm trying to be Jesus' child, for I want to be saved in the Kingdom. Lizzie Frances Carpenter.
Rutland, Vt.

Who will do it?

Do what? Get one subscriber, or two, five, ten, twenty, fifty, or one hundred, for the Young Pilgrim. One brother has sent us sixty, and received one of our largest books offered as gifts for new subscribers. Others, also, are making an effort, and doing well. Shall we have a new and greater effort still?

Now is the time, when Summer schools are commencing again, to get subscribers and form clubs. Who will do it? Minister, superintendent, teacher, scholar, parent, and child, will you?

All subscriptions will commence with April. We cannot supply the 1st of January number. Send for specimen copies, if needed, and begin the work now. Address YOUNG PILGRIM, Boston, Mass.

THE ADVENT PEOPLE AND FAITH.

The Advent people are a distinct people, and came into existence under a prophetic proclamation. That proclamation portrayed the speedy termination of all earthly kingdoms, and the establishment of the kingdom of God on earth. It is true that this event was looked for at too early a date, but this did not in the least invalidate the truthfulness of the great proclamation—the nearness of the event, unmistakably indicated by the fulfillment of the prophecy. And if this proclamation, which gave us an existence as a distinct people, was not all error, it is still a proclamation due a slumbering church and sinful world. If this is really so, we have a specific message to sound in the ears of this last generation, and but a short time to do it in. Let us, then, either conclude that the proclamation which has given us birth as a distinct people is a delusion, or let us go to work in earnest and sound the alarm, even if it does require a sacrifice at our hand. If it is a truth at all, it is a truth of unparalleled magnitude and interest involving the return of Christ from heaven, the resurrection of the sleeping saints, the end of mercy's day to the wicked, and the introduction of Messiah's kingdom. And with events like these but a step before us, can we feel indifferent, and be inactive? For more than a quarter of a century has this solemn message been proclaimed, and we are now being crowded into the extremity of the circle of time in which the prophetic measurements must terminate.

As a people we should now be all astir with heavenly zeal, warning sinners to prepare, and feeding "the household of faith with meat in due season"; for, "blessed is that servant, whom his Lord, when he cometh, shall find so doing." Our duty is plain. Our work is before us. Will we do it? God help us.

Wm. Sheldon.

Correspondence.

From P. H. Lawrence.

DEARLY BELOVED:—It appears to me we are a very highly favored generation, occupying the last of the prophetic periods assigned by them to the Gentile dominion. Here seem to converge those long lines of prophecy since the days of Enoch down to the coming of the Son of Man in the clouds of heaven, with power and great glory. And here center the hopes of the church; for within this period she is to drop forever the shackles of mortality and enter upon her high destiny in immortality—eternal life.

As I write, my heart beats high with cheering hope, and it maketh not ashamed, because the love of God is shed abroad in my heart by the Holy Spirit given unto me; and through it I see the long looked for "times of restitution," spoken of by the mouth of all his holy prophets since the world began, and the gems, the peculiar treasures, the trophies of a Savior's victory, all marshalled and in immortal vigor returning to the Mount Zion, the excellency of Jacob, which God has loved. Here will be heard no widow's wail, or orphan's wo. Here no infirmities of age, no blightings of youth. Here no more weeping in secret places over the cold-heartedness of a nominal christianity. Here, with all our perils forever in the past, we exchange that so much loved form of prayer, that has hung with such emphasis upon the trembling lips of mortals, "Thy Kingdom come," for, "We give thee thanks, O Lord God Almighty, which art, and was, and art to come, because thou hast taken unto thee thy great power and hast reigned!" Then we shall

"Hear the allelujahs roll
From the unnumbered throng.
The kingdom spread from pole to pole,
And join redemption's song."

Pardon me, my brethren, if I point for a moment to our present position. How is it with you of Massachusetts particularly? I know full well the exalted privileges you enjoy, and is it not reasonable for me to remind you of the tremendous responsibility resting upon you, as you are blessed with every facility for all Biblical knowledge that can be attained? I must be allowed to anticipate you as fast becoming, yea, as having already become, conformed to the image of Him who was in the days of his flesh the brightness of his Father's glory, and the express image of his person, and thus made heirs of God and joint heirs with Christ Jesus to the immortal inheritance! O! the blessedness of such a relationship.

Those in this position will do those things that please him, and can assure our hearts before him. It is an infinite boon to put on immortality in its least sense, inasmuch as an eternally blessed existence is by it made sure. But yet I know full well that I write to those who have deeply realized the broad, scriptural difference between such a position and the brightness of the firmament, or the transcendent brilliancy of stars, which with eternally increasing lustre approximate nearer and yet more near the effulgence of the eternal throne, upon which the Lord God and the Lamb shall sit, when he, i. e., Christ, shall have delivered up the kingdom to God the Father, and God becomes all in all. And shall I not here be allowed to sing, with the much loved Isaac Watts, in view of this,—

"Prepare my thrones,
And on them place
My patriots and my sons."

Yes, for Jesus says, Ye that have followed me, in the regeneration, when the Son of man shall sit upon the throne of his glory, ye also shall sit upon . . . thrones," etc., etc. And now is it too much to anticipate Jesus, saying, Haste, then, and all hail! ye chariots of Jehovah, even those thousands of angels, and gather in the elect? For the holy city has long been trodden under the foot of the Gentiles, the tabernacle of David has long lain in ruins, its scattered nobles have long wept over its desolations, and with intense longing have inquired, When shall the law again go forth from Zion, and the word of the Lord from Jerusalem? how long ere the lawful heir shall return, for he has been gone a long, long time. How long ere he who is higher than the kings of earth shall give us the land that the Lord swore unto our Fathers, Abraham, Isaac and Jacob, to give it to them for an everlasting possession? O! happy is that people in such a case!

"Then will we wait, nor think too long
The closing hours of day."

And now one word to God's hidden ones. Ye mothers in the far-off wilds, remote from the privileges of which I have spoken, cheer up, for already are the distant rumbling wheels of his chariot of state distinctly heard in the distance, and each returning day contributes its quota of indisputable evidence that He cometh quickly, and the last pang of the church's anguish will be gone forever. O, take courage! The fruit of those many sincere, believing prayers, which have gone up to the mercy-seat from your lonely dwellings or cabins in the wilds of Canada, or the sunny South, where despotism in its worst form has hitherto shed its blighting prohibitions over the bodies and souls of men; cheer up! your chains are now knocked off; from your plantation homes you can now pour into the ears of the Lord of Sabaoth, your songs and your complaints. You see he has looked upon your wrongs, and heard your groanings; therefore be assured he will reward every pious act, and will gather you with his saints, when all your former troubles will not be remembered, nor come into mind.

May the grace of our Lord Jesus Christ be with all the dear saints. For behold He cometh!

PERE H. LAWRENCE.

From Bro. T. L. Holbrook.

BRO GRANT:—On the evenings of the 27th and 28th of February, the little band in Barre, who are looking for the soon coming of the great God and our Savior Jesus Christ, were highly entertained with the privilege of listening to two discourses from Bro Turner. The house was crowded with saints and sinners. The saints esteemed it as a feast on the way to the kingdom. It was good to be there. It put me in mind of what our Savior said to Peter,—"Feed my sheep." It was like one feeding the hungry. How cheering it is to be fed with the crumbs from our Master's table. This food is food indeed. Its effects are nourishing and invigorating to every happy receiver. It endureth unto everlasting life. It differs very much from the popular preaching of the day. It is not mixed with creeds and the vain philosophy of men. Hallelujah to the Lamb!

After enjoying these two sermons preached by Bro Turner, a goodly number of the saints met at Bro. Grinell's to partake of the Lord's Supper. It was a solemn time. After partaking of the broken body of Christ, and drinking of his blood, we then listened to the testimonies of the saints. Their hearts seemed to be full of the love and spirit of God. They are looking forward for the blessed return of our Lord and Savior Jesus Christ, when he shall reward his children and punish his foes. My prayer is, this morning, that love may ever drive our chariot wheels; for he that loveth is born of God. May God ever keep us low down in the valley of humiliation, for he resisteth the proud and giveth grace to the humble. I feel like calling upon all within me to praise his name. I am thankful that my heavenly Father ever gave me a heart to love and serve him. I am glad, also, that he taught me my need of a Savior. He has done infinitely more for me than he would if he had given me worlds like this.

From Sr. R. W. Jordan.

BRO GRANT:—I was very glad to see that article in the Crisis of Feb. 28th, as it so fully coincides with my views on the subject of prayer and "fasting." Permit me to offer a few remarks on the same. Not that I wish to boast that "I fast twice in the week, and pay tithes of all that I possess"; but believing as I do that fasting, when accompanied with prayer, is one of the most effectual means of enlarging our faith, and increasing our spiritual strength, I feel very anxious that all who are seeking to purchase gold tried in the fire, and white raiment, should fully realize the benefit to be derived therefrom.

When I came to fully believe that the time had arrived when we might know that our Judge stood even at the door, I felt that, entering as I had the narrow way at the eleventh hour, I wished to improve every means of grace, lest my Master should come and still find me unprepared. I said, How shall I wean myself from the love of the world, and place my affections on things which are eternal? How shall I attain that humility which is pleasing in his sight? And by reading the lessons that our Savior left us, I was convinced that fasting was one of the requisitions which he intended his followers to comply with in his absence.

We read in Joel 2; 12,—"Therefore, now, saith the Lord, turn ye even to me with all your hearts, and with fasting." And in Ps. 35: 13, David said, "I humbled my soul with fasting." Also, Ezra 8: 21, and portions of vers. 22, 23,—"Then I proclaimed a fast there at the river of Ahava, that we might afflict ourselves before our God, to seek of him a right way for us, and for our little ones, and for our substance. . . . Because we had spoken unto the king saying, The hand of our God is upon all them for good that seek Him. . . ."

So we fasted, and besought our God for this, and he was entreated of us." Then let us believe that "he is the same yesterday, to-day, and for ever," and "turn to him with all our hearts, and with fasting," believing that he will also "be entreated of us."

Our Bro. asks, "Is this a heavy burden, a hard yoke to bear?" I for one can answer, that it is not, for if we come in the full assurance of faith, resting in that calm and abiding trust upon his promises, as it is our duty and privilege to do at all times, we shall feel no inclination for either food or drink, but shall be able to adopt the language of our Savior when he said, "I have meat to eat that ye know not of." I know that we can easily fast over one day, and even two, and attend to all our duties as usual. I have derived such blessings, and experienced such signal answers to prayer at such seasons, even in the short time that I have practised fasting occasionally, which has been only about one year, that nothing in this life will induce me to discontinue the practise, not at regular intervals, but when I feel it my duty. I believe the stronger our faith is, the longer we can fast without feeling any inconvenience therefrom.

If we cannot deny ourselves enough to fast at least one day occasionally, let us fear lest we be sowing to the flesh instead of the Spirit, and that we have not yet attained to that faith which we shall need to stand before our Judge uncondemned. I would not have any one to understand that I think I have arrived at perfection; far from it; I would humbly confess my weakness, my unworthiness. But I do have faith to believe that I shall yet, through His grace, be found worthy of a place at his right hand.

We read in Rom. 8: 13, "If ye live after the flesh, ye shall die; but if ye through the Spirit do mortify the deeds of the body, ye shall live." Therefore, I do pray that we may be enabled to sow to the Spirit, that we may of the Spirit reap life everlasting.

Casco, Me. R. W. JORDAN.

From Bro. J. H. Muhlig.

BRO. GRANT:—I have been laboring for the Lord, for two weeks past, at East Abington. I was invited there by a Methodist brother. There is no Methodist church in that place, so I held my meetings from house to house, every evening, wherever a door was opened. The meetings were thinly attended the first week, but the interest kept increasing steadily, until we had crowded houses. The people seem really waked up in relation to the things pertaining to the kingdom.

I met with Bro Reuben Burrill and wife, who helped me much by carrying me to the meetings, which were some two miles apart. He has been very sick for the last nine months, and is just able to get about again. The good Lord reward him and his household for their kindness to me, a stranger in a strange place.

On Saturday evening, Feb. 24th, I preached at Hanover, according to appointment. Arrived there late, but found the house crowded. The Baptist minister (Bro. Reed) was present and took part in the meeting. I preached from John 11: 14, had a melting season, the Lord was with us. I found two old pilgrim sisters, who rejoiced aloud in God, they love the welcome sound of coming redemption.

The friends wanted me to stay longer with them. Sunday evening (25th) called on Bro Reed (Baptist minister) and asked for the use of the vestry of his house. He very readily consented, and seemed much pleased; seems waked up to the work of saving souls. I feel to praise God that the people's ears are not entirely closed to the truth.

Sunday, 25th. Preached in Manson Hall, East Abington. Subject in the morning, Do the Scriptures teach the immortality of the human soul? Afternoon, Do the Scriptures teach the eternal misery of the finally impenitent? Evening, The resurrection of the dead. Many questions were asked and answered. The hall seats about six hundred; every seat was taken and seventy-five or one hundred had to stand.

I shall return to Hanover and labor as long as it is for the glory of the Master. The door of mercy is not shut yet, nor will it be till Jesus comes. I ask the prayers of those who have faith in prayer, that my labors may be owned and blessed of God.

BRO. GRANT:—We are deeply bereaved, but the Spirit comforts, and in our sorrow we have joy. The Lord is with us by his Spirit indeed, and in truth, and the sinner is trembling before him. O! we bless and praise his holy name for his word and very precious promises. How gloriously does it shine upon our pathway, and we pray that it may shine brighter and brighter unto the perfect day, "until the day dawn, and the daystar arise in our hearts"; when we will no longer need it, the perfect having come. And we rejoice with full hearts to know that it is so soon. We have trials, but they are so lightened by our joys that we scarcely feel them. The thought of being kings and priests unto God and His Father (Rev. 1: 6; 20: 6), ravishes my whole being. Hallelujah! O! will that not reverberate through the wide canopy of the "New Heavens"? My soul! what a song! "Alleluia; for the Lord God omnipotent reigneth!" Rev. 19: 6. Yours in love, J. C. RICE.

Hillsburgh, N. S.

From Sr. S. D. Ackerman.

Dear Brn. and Srs. scattered abroad:—Through the Crisis, I feel it my duty to confess to the world, by relating my experience, the care our ever blessed Lord has for his children.

About three years ago, I was prostrated with disease, which was pronounced by different physicians as incurable; that I could never be well again, and could only hope to be comfortable by living easy, and having constant medical treatment.

In this way I lived for two years and more, sometimes confined to my bed, at others able to be about, but always a sufferer.

About the middle of Oct., 1865, I felt very strongly impressed that it was my duty to lay aside my medicine, and look to Jesus, the great Physician, to be healed. I immediately obeyed, laying aside all medicines, of which I had a fresh supply. I went to my closet, kneeled in prayer, and sought of God the blessing I so much desired. I said, Lord, if thou wilt, thou canst make me whole. Immediately the answer came, "I will. Be it unto thee according to thy faith." I arose, filled with peace, with perfect faith that God would do for me all I had asked; and, blessed be God, I began to mend from that very hour; and to-day I can say, I am well.

The disease which had so long preyed upon me is entirely removed, and I am healed. I believe it is all through the intercession of Christ for me; and I would say to the dear suffering ones, look to Jesus with faith believing, and you shall be healed. Glory to God! Your sister waiting for Jesus,

SUSAN D. ACKERMAN.

Derry, N. H., Mar. 12th, 1866.

From Bro. B. P. Manning.

BRO. GRANT:—I praise God that I am gaining my health a little, in answer to the prayers of the dear saints; still I am not able to labor much with my hands, nor in the vineyard of the Lord; but I hope I shall be soon. Keep praying for me, dear brethren, that the Lord will give me perfect health, that I may do some little good before he comes. How it rejoices my heart to hear of the good work of the Lord that is going on in different places; and my prayer is that the Lord will send the Holy Ghost this way, into New Hampshire, and revive pure religion in the hearts of the professed people of God. It is sad to see the low state of things, or rather hear of it from the dear brethren in different parts of the States. But Jesus will soon come and take his bride to himself.

My brethren, are we all ready to meet him at the judgment seat? If not, it is time that we were. Are you trying to keep the commandments of the Lord, so that if he should come sooner than you expected you can say from the heart, "Lo, this is our God, we have waited for him, and he will save us"? Remember the words of Paul in Heb. 10: 25.—"Forsaking not the assembling of ourselves together, as the manner of some is; but exhorting one another, and so much the more as ye see the day approaching." 35th verse, "Cast not away your confidence, which hath great recompense of reward. For ye have need of patience, that, after ye have done the will of God, ye might receive the promise. For yet a little while, and he that shall come, will come, and will not tarry. Now the just shall live by faith, but if any man draw back, my soul shall have no pleasure in him. But we are not of them who draw back unto perdition, but of them that believe to the saving of the soul."

Dear brethren, let our prayer be, Lord, increase our faith. Patience is lacking among the people. Let us pray the Lord for more patience, and more love to God and to one another. Thy brother,

Goffstown, N. H. BENJ. P. MANNING.

From Sr. A. E. Smith.

DEAR SISTERS:—As nearly all the preaching sisters from whom I have heard and who would wish to attend this convention are just now laboring in blessed revivals, and many of them feel it would not be wisdom to leave those places of labor while the Spirit is being poured out so blessedly,—we have come to the conclusion to go on with our work where the Lord has placed us, and postpone our "Meeting" till the Wilbraham campmeeting, that is, if time continues so long. Praise the Lord! my heart bounds with joy at the thought of seeing Jesus so soon.

We are now enjoying a most blessed revival at Nyack, forty miles up the Hudson river. They come two and three miles by night to hear about the coming of the Lord; and there are from four to ten forward every night. Pray for us. ANNA E. SMITH.

Obituaries.

TUCKER. Died in East Thompson, Feb. 2d, Bro. Silas Tucker, aged sixty-one years.

Also, March 7th, his wife, Esther Tucker, aged fifty-five years.

March 9th, Ida, grand-daughter, aged twelve years and six months.

Thus within five weeks a whole family is cut down by the relentless hand of death, and consigned to the narrow limits of the grave. Bro. Tucker was a very healthy man, but in one week the terrible disease, typhoid pneumonia, laid him down in death's sound sleep. Sr. Tucker, weakened in body by a long chronic disease, and weighed down in spirits by the sudden death of her affectionate husband, fell an easy prey to the devouring enemy. She had a strong desire to live to see the Lord come; was much interested in the time; but she will see her Lord at the time appointed, and the living will not go first. Ida was instructed to look to Jesus and be saved. She said, "Jesus has saved me." We believe all this family rest in hope, with two daughters who died several years ago; and we hope to meet them all in that undefiled inheritance. E. BELLOWS.

WALKER. Died in Lynn, Mass., Feb. 26th, Fannie C., wife of Albert H. Walker, aged twenty years and six months.

Fannie sleeps, her sufferings all are o'er;
She sleeps to wake on earth no more,
Thus taken from our sight away,
Her sleep has come while yet 'tis day.

Fannie sleeps the silent sleep of death,
Her pulse is still, and hushed her breath;
Her eyes are shut, no more to weep,
She sleeps the last and dreamless sleep.

Fannie sleeps in Jesus and is blest,
From sin and suffering now to rest;
How sweet her slumbers are,
When freed from every care.

Fannie sleeps, but will she never wake?
Yes, Jesus will her slumbers break,
His voice will speak all suffering o'er,
Then she'll awake, to die no more.

A. H. WALKER.

TULLY. Died in Portsmouth, N. H., Jan. 29th, Sr. Rebecca Tully, aged thirty-seven years.

Sr. Tully was a member of the Episcopal Church for twenty years, but embraced the doctrine of the near coming of Christ and the sleep of the saints about two years since. She met death with christian composure, expecting victory at the resurrection of the just. JOSEPH W. WHITE.

WHEELER. Fell asleep in Jesus at Dubuque, Iowa, Feb. 24th, our little grand-daughter, Ellie, and daughter of John and Rowena M. Wheeler, aged ten years, seven months, and twenty-four days.

Though so young, she made arrangements for her funeral, and selected a hymn to be sung on the occasion,—

"I'm going home to die no more."

We therefore sorrow not as those which have no hope. N. SHAW KETCHUM.

Summary of News.

FOREIGN.

Liverpool, March 10. Politics to-day unimportant.

Queen Victoria held her first court yesterday.

London, March 11. The Gazette gives a report that Austria has solicited the good offices of England to effect an amicable settlement of the question of the Duchies between Austria and Prussia. The Gazette says the relations of Vienna and Berlin are strained very tightly, but it is a long way from diplomatic conflict to war.

The first sitting of the conference on the Principalities was held at Paris on the 10th inst. All the Powers who signed the Paris treaty were represented. The rumored concentration of Russian troops on the Pruth is denied. Not a single regiment has left its winter quarters.

The insurgents in Syria have all made their submission to the Turks.

ITALY.—The Florence correspondent of the New York World represents Italy as about to become the scene of great movements, growing out of the Pope's reconciliation with Victor Emmanuel. The writer says that the reception everywhere given to the Pope's Encyclical has opened its author's eyes to the impossibility of forcing reactionary dogmas on the mind of Europe. Another enlightening measure was King Victor's banishing certain Bishops nominated by the Pope, and the people's acquiescing in it. The writer says:

"King Victor's envoy, Vegezzi, was sent to Rome, on an intimation that the Pope would be willing to confer with him. He was most kindly received, and treated with the greatest distinction. All sorts of courtesies were showered upon the representative of the sovereign who, but a short year ago, was denounced by all the papal court as worse than an infidel. One of the Pope's crimson state carriages was sent every day to take him to the Vatican.

He returned a week ago—but is to go back shortly to Rome; and it is understood that Cardinal De Andrea, who only six months ago was summoned to answer to the Pope for his recognition of the authority of Victor in Naples, but who is now in the highest favor at Rome, will come to Florence to settle the details of the proposed concordat.

The Pope is himself the active agent in all this extraordinary and most interesting movement. In a moment of enthusiasm he exclaimed the other day to one of the most eminent foreign ministers in Rome:

'By Ascension Day of next year you will see celebrated in Rome such a festival as has not been seen on earth since the days of Charlemagne!'

To his intimate counselors and friends Pope Pius IX. constantly observes: 'I mean to win a mighty name in history. I mean to achieve a great result. It is God who inspires me. That done I can die contented.'

The coronation of Victor Emanuel in the capital by the Pope himself is the great deed here spoken of."

DOMESTIC.

New York, March 24. A Toronto (Canada) dispatch of the 23d says the excitement has quieted down here, though no relaxation is apparent in the preparations for defense. There was almost a panic in Montreal last night, over a report that 19,900 Fenians were moving on Isle Aux Noix. A volunteer from Brockville has been sent to Montreal for admitting himself to be a Fenian.

According to Michael Murphy, the supposed Canadian Head Centre, $85,000 of Fenian bonds have been taken up in Canada. The citizens of Ottawa are still so nervous that night patrols and countersigns are in force.

The left wing of the Canadian army, on the St. Lawrence border, still exhibits great activity, and fresh troops are constantly arriving. The military authorities say that if the Fenians attempt to cross at Ogdensburg they will fire on that city with the guns of Fort Welling, at Prescott.

Small quantities of troops are constantly arriving in Mexico from Europe, and not many are leaving—only such whose time of service is over going away. There are about 30,000 French troops in Mexico, about 10,000 of whom are under Gen. Mejia, who is highly trusted.

OUTRAGEOUS TREATMENT OF FREEDMEN IN KENTUCKY.—A gang of sixteen, mostly of the reconstructed, who had served under Jeff Davis, went to the house of an old man named Ralls, nearly eighty years old, (in Bath county,) who had been a freeman nearly his whole life, beside having always been an exemplary and christian man, "robbed him of his money, kicked him in the belly to death, raked the coals from the fire, put him on, roasted one side, then turned him and roasted the other" (the language of the letter detailing the case). These men boast of their deeds, and boast that they not only intend to drive out the negroes from the State, but that a certain class of white men shall leave too.—Daily Chronicle, Washington, D. C.

FIRE IN THE OIL REGION.—The Meadville Republican of Feb. 8th, 1866, thus describes a fire which is burning at one of the wells, fourteen miles below Franklin, Pa.:—

"Two weeks ago last night the well took fire, and has been burning ever since with no cessation. Sometimes the flame will reach to a height of one hundred feet. It lights up the country for miles around, so that one can see to read a newspaper at a distance of four or five miles. The heat of the fire has started vegetation to growing, and grass can be plucked there as green as that found in summer time."

FROM SALT LAKE.—A letter from the Mormon capital says that for a year the "Gentiles" in that locality have enjoyed an independent religious service, Rev. N. McLeod preaching every Sabbath. He has boldly attacked Mormonism and drawn off many of the deluded followers of Brigham Young, especially women. The Mormons flock to hear him, and Brigham's power is evidently on the decline. The letter not only charges him with directing the Mountain Meadow massacre, but says Judge Titan has left for Washington, carrying an order signed by Brigham for the execution of a company of wealthy men who were to start from Salt Lake to California in the Spring.—

☞ One would suppose that the cattle plague was a sufficient scourge for the English farmers, but it now appears that another has been added. In Wiltshire a disease has broken out among the fowls. They are affected with spasms; a yellowish fluid runs from their beaks, and their combs turn black. This new plague causes great alarm.

☞ At an auction sale at a convent near Paris, eight hundred pounds of hair shorn from the heads of young girls who have taken the veil since 1810, brought $6000.

TO CORRESPONDENTS.

Mary A Calkins—Have no more of "Thrilling Narrative."

M. D.—The Examiner is not published now.

A. J. R.—Will be out soon, and the price noticed.

S. Roby—Your monies were received and acknowledged, as usual, among the receipts. Paid to No. 572.

N. Mather—Paid to No. 535.

CASH RECEIPTS FOR THE CRISIS.

To find how your account stands.

The present No. of the Crisis is 547. The No. which follows your name is the No. to which you have paid.

If the No. paid to, is greater than the present No., the difference shows how many weeks you have paid for in advance. If the No. paid to, is less than the present No., the difference shows for how many weeks you owe.

For every week of indebtedness before No. 468, (if any), charge four cents; for every week since No. 468, if less than 26 weeks, five cents; if over 26 weeks, six cents a week (or $3.12 for the year.) From the sum deduct four cents for every dollar, and you have the exact amount due.

THE EXISTENCE OF HOLY ANGELS; their Origin, Nature, Rank and Titles; their Ministry and Various Offices, in the work of Human Redemption, and in the Administration of the Government of God. By Wm. Shepherd. 20c.

...ternally blessed existence is by it made sure. But yet I know full well that I write to those who have deeply realized the broad, scriptural difference between such a position and the brightness of the firmament, or the transcendent brilliancy of stars, which with eternally increasing lustre approximate nearer and yet more near the effulgence of the eternal throne, upon which the Lord God and the Lamb shall sit, when he, i. e., Christ, shall have delivered up the kingdom to God the Father, and God becomes all in all. And shall I not here be allowed to sing, with the much loved Isaac Watts, in view of this,—

> "Prepare my thrones,
> And on them place
> My patriots and my sons."

Yes, for Jesus says, Ye that have followed me, in the regeneration, when the Son of man shall sit upon the throne of his glory, ye also shall sit upon . . . thrones," etc., etc. And now is it too much to anticipate Jesus, saying, Haste, then, and all hail! ye chariots of Jehovah, even those thousands of angels, and gather in the elect? For the holy city has long been trodden under the foot of the Gentiles, the tabernacle of David has long lain in ruins, its scattered nobles have long wept over its desolations, and with intense longing have inquired, When shall the law again go forth from Zion, and the word of the Lord from Jerusalem? how long ere the lawful heir shall return, for he has been gone a long, long time. How long ere he who is higher than the kings of earth shall give us the land that the Lord swore unto our Fathers, Abraham, Isaac and Jacob, to give it to them for an everlasting possession? O! happy is that people in such a case!

> "Then will we wait, nor think too long
> The closing hours of day."

And now one word to God's hidden ones. Ye mothers in the far-off wilds, remote from the privileges of which I have spoken, cheer up, for already are the distant rumbling wheels of his chariot of state distinctly heard in the distance, and each returning day contributes its quota of indisputable evidence that He cometh quickly, and the last pang of the church's anguish will be gone forever. O, take courage! The fruit of those many sincere, believing prayers, which have gone up to the mercy seat from your lonely dwellings or cabins in the wilds of Canada, or the sunny South, where despotism in its worst form has hitherto shed its blighting prohibitions over the bodies and souls of men; cheer up! your chains are now knocked off; from your plantation homes you can now pour into the ears of the Lord of Sabaoth, your songs and your complaints. You see he has looked upon your wrongs, and heard your groanings; therefore be assured he will reward every pious act, and will gather you with his saints, when all your former troubles will not be remembered, nor come into mind.

May the grace of our Lord Jesus Christ be with all the dear saints. For behold He cometh!

BRO. GRANT:—On the evenings of the 27th and 28th of February, the little band in Barre, who are looking for the soon coming of the great God and our Savior Jesus Christ, were highly entertained with the privilege of listening to two discourses from Bro. Turner. The house was crowded with saints and sinners. The saints esteemed it as a feast on the way to the kingdom. It was good to be there. It put me in mind of what our Savior said to Peter,—"Feed my sheep." It was like one feeding the hungry. How cheering it is to be fed with the crumbs from our Master's table. This food is food indeed. Its effects are nourishing and invigorating to every happy receiver. It endureth unto everlasting life. It differs very much from the popular preaching of the day. It is not mixed with creeds and the vain philosophy of men. Hallelujah to the Lamb!

After enjoying these two sermons preached by Bro. Turner, a goodly number of the saints met at Bro. Grinell's to partake of the Lord's Supper. It was a solemn time. After partaking of the broken body of Christ, and drinking of his blood, we then listened to the testimonies of the saints. Their hearts seemed to be full of the love and spirit of God. They are looking forward for the blessed return of our Lord and Savior Jesus Christ, when he shall reward his children and punish his foes. My prayer is, this morning, that love may ever drive our chariot wheels; for he that loveth is born of God. May God ever keep us low down in the valley of humiliation, for he resisteth the proud and giveth grace to the humble. I feel like calling upon all within me to praise his name. I am thankful that my heavenly Father ever gave me a heart to love and serve him. I am glad, also, that he taught me my need of a Savior. He has done infinitely more for me than he would if he had given me worlds like this.

From Sr. R. W. Jordan.

BRO. GRANT:—I was very glad to see that article in the Crisis of Feb. 28th, as it so fully coincides with my views on the subject of prayer and "fasting." Permit me to offer a few remarks on the same. Not that I wish to boast that "I fast twice in the week, and pay tithes of all that I possess"; but believing as I do that fasting, when accompanied with prayer, is one of the most effectual means of enlarging our faith, and increasing our spiritual strength, I feel very anxious that all who are seeking to purchase gold tried in the fire, and white raiment, should fully realize the benefit to be derived therefrom.

When I came to fully believe that the time had arrived when we might know that our Judge stood even at the door, I felt that, entering as I had the narrow way at the eleventh hour, I wished to improve every means of grace, lest my Master should come and still find me unprepared. I said, How shall I wean myself from the love of the world, and place my affections on things which are eternal? How shall I attain that humility which is pleasing in his sight? And by reading the lessons that our Savior left us, I was convinced that fasting was one of the requisitions which he intended his followers to comply with in his absence.

We read in Joel 2: 12,—"Therefore, now, saith the Lord, turn ye even to me with all your hearts, and with fasting." And in Ps. 35: 13, David said, "I humbled my soul with fasting." Also, Ezra 8: 21, and portions of vers. 22, 23,—"Then I proclaimed a fast there at the river of Ahava, that we might afflict ourselves before our God, to seek of him a right way for us, and for our little ones, and for our substance. . . . Because we had spoken unto the king saying, The hand of our God is upon all them for good that seek him. . . ." So we fasted, and besought our God for this, and he was entreated of us." Then let us believe that "he is the same yesterday, to-day, and for ever," and "turn to him with all our hearts, and with fasting," believing that he will also "be entreated of us."

Our Bro. asks, "Is this a heavy burden, a hard yoke to bear?" I for one can answer, that it is not, for if we come in the full assurance of faith, resting in that calm and abiding trust upon his promises, as it is our duty and privilege to do at all times, we shall feel no inclination for either food or drink, but shall be able to adopt the language of our Savior when he said, "I have meat to eat that ye know not of." I know that we can easily fast over one day, and even two, and attend to all our duties as usual. I have derived such blessings, and experienced such signal answers to prayer at such seasons, even in the short time that I have practised fasting occasionally, which has been only about one year, that nothing in this life will induce me to discontinue the practise, not at regular intervals, but when I feel it my duty. I believe the stronger our faith is, the longer we can fast without feeling any inconvenience therefrom.

If we cannot deny ourselves enough to fast at least one day occasionally, let us fear lest we be sowing to the flesh instead of the Spirit, and that we have not yet attained to that faith which we shall need to stand before our Judge uncondemned. I would not have any one to understand that I think I have arrived at perfection; far from it; I would humbly confess my weakness, my unworthiness. But I do have faith to believe that I shall yet, through His grace, be found worthy of a place at his right hand.

We read in Rom. 8: 13, "If ye live after the flesh, ye shall die; but if ye through the Spirit do mortify the deeds of the body, ye shall live." Therefore, I do pray that we may be enabled to sow to the Spirit, that we may of the Spirit reap life everlasting.

Casco, Me. R. W. JORDAN.

From Bro. J. H. Muhlig.

BRO. GRANT:—I have been laboring for the Lord, for two weeks past, at East Abington. I was invited there by a Methodist brother. There is no Methodist church in that place, so I held my meetings from house to house, every evening, wherever a door was opened. The meetings were thinly attended the first week, but the interest kept increasing steadily, until we had crowded houses. The people seem really waked up in relation to the things pertaining to the kingdom.

I met with Bro. Reuben Burrill and wife, who helped me much by carrying me to the meetings, which were some two miles apart. He has been very sick for the last nine months, and is just able to get about again. The good Lord reward him and his household for their kindness to me, a stranger in a strange place.

On Saturday evening, Feb 24th, I preached at Hanover, according to appointment. Arrived there late, but found the house crowded. The Baptist minister (Bro. Reed) was present and took part in the meeting. I preached from John 11: 14; had a melting season; the Lord was with us. I found two old pilgrim sisters, who rejoiced aloud in God; they love the welcome sound of coming redemption.

The friends wanted me to stay longer with them. Sunday evening (25th) called on Bro. Reed (Baptist minister) and asked for the use of the vestry of his house. He very readily consented, and seemed much pleased; seems waked up to the work of saving souls. I feel to praise God that the people's ears are not entirely closed to the truth.

Sunday, 25th. Preached in Manson Hall, East Abington. Subject in the morning, Do the Scriptures teach the immortality of the human soul? Afternoon, Do the Scriptures teach the eternal misery of the finally impenitent? Evening, The resurrection of the dead. Many questions were asked and answered. The hall seats about six hundred; every seat was taken and seventy-five or one hundred had to stand.

I shall return to Hanover and labor as long as it is for the glory of the Master. The door of mercy is not shut yet, nor will it be till Jesus comes. I ask the prayers of those who have faith in prayer, that my labors may be owned and blessed of God.

BRO. GRANT:—We are deeply bereaved, but the Spirit comforts, and in our sorrow we have joy. The Lord is with us by his Spirit indeed, and in truth, and the sinner is trembling before him. O! we bless and praise his holy name for his word and very precious promises. How gloriously does it shine upon our pathway, and we pray that it may shine brighter and brighter unto the perfect day, "until the day dawn, and the daystar arise in our hearts"; when we will no longer need it, the perfect having come. And we rejoice with full hearts to know that it is so soon. We have trials, but they are so lightened by our joys that we scarcely feel them. The thought of being kings and priests unto God and His Father (Rev. 1: 6; 20: 6), ravishes my whole being. Hallelujah! O! will that not reverberate through the wide canopy of the "New Heavens"? My soul! what a song! "Alleluia; for the Lord God omnipotent reigneth!" Rev. 19: 6. Yours in love, J. C. RICE.

Hillsburgh, N. S.

From Sr. S. D. Ackerman.

Dear Brn. and Srs. scattered abroad:—Through the Crisis, I feel it my duty to confess to the world, by relating my experience, the care our ever blessed Lord has for his children.

About three years ago, I was prostrated with disease, which was pronounced by different physicians as incurable; that I could never be well again, and could only hope to be comfortable by living easy, and having constant medical treatment.

In this way I lived for two years and more, sometimes confined to my bed, at others able to be about, but always a sufferer.

About the middle of Oct., 1865, I felt very strongly impressed that it was my duty to lay aside my medicine, and look to Jesus, the great Physician, to be healed. I immediately obeyed, laying aside all medicines, of which I had a fresh supply. I went to my closet, kneeled in prayer, and sought of God the blessing I so much desired. I said, Lord, if thou wilt, thou canst make me whole. Immediately the answer came, "I will. Be it unto thee according to thy faith." I arose, filled with peace, with perfect faith that God would do for me all I had asked; and, blessed be God, I began to mend from that very hour; and to-day I can say, I am well.

The disease which had so long preyed upon me is entirely removed, and I am healed. I believe it is all through the intercession of Christ for me; and I would say to the dear suffering ones, look to Jesus with faith believing, and you shall be healed. Glory to God! Your sister waiting for Jesus,

SUSAN D. ACKERMAN.

Derry, N. H., Mar. 12th, 1866.

From Bro. B. P. Manning.

BRO. GRANT:—I praise God that I am gaining my health a little, in answer to the prayers of the dear saints; still I am not able to labor much with my hands, nor in the vineyard of the Lord; but I hope I shall be soon. Keep praying for me, dear brethren, that the Lord will give me perfect health, that I may do some little good before he comes. How it rejoices my heart to hear of the good work of the Lord that is going on in different places; and my prayer is that the Lord will send the Holy Ghost this way, into New Hampshire, and revive pure religion in the hearts of the professed people of God. It is sad to see the low state of things, or rather hear of it from the dear brethren in different parts of the States. But Jesus will soon come and take his bride to himself.

My brethren, are we all ready to meet him at the judgment seat? If not, it is time that we were. Are you trying to keep the commandments of the Lord, so that if he should come sooner than you expected you can say from the heart, "Lo, this is our God, we have waited for him, and he will save us"? Remember the words of Paul in Heb. 10: 25,—"Forsaking not the assembling of ourselves together, as the manner of some is; but exhorting one another, and so much the more as ye see the day approaching." 35th verse, "Cast not away your confidence, which hath great recompense of reward. For ye have need of patience, that, after ye have done the will of God, ye might receive the promise. For yet a little while, and he that shall come, will come, and will not tarry. Now the just shall live by faith; but if any man draw back, my soul shall have no pleasure in him. But we are not of them who draw back unto perdition, but of them that believe to the saving of the soul."

Dear brethren, let our prayer be, Lord, increase our faith. Patience is lacking among the people. Let us pray the Lord for more patience, and more love to God and to one another. Thy brother,

Goffstown, N. H. BENJ P. MANNING.

From Sr. A. E. Smith.

DEAR SISTERS:—As nearly all the preaching sisters from whom I have heard and who would wish to attend this convention are just now laboring in blessed revivals, and many of them feel it would not be wisdom to leave those places of labor while the Spirit is being poured out so blessedly,—we have come to the conclusion to go on with our work where the Lord has placed us, and postpone our "Meeting" till the Wilbraham campmeeting, that is, if time continues so long. Praise the Lord! my heart bounds with joy at the thought of seeing Jesus so soon.

We are now enjoying a most blessed revival at Nyack, forty miles up the Hudson river. They come two and three miles by night to hear about the coming of the Lord; and there are from four to ten forward every night. Pray for us. ANNA E. SMITH.

Obituaries.

TUCKER. Died in East Thompson, Feb. 2d, Bro. Silas Tucker, aged sixty-one years.

Also, March 7th, his wife, Esther Tucker, aged fifty-five years.

March 9th, Ida, grand-daughter, aged twelve years and six months.

Thus within five weeks a whole family is cut down by the relentless hand of death, and consigned to the narrow limits of the grave. Bro. Tucker was a very healthy man, but in one week the terrible disease, typhoid pneumonia, laid him down in death's sound sleep. Sr. Tucker, weakened in body by a long chronic disease, and weighed down in spirits by the sudden death of her affectionate husband, fell an easy prey to the devouring enemy. She had a strong desire to live to see the Lord come; was much interested in the time; but she will see her Lord at the time appointed, and the living will not go first. Ida was instructed to look to Jesus and be saved. She said, "Jesus has saved me." We believe all this family rest in hope, with two daughters who died several years ago; and we hope to meet them all in that undefiled inheritance. E. BELLOWS.

WALKER. Died in Lynn, Mass., Feb. 26th, Fannie C., wife of Albert H. Walker, aged twenty years and six months.

> Fannie sleeps, her sufferings all are o'er;
> She sleeps to wake on earth no more;
> Thus taken from our sight away,
> Her sleep has come while yet 'twas day.
>
> Fannie sleeps the silent sleep of death;
> Her pulse is still, and hushed her breath;
> Her eyes are shut, no more to weep,
> She sleeps the last and dreamless sleep.
>
> Fannie sleeps in Jesus and is blest,
> From sin and suffering now to rest;
> How sweet her slumbers are,
> When freed from every care.
> Fannie sleeps, but will she never wake?
> Yes, Jesus will her slumbers break;
> His voice will speak all suffering o'er,
> Then she'll awake, to die no more.

A. H. WALKER.

TULLY. Died in Portsmouth, N. H., Jan. 29th, Sr. Rebecca Tully, aged thirty-seven years.

Sr. Tully was a member of the Episcopal Church for twenty years, but embraced the doctrine of the near coming of Christ and the sleep of the saints about two years since. She met death with christian composure, expecting victory at the resurrection of the just. JOSEPH W. WHITE.

WHEELER. Fell asleep in Jesus at Dubuque, Iowa, Feb. 24th, our little grand-daughter, Ellie, and daughter of John and Rowena M. Wheeler, aged ten years, seven months, and twenty-four days.

Though so young, she made arrangements for her funeral, and selected a hymn to be sung on the occasion,—

> "I'm going home to die no more."

We therefore sorrow not as those which have no hope. N. SHAW KETCHUM.

☞ There is a plague of mice this spring in Ohio. They have attacked the fruit trees in some sections, and destroyed over five thousand trees. They are so thick that in passing through the fields in some places they scatter before you in every direction.

The New York World say "trichinosis" has appeared in the pork establishments of that city, and eight pork butchers have discontinued purchases and gone into the beef and mutton business.

Summary of News.

FOREIGN.

Liverpool, March 10. Politics to-day unimportant.

Queen Victoria held her first court yesterday.

London, March 11. The Gazette gives a report that Austria has solicited the good offices of England to effect an amicable settlement of the question of the Duchies between Austria and Prussia. The Gazette says the relations of Vienna and Berlin are strained very tightly, but it is a long way from diplomatic conflict to war.

The first sitting of the conference on the Principalities was held at Paris on the 10th inst. All the Powers who signed the Paris treaty were represented. The rumored concentration of Russian troops on the Pruth is denied. Not a single regiment has left its winter quarters.

The insurgents in Syria have all made their submission to the Turks.

ITALY.—The Florence correspondent of the New York World represents Italy as about to become the scene of great movements, growing out of the Pope's reconciliation with Victor Emmanuel. The writer says that the reception everywhere given to the Pope's Encyclical has opened its author's eyes to the impossibility of forcing reactionary dogmas on the mind of Europe. Another enlightening measure was King Victor's banishing certain Bishops nominated by the Pope, and the people's acquiescing in it. The writer says:

"King Victor's envoy, Vegezzi, was sent to Rome, on an intimation that the Pope would be willing to confer with him. He was most kindly received, and treated with the greatest distinction. All sorts of courtesies were showered upon the representative of the sovereign who, but a short year ago, was denounced by all the papal court as worse than an infidel. One of the Pope's crimson state carriages was sent every day to take him to the Vatican.

He returned a week ago—but is to go back shortly to Rome; and it is understood that Cardinal De Andrea, who only six months ago was summoned to answer to the Pope for his recognition of the authority of Victor in Naples, but who is now in the highest favor at Rome, will come to Florence to settle the details of the proposed concordat.

The Pope is himself the active agent in all this extraordinary and most interesting movement. In a moment of enthusiasm he exclaimed the other day to one of the most eminent foreign ministers in Rome:

'By Ascension Day of next year you will see celebrated in Rome such a festival as has not been seen on earth since the days of Charlemagne!'

To his intimate counselors and friends Pope Pius IX. constantly observes: 'I mean to win a mighty name in history. I mean to achieve a great result. It is God who inspires me. That done I can die contented!'

The coronation of Victor Emanuel in the capital by the Pope himself is the great deed here spoken of."

DOMESTIC.

New York, March 24. A Toronto (Canada) dispatch of the 23d says the excitement has quieted down here, though no relaxation is apparent in the preparations for defense. There was almost a panic in Montreal last night, over a report that 19,000 Fenians were moving on Isle Aux Noix. A volunteer from Brockville has been sent to Montreal for admitting himself to be a Fenian.

According to Michael Murphy, the supposed Canadian Head Centre, $85,000 of Fenian bonds have been taken up in Canada. The citizens of Ottawa are still so nervous that night patrols and countersigns are in force.

The left wing of the Canadian army, on the St. Lawrence border, still exhibits great activity, and fresh troops are constantly arriving. The military authorities say that if the Fenians attempt to cross at Ogdensburg they will fire on that city with the guns of Fort Welling, at Prescott.

Small quantities of troops are constantly arriving in Mexico from Europe, and not many are leaving—only such whose time of service is over going away. There are about 30,000 French troops in Mexico, about 10,000 of whom are under Gen. Mejia, who is highly trusted.

OUTRAGEOUS TREATMENT OF FREEDMEN IN KENTUCKY.—A gang of sixteen, mostly of the reconstructed, who had served under Jeff. Davis, went to the house of an old man named Ralls, nearly eighty years old, (in Bath county,) who had been a freeman nearly his whole life, beside having always been an exemplary and christian man, "robbed him of his money, kicked him in the belly to death, raked the coals from the fire, put him on, roasted one side, then turned him and roasted the other" (the language of the letter detailing the case.) These men boast of their deeds, and boast that they not only intend to drive out the negroes from the State, but that a certain class of white men shall leave too.—Daily Chronicle, Washington, D. C.

FIRE IN THE OIL REGION.—The Meadville Republican of Feb. 8th, 1866, thus describes a fire which is burning at one of the wells, fourteen miles below Franklin, Pa:—

"Two weeks ago last night the well took fire, and has been burning ever since with no cessation. Sometimes the flame will reach to a height of one hundred feet. It lights up the country for miles around, so that one can see to read a newspaper at a distance of four or five miles. The heat of the fire has started vegetation to growing, and grass can be plucked there as green as that found in summer time."

FROM SALT LAKE.—A letter from the Mormon capital says that for a year the "Gentiles" in that locality have enjoyed an independent religious service, Rev. N. McLeod preaching every Sabbath. He has boldly attacked Mormonism and drawn off many of the deluded followers of Brigham Young, especially women. The Mormons flock to hear him, and Brigham's power is evidently on the decline. The letter not only charges him with directing the Mountain Meadow massacre, but says Judge Titan has left for Washington, carrying an order signed by Brigham for the execution of a company of wealthy men who were to start from Salt Lake to California in the Spring.—

☞ One would suppose that the cattle plague was a sufficient scourge for the English farmers, but it now appears that another has been added. In Wiltshire a disease has broken out among the fowls. They are affected with spasms; a yellowish fluid runs from their beaks, and their combs turn black. This new plague causes great alarm.

☞ At an auction sale at a convent near Paris, eight hundred pounds of hair shorn from the heads of young girls who have taken the veil since 1810, brought $6000.

☞ "The Social Hymns are just the thing to carry into a new place."

S. Roby—Your monies were received and acknowledged, as usual, among the receipts. Paid to No. 572.

N. Mather—Paid to No. 535.

CASH RECEIPTS FOR THE CRISIS.

To find how your account stands.

The present No. of the Crisis is 547. The No. which follows your name is the No. to which you have paid. If the No. paid to, is greater than the present No., the difference shows how many weeks you have paid for in advance. If the No. paid to, is less than the present No., the difference shows for how many weeks you owe. For every week of indebtedness before No. 468, (I. any), charge four cents; for every week since No. 468, if less than 26 weeks, five cents; if over 26 weeks, six cents a week (or $3.12 for the year.) From the sum deduct four cents for every dollar, and you have the exact amount due.

HOUR OF PRAYER.

O, if there is an hour
When angels visit earth,
'Tis when eve's bright dews shower
Their gems on folded flower,
And hushed day's voice of mirth,
With all its weary care;
The blessed hour of rest—
When, on the silent air,
The low, sweet voice of prayer
Rises from every grateful breast.
Yes, when birds seek their nests
At day's sweet closing hour,
And grief is lulled to rest,
Then angels are our guests,
If e'er they visit mortal bower.
O, blessed hour of prayer!
Season of happy rest,
When we to God repair,
Angel delights to share
With heaven, and ever blest.

THE FREEDMEN'S MISSION.

LETTER FROM BRO. FLAGG.

DEAR BRN. AND SRS. :—Quite a long time has elapsed since my last letter to the Crisis. And I doubt not some of you may be anxious to know something more about the condition of the Freedmen, and what the Lord is doing for them.

When I sent my last letter to the Crisis, I was just leaving for Memphis, Tenn. On my way, I stopped two days at Cairo, southern Ill., waiting for the boat. While there, I visited many of the Freedmen living at that place, who, during the war, were driven there for safety. As the place is quite large, and fast increasing, being situated at the junction of the Ohio and Mississippi rivers; it affords an abundance of labor, offering a good inducement for the Freedmen to remain.

Leaving that place Saturday evening, Jan. 6th, after two nights' and one day's ride down the Mississippi. I arrived at Memphis Monday morning, about 9 A. M. I found Bro. Himes stopping at Bro. Bywater's, about one mile east from the river. We took a stroll together through the suburbs of the city, visiting and taking a look at the thousands of Freedmen living in the suburban districts of the city proper; and seeking to obtain, by observation and inquiry, such information as might be useful in aiding ourselves and others in the great work of improving the condition of the Freedmen. During my short stay there, I lost no time, so far as I was able, to gather as much information as possible in relation to the condition, habits, morals and prospects of the thousands of Freedmen living in and around the city of Memphis; a brief notice of which may not be uninteresting to you.

THEIR MORAL CONDITION.

Among all the Freedmen I have visited, there appears to be a kind feeling towards each other, with a disposition to assist and aid each other amid their hardships, far more than is usually found among white people with superior advantages. And, although there are comparatively very few among them who can read or write, yet, with few exceptions, there can be found at least one in, or connected with, almost every family, who can read and write. And whenever they receive a paper, book, or religious tract, the one who can read will do so in the hearing of others, who will sit around and listen with interest. Those who can read appear to be very fond of books or religious tracts, which they promise to read in the hearing of their friends. In passing their houses, you will often hear them singing some of their religious hymns, which are so full of peculiar sweetness and melody, that you almost feel ashamed to sing in their presence. And I must say, since coming among them I seldom sing; and if I do, I am careful not to be heard much. This much is not only true of the African people at Memphis, but also of St. Louis; and from what I can learn from the Freedmen themselves, it is true of them all.

THEIR EMPLOYMENT AT MEMPHIS.

Many, if not most of the women, take in washing from the white people, for which they receive $1.50 per day. Many of the Freedmen own a mule and dray, with which they earn from four to ten dollars a day. Others work in various kinds of business as formerly, but for such wages as they can get. In one of their shanties, I saw a young married woman making a bed-quilt on the floor from some old ragged coarse cloth, putting inside a very thick wadding of the very nicest white cotton, which she had picked up about the city and by the side of the roads, there being large quantities scattered from the great number of loads continually coming into the city every day; some already pressed and baled out in the country, and others brought to the city packed in crockery crates and other ways, to be pressed and baled in the city for shipping.

THEIR HOUSES AND RENTS.

Most of the Freedmen live in the suburbs encircling the city, from a mile to a mile and a half from the city proper. Their houses are mere shanties, made of the poorest rough boards, set up endwise, like a woodshed or a barn. Many of them are without any windows; consequently without any light except what they get from the door, which is set open for that purpose. There is not a single timber inside of the house; and the roof rests upon the top of the boards, which are only held together by a narrow strip of cross board, running around the building, to which the others are nailed. The roof is simply covered with what might be called shingles, three feet in length, and having the exact appearance of barrel staves, just as they are split out, without being shaved or planed. These rest upon small rafters, made of round poles, about the size of large hoop poles. Three of these layers will cover one side of a building, ten and a half feet wide. The average length of their buildings is seventeen feet. The boards, running up to the roof on the end of the building, are left square, instead of being cut with a bevel so as to fit the roof; thus leaving a three-cornered hole big enough to put your hat through. The chimney runs up a little way on the outside. The houses are neither lathed nor plastered, which leaves them full of holes and cracks all around the building. The doors are make like those of the cheapest barns. Shanties of this kind, one mile from the city, rent from $75 to $120 dollars a year. There are many other shanties, made a little better, but precisely on the same plan, and rent much higher. None that I have seen have but one room. Shanties four times as large, and built on the same plan, having four rooms, each room designed for a family, rent from five to six hundred dollars a year.

THE CLIMATE.

The climate is such at Memphis, that even with these houses the inmates can live comparatively warm, and do not suffer in that respect like thousands of poor people we have at the north, where it is much colder. It is not so cold here but that the magnolia tree, which grows about the city (such as we have for house plants at the north), grows here as large as a horse chestnut; and the leaves, which are very large, are just as green during winter as in summer. And I have seen, in many of the front yards, rose and other bushes with their green foliage as at the first of Sept. north.

After a stay of one short week at Memphis, I deemed it more expedient for me to return to St. Louis, mostly for two very good reasons: First, my health was so poor, on account of the warm climate and damp atmosphere, that I was not able to go out to a single evening meeting. And second, I did not feel satisfied to go away and leave the Freedmen of St. Louis, where my labors had been blest with a fair prospect of continued labor with good results. Besides, every thing was so high at Memphis, that my scanty means, with no prospect of any increase, afforded me but little encouragement to remain. Board could not be obtained in private families for less than twelve to fifteen dollars a week; and other things in proportion. While at St. Louis, I pay but five dollars a week for my board, not including my washing, which the colored sisters are very willing to do free. But while I did remain at Memphis, I lost no time, so far as I was able, in visiting the Freedmen, and learning as much as I could of their condition, habits, and general history. And from all the information I obtained from various sources, I think I am fully justified in saying that Memphis presents as promiscuous a class of Freedmen as can be found in any other southern city; having come, during and since the war, from all the surrounding States.

There you find men and women who have toiled all their lives in the cotton and other fields, under the lash and burning sun; commencing work at daylight, and ceasing only at dark; having no other shelter at night but a poor hovel, no better than the barns we build for our cattle. This class have been treated like cattle, having but little or no better advantages; and consequently are very ignorant. Still, among this class can be found a fair number who can read the Bible and other books to their comrades and friends. And also among this class can be found as many, according to their number, who enjoy the life and power of religion, as any other class who enjoy superior advantages. And among this class, even, I have frequently seen a Bible lying upon their tables or window sills; and I would ask them if they could read? Sometimes they would answer, Yes, I can read a little. At other times they would say they could not read, but that they had a husband, son or daughter, or some other friend, who could and often did read the Bible to them.

I think, on the whole, notwithstanding their ignorance and the inferior advantages which they have had, there are many more among them in proportion to their number who are not only living up to the light they have, but are doing more towards winning souls to Christ than an equal number among any other class of people whose advantages and facilities for doing good are very far superior to theirs. And with all the disadvantages they must necessarily suffer, in not being able to read and write, there is one great advantage to be gained in preaching the plain, pure gospel, with all its doctrines and prophecies, unto them, for the simple reason that their minds have not been poisoned and embittered against the most precious and glorious truths of the gospel of the kingdom, by the knowledge they might have obtained by reading from the multitude of theological books and tracts so pregnant with infidelic creeds, traditions, and satanic systems of modern theology, so universal throughout all the different branches of modern literature. And I never have met with a people in my life who are so free from prejudice, and receive the gospel with so much delight, as those who can neither read nor write. And as astonishing as it may appear to those enjoying all the superior advantages of an education, it is nevertheless true that they can and do understand the Bible, seemingly, just as well as those who can read. And they are as ready to discover the least discrepancy in a scriptural argument as any others. And they are just as particular in having a plain "Thus saith the Lord" for every thing you preach, as any people I ever met with. And although a common education, to say the least, is very much needed among them, and by them greatly desired; nevertheless, it is not a thing which is absolutely necessary for them to have as a prerequisite, in order to understand and appreciate all the doctrines, instructions and prophecies of the Bible, when preached to them in a plain, easy manner, according to the simplicity of the gospel.

And, if the coming of Jesus Christ to judgment is as near as we profess to believe, then we, as the stewards of God, should lose no time in giving to them the gospel of the kingdom, in preference to every thing else, to the extent of all our means, as the only thing that has the life and power of salvation in bringing them into a condition to meet their God in peace. And this agrees fully with the plain instructions of our Savior, "But seek ye first the kingdom of God, and his righteousness, and all these things shall be added unto you." Matt. 6 : 33.

THE WORK AT ST. LOUIS.

I came back to this place from Memphis, Jan. 16th. I found the good work going on and spreading among the African churches of the city. On my return to this place, some of the colored people informed me that praying and singing of spiritual songs and hymns could be heard in almost every lane and alley. For the colored people, instead of living in the streets of the city, live mostly in the lanes and alleys, in small houses, such as were built for them by their owners when they were slaves. But since they have become free, they hire the same houses, paying from $48 to $72 a year for only one room. And I never felt the force of our Savior's words, to go out quickly into the lanes and alleys, till I came among the poor Freedmen.

The African brethren inform me that there never was such a waking up throughout the city among that class as now. In the Methodist colored church, on 11th St., where Bro. Himes and myself both preached when we first came to the city, they are now having a great revival. One hundred and eight converts have already come out on the Lord's side. The work is still going on. In the colored Baptist church on 8th St., a powerful work is going on. Last Sunday week thirty-six were baptized there. And in the 7th St. African church, where I have labored principally, the work has been going on from the first. But it is impossible to tell how many have been converted to God; and very many of them have united with the other churches. But I met with converts all through the city who are praising God for free salvation.

I have tried in vain for nearly six weeks to hire a church, a hall, or a large vacant store, or storage house, where I could preach and feel perfectly free. If I could have succeeded, I have no doubt I could have had three hundred members in a few weeks. But I have given up all hopes of obtaining any place of my own to worship in, for the present. I have tried in the wisdom of God to be faithful in my mission of labor and love. I have tried to preach the great crowning truths of the gospel in relation to Christ's speedy coming and kingdom. And I think I am justified in saying that a good number of the outcast and down-trodden have been blest and sanctified through those truths.

I have become attached to the African people of this city; and although I am preparing to leave for the East, I have promised to return in the fall, the Lord willing, and build or hire some place to worship in. Those who subscribed for the Crisis are very much delighted with the paper. The paper is doing much good, and those who can read the paper do so in the hearing of those who cannot read.

I am devoting what leisure moments I have in collecting as many of their hymns and melodies as I can to carry with me when I go East. And I have compiled and arranged them in harmony for publication. I have a great many things to tell you. Next Lord's day I expect to preach at Ridge Prairie, where I labored two weeks, since coming out here, with good success. And some time next week I leave for Carlinville, Ill., where I expect to preach one week or more. From there I go to Chicago, Ill., and remain with my youngest brother, who resides there, until March 18th, during which time I intend to preach to the brethren in that city. From there I expect the Lord will want me to work my passage home by preaching the word of life to the brethren and sisters in all such places, on or near my route, as may be desired.

I trust in the will of Providence that I may soon be able to see and talk with you more fully upon those subjects which ought to interest us more than all others, in view of the little time we have to work for the salvation of those living in darkness, concerning the glory that is so soon to be revealed. I do hope and pray, yea, I do believe that the time is speedily coming when our brethren and sisters must see the necessity of giving to the millions of poor Freedmen and others of the South and West, in view of our soon coming King, the gospel, above all other things; by which our own hearts have been made to rejoice, knowing that our redemption is nigh at hand. Your Bro. in Christ, homeward bound to the haven of eternal rest, H. K. FLAGG.

St. Louis, Mo., Feb. 24th, 1866.

P. S.—My heart is made to rejoice exceedingly by the reception of a kind letter of encouragement received from Bro. Grant some two weeks since. It gave me new life and zeal to work. I also received a kind letter of remembrance from Bro. D. D. Chaffee, of So. Wilbraham, Mass., enclosing for me five dollars of the Lord's money. It was received with gratitude. H. K. F.

PARTIES.—THE INJURY THEY DO.

Often when it comes the time of year to work, when the evenings are long, and business is light, and the very time to make an extra effort, at this moment somebody in the church will give a party, and invite some christian friends, so as to have a religious party. And then some other family must do the same to return the compliment. Then another and another, till it grows into an organized system of parties, that consume the whole winter. Abominable! This is the grand device of the devil, because it appears so innocent, and so proper, to promote a good feeling, and increase the acquaintance of christians with each other. And so, instead of prayer meetings, they will have these parties. The evils of these parties are very great. They are often got up at great expense, and the most abominable gluttony is practiced in them. It is said that the expense is from one hundred to two thousand dollars. I have been told in some instances, professed christians have given great parties, and made great entertainments, and excused their ungodly prodigality in the use of Jesus Christ's money, by giving what was left, after the feast was ended, to the poor! thus making it a virtue to feast, and riot, even to surfeiting, on the bounties of God's providence, under pretence of benefiting the poor. This is the same in principle with a splendid ball which was given some years since in a neighboring city. The ball was gotten up for the benefit of the poor, and each gentleman was to pay a certain sum, and after the ball was ended, whatever remained of the funds thus raised, was given to the poor.

Truly, this is a strange charity, to eat and drink and dance, and when they have rioted and feasted until they can enjoy it no longer, they deal out to the poor the crumbs that have fallen from the table. I do not see why such a ball is not quite as pious as such christian parties. The evil of balls does not consist simply in the exercise of dancing, but in the dissipation, and surfeiting, any temptations connected with them. But it is said they are christian parties, and that they are all, or nearly all, professors or religion who attend them. And furthermore that they are concluded often with prayer. Now I regard this as one of the worst features about them; that after the waste of time and money, the excesses in eating and drinking, the vain conversation, and nameless fooleries with which such a season is filled up, an attempt should be made to sanctify it, and palm it off upon God, by concluding it with prayer. Say what you will, it would not be more absurd or incongruous, or impious, to close a ball or a theatre or a card party with prayer. Has it come to this, that professors of religion, professing to desire the salvation of the world, when such calls are made upon them from the four winds of heaven, to send the gospel, to furnish Bibles, and tracts, and missionaries to save the world from death, that they should spend hundreds of dollars in an evening, and then go to the monthly concert and pray for the heathen! In some instances, I have been told they find a salvo for their consciences in the fact that their minister attends their parties. This, of course, would give weight to such an example, and if one professor of religion made a party and invited their minister, others must do the same. The next step they take, may be for each to give a ball, and appoint their minister a manager! Why not? And perhaps, by and by, he will do them the favor to play the fiddle. In my estimation he might quite as well do it as to go and conclude such a party with prayer.

But I should advise any congregation, who are calculating to have a circle of parties, in the meantime to dismiss their minister, and let him go and preach where the people would be ready to receive the word and profit by it, and not have him stay and be distressed, and grieved, and killed by attempting to promote religion among them, while they are heart and hand in the service of the devil. In relation to parties, say what you please about their being an innocent recreation, I appeal to any of you who have ever attended them, to say whether they fit you for prayer, or increase your spirituality, or whether sinners are ever converted in them, or saints made to agonize in prayer for souls?—Rev. C. J. Finney.

GO TELL JESUS.

Bury thy sorrow,
The world has its share,
Bury it deeply,
Hide it with care.

Think of it calmly
When curtained by night,
Tell it to Jesus,
And all will be right.

Gather the sunlight
Aglow on thy way,
Gather the moon-beams,
Each soft silver ray.

Hearts grow weary
With heavier woe,
Droop 'mid the darkness—
Go comfort them, go!

Bury thy sorrow,
Let others be blest,
Give them the sunshine,
Tell Jesus the rest.

THE FIRST DAY SABBATH.

BRO. GRANT:—The following historical facts taken from Gilfillan's celebrated work on "The Sabbath," pp. 368–9, should be well considered by all who would desire a correct view of the christian Sabbath:—

"The history of the earlier centuries of christianity throws light on the meaning of certain Scripture terms which have been the occasion of a vexed question among controversialists. In designating what is now known amongst us as the christian Sabbath, the Fathers make use of names which they never apply to any other day of the week. With them 'the eighth day,' 'the day of the Sun,' 'the first day of the week,' and 'the Lord's day,' signify one particular day and no other. Barnabas, or whoever was the author of the Catholic Epistle ascribed to him, mentions 'the eighth day' as that on which 'Jesus rose from the dead,' and which the christians of his time observed as a festal day.* We are informed by Justin Martyr that the christians of the second century assembled on 'the day of the Sun,' and that they did so 'because on this first day God made the world, and Jesus Christ our Savior rose from the dead.'† The same Father affirms that 'Christ rose from the dead on the eighth day, which,' he adds, 'may be called the eighth and yet remains the first.'‡ In the third century, Cyprian represents the eighth day as both 'the first after the Sabbath, and the Lord's day.'§

"When we compare these passages with each other, we find that 'the eighth day,' 'the day of the Sun,' or Sunday, 'the day of the Redeemer's resurrection,' 'the first day of the week,' and 'the Lord's day,' are, according to the combined testimony of Barnabas, Justin Martyr, and Cyprian, the same day. . . . As 'the Sabbath' had been for so long a time the well known title of the weekly holy day among the Jews, it was obviously needful, for preventing mistake, that the institution which had passed to a new day should have a new name. But as time advanced, and (may not we add) as the Lord's day came to be no longer in danger of being confounded with the Jewish Sabbath, the old name was gradually resumed and attached to the christian holy day."

The above from Gilfillan is in harmony with other testimony which I have recently embodied in an article and sent to the Voice of the West. T. M. PREBLE.

For the World's Crisis.

"I LOVE EVERY BODY."

You do, friend? how much do you love every body? And what kind of love is it? Bible? the love of the holy prophets and apostles,—of Jesus Christ? Is your love gospel? If not, it is spurious, false, sickly, sentimental, or hypocritical. Does this love of yours lead you to obey God in rebuking sin of every kind, rise up against evil doers, and stand up against the workers of iniquity; reprove, rebuke, exhort with all long suffering and doctrine?

Have you the love of Phineas, when he executed judgment and the plague was stayed? See Num. 25 : 7, 8. Have you the love of Nathan the prophet, when he said to King David, "Thou art the man"? Have you the love of Elijah, Elisha, Isaiah, Jeremiah, Ezekiel, Daniel, who set their faces like a flint against every sin, cried aloud and spared not? Have you Samuel's love, who hewed Agag to pieces, and reproved King Saul to his face for his wickedness?

Have you the love of John the Baptist, who laid the axe at the root of all evil, rebuked Herod for his incest, at the risk of his head, and who said to self-righteous Sadduces and Pharisees, "O generation of vipers, who hath warned you to flee from the wrath to come?" Matt. 3 : 7, 8. Is your love like Paul's love, who said to Elymas the sorcerer, "O full of all subtlety and all mischief, thou child of the devil, thou enemy of all righteousness, wilt thou not cease to pervert the right ways of the Lord?" Acts 13 : 10, 11.

If you have not the love here specified, it is spurious, false, sickly, sentimental or hypocritical. Indeed, what you call love is hatred. "Thou shalt not hate thy brother in thy heart; thou shalt in any wise rebuke him, and not suffer sin to rest upon him." Lev. 19 : 17. "Be not deceived; God is not mocked."

Some parents profess to love their children very much, but how much do they love them? enough to subdue their stubborn wills and restrain them from wickedness? What kind of love was Eli's toward Stephen and Phineas, sons of Belial. Did he love them well enough to correct them betimes, teach them to obey God, have respect unto all his commandments? What did God think of Eli's love in household discipline? Turn to 1 Sam. 2 : 27. How readest thou? What kind of love was David's towards his children, in letting them do as they pleased, serve Satan and their own lusts, pride and ambition?

How many parents love their children in the same way. Eli and David suffered their "little ones" to grow up in idleness, in all manner of sin and folly, to live as they listed, to be lovers of pleasure more than lovers of God." Instead of love, God calls this hatred. "He that spareth his rod, hateth his son; but he that loveth him, chasteneth him betimes." Prov. 13 : 24.

Beloved reader, do you love enough to confess your faults, to go to those you have injured, and on your bended knees make hearty confession? If not, your love is spurious, false. We know a church member who professes to "love every body," even with a sanctified love; and this same individual has been instrumental in sundering the tenderest ties of kindred love and affection, mar the peace of families and the peace of Jerusalem sufficient to cause angels to weep tears of blood. And yet he asserts his innocence, and refuses to make any reparation or confession of his guilt, or acknowledge the evil he has done and is now doing; meanwhile, he continues his profession of perfect love. Could Satan himself desire a love better calculated to suit his infernal purposes? "He that hateth his brother is in darkness, and knoweth not whither he goeth, because that darkness (sic) hath blinded his eyes." 1 John 2: 11. "If any man say I love God, and hateth his brother, he is a liar." 1 John 4 : 20.

We know a flaming professor, professing to "love every body," while at the same time the words of his mouth, the tone of his voice, the look of his eye, and every moving muscle of his face betrays him, gives the lie to his professions. We have meetings for prayer, praise and testimony so full of this kind of love that the individuals composing it have so much love they cannot find it in their loving hearts to rebuke popular sins, staring them full in the face. Is this the love God requires? or is it spurious, false, sickly sentiment?

To profess to "love every body" is popular and fashionable; it requires very little, if any self-denying or cross-bearing. One can profess love, perfect love, the love that "loves every body," and the Lord with all his "heart, soul and strength," and still love the world, be proud and covetous, follow worldly fashions, adorn his exterior with artificials, "gold, pearls, and costly array," read novels, romances, silly love tales, talk nonsense, attend pleasure parties, fancy fairs, sit down, eat, drink, make merry, and rise up to play, sip the wine cup and brandy bottle, chew and smoke tobacco, wink at popular sins in the pulpit and out of it, advocate the doctrine of expediency and compromise, carry religion in one hand, the world, sin, and Satan in the other.

Friends, is this exaggeration? "We speak that we do know, and testify that we have seen."

"Who is the honest man?
He that doth still and strongly good pursue;
To God, his neighbor, and himself, most true;
Whom neither force nor fawning can
Unpin, or wrench from giving all their due."

LETTERS ON REVISION.

LETTER II.—THE PARAGRAPH DIVISION.

On opening the octavo Revised New Testament, published by the American Bible Union, our eyes are greeted with a handsome and attractive page, made up of a large, clear type, and beautiful, white paper, which, by contrast, sets out the print with great distinctness. But we notice, as an improvement over the ordinary mode of printing the Scriptures, the division into paragraphs.

The common division or the Bible into chapters, was made by Cardinal Hugo, about the middle of the thirteenth century; and of the Old Testament into verses, by the Jewish Rabbi Nathan, about the middle of the fifteenth century; both of them to facilitate references by a Concordance. The New Testament was first printed in verses by Robert Stephens, a learned French printer, in the middle of the sixteenth century.

This division into chapters is very convenient for reading and reference; but it is not always judiciously made. See John 7 : 53 and 8 : 1. 1 Cor. 10 : 33, and 11 : 1; 13 : 1; 14 : 1. Phil. 3 : 21 and 4 : 1. Col. 3 : 25 and 4 : 1. In these instances the connection is intimate, and does not justify so radical a separation as that of chapters in the ordinary printed form.

In the Revised Testament, these evils are avoided by a careful and judicious division into paragraphs, according to the sense. And the desired advantages for reading and reference are secured, by indicating the chapter with the usual Roman capitals at its commencement and at the top of each right-hand page; and the verses, by placing its number at the beginning of each verse, in small figures, in the upper part of the printed line at the point required.

By this arrangement, and a careful and thorough revision of the text, the Bible is made plain even to "the way-faring man." And, without reproving look or voice, it seems to invite us to give our attention as we read; that we may understand what God our Savior is speaking to us, and may hide his word prayerfully in our hearts, and be led forth with joy in his ways.

For the World's Crisis.

THE NARROW WAY.

"Strait . . . and narrow is the way which leadeth unto life, and few there be that find it."

The way to life is truly a very strait and narrow way, and many who think they are walking in it are far from it. No one can travel in it except he has on the whole armor of God. He cannot wear any of Satan's armor in this path. If he gets on any of it he will be too large to go in the narrow way; for Satan causes men to feel very large sometimes; then they require a great amount of room, more than they can possibly have in it, so they undertake to remove the lines which bound it, that the way may be subjected to them, instead of their being subjected to it. But they cannot do this. The lines are immovable, and firm as the word of God can make them.

We must become small, every rough corner must be hewn off. We must be squared by the gospel rule if we travel the road to life. We must not undertake to carry sin in one hand and righteousness in the other; for we shall lose our balance if we do. We must put off every sin, not indulge in the least amusement with which evil is connected.

Some have an idea that after they get about so far they must have a hobby to ride; but when we cannot "walk in the truth," and think we must ride a hobby, we are far from the narrow way, for no hobbies are allowed to travel there. Some think if their brothers or sisters do not believe, just as they do on some points, they cannot be christians, thus making tests, dividing the church. Others think they must conform to the world so far as not to lose their popularity. They must dress as well as, or a little better than others.

But God does not tell us of any such persons being in the narrow way. If we wish Jesus to know us when he comes, we must not disguise ourselves by these externals. If we intend to be saved, let us put off every thing which is unlike Christ, and put on his armor, and be ready for the battle, no matter if it does go against the old man in us, and cause him to feel uneasy; he had better be uneasy, and you have the control of him, than that he should get the control of you. If it is a little crossing to be humble, it is better to bear the cross and secure a crown, than to yield to Satan and lose it.

We have so many easily besetting sins, if we do not watch and pray every moment we shall be overcome by them. We must keep our eye on the mark, shun the very appearance of evil, and run with patience the race which is set before us. We have but a short distance to go now. Our race is almost run. Soon Jesus will come to judge the world in righteousness.

Do let us get into the narrow way, and keep in it, until He comes. It ends in the broad fields of the glorious Kingdom. It may be narrow, but it is at last an abundant entrance into our glorious Eden home.

INTEMPERANCE.

I have been for more than forty years a close observer of life and manners in various parts of the United States, and I know not the evil that will bear a moment's comparison with intemperance. It is no exaggeration to say that this single cause has produced more vice, crime, poverty and wretchedness, domestic and social, than all the other ills that scourge us, combined. In truth, it is scarcely possible to meet with misery in any shape, in this country, which will not be found, on close examination, to have proceeded, directly or indirectly, from ardent spirits. Want is one of its immediate consequences. The sad spectacle of destitute families, and of ignorant, half-naked, vicious children, ought never to be presented in a country like this, where the demand for labor is constant, the field unlimited, the sources of supply inexhaustible, and where there are none to make us afraid; and it never would be presented, or very rarely, were it not for the desolation brought upon families by the use of this deadly poison. It paralyzes the arm, the brain, the heart. All the best affections, all the energies of the mind, wither under its influence. The man becomes a maniac, and is locked up in a hospital, or imbrues his hands in the blood of his wife and children, and is sent to the gallows; or, if he escapes these consequences, he becomes a walking pestilence, miserable in himself, and loathsome to all others.

How often do we see whole families contaminated by the vicious example of the parent!—husbands, wives, daughters and sons, all drunkards and furies; sometimes wives murdering their husbands, husbands their wives, and worst of all, if worse can be, children murdering their parents. I am persuaded that if we could have a statistical survey and report of the affairs of unhappy families and individuals, with the causes of their misery, we should find nine cases of ten, if not a still greater proportion, resulting from the use of ardent spirits.

If some fatal plague, of a contagious character, were imported into our country, and had commenced its ravages, we should see prompt and vigorous measures adopted to extinguish it. But what are the most fearful plagues that ever carried death and havoc in their train, compared with this? They are only occasional; this is perennial. They are confined by climate or place; this malady is of all climates, and all times and places. They kill the body at once; this consumes both body and soul. What parent can ever feel that his son is safe while the living fountain of poison is within his reach? God grant that it may soon become a fountain sealed! Delightful relief would it be to turn from the awful and horrid past, to the pure, peaceful, and happy future! to see the springs of life and intelligence renewed on every hand, and health, industry and prosperity glowing around us! May God crown his own work with speedy success!—Attorney General Wirt.

FRESH AIR FOR BREATHING.

When persons speak of the necessity of fresh air for health, they are not always aware of its composition, and of the various purposes which it serves in the animal economy. It is a "thing," a substance to be weighed and measured, as one would water. Thus, it is estimated, that every grown-up human being in ordinary health makes twenty respirations (which consist in drawing into the lungs and giving out from them air) per minute, 1200 per hour, or 28,000 in a single day and night.

During this period of twenty-four hours there is an abstraction, by each person, from the atmospheric magazine of his or her portion of air, amounting to fifty-seven hogsheads, of which each one retains vital oxygen to the amount of about twenty pounds. This last-mentioned gas, which constitutes about one-fifth part of the atmospheric air, enters into the blood, and there serves to maintain the activity of all the functions of life, corporeal as well as mental. It has been estimated that about one-fourth of all the air drawn into the lungs by inspiration is altered in these organs, and is no longer fitted for breathing. The alteration consists, first, in the abstraction of the vitalizing element of oxygen; and secondly, in the addition of the deleterious and poisonous gas (carbonic acid) which, together with volatilized animal matter, escapes from the blood circulating in the lungs, and is given out by them during expiration, and finally escapes into the common or outer atmosphere. The atmosphere, it will thus be seen, not only supplies oxygen, or the vital element of the air, but it is also a great reservoir into which flow all the exhalations from the bodies of men and animals, and those resulting from animal and vegetable decay which takes place on the surface of the earth. If not carried away into space in the upper air, these exhalations would prove to be a destructive poison to all the people congregated in cities and towns. The process by which these exhalations are removed is ventilation; and the more complete it is, the healthier are the inhabitants; as, on the other hand, its imperfection and neglect are productive of diseases of the worst kind.

Fresh air is a food, the introduction of which into the lungs is more immediately and constantly necessary than that commonly reckoned as food, which is taken into the stomach. The call for the aerial food is incessant, and allows of no pause; that for solid and liquid food is periodical, and allows of postponement for many hours. A standard authority on the subject says: "It affords mechanical support, it is a heat-modifying medium, it swallows all gases exposed to it, it supplies a food to man, out of which he is in part built up, it feeds him with the active principle (oxygen) by which the warmth of the body is sustained. The minute terminations of the bronchi, themselves branching off from the windpipe into the substance of the lungs, are called air cells, and number about six hundred millions; the air which reaches these cells by breathing, and chiefly its oxygenous portion, permeates their sides and enters those of the minute blood vessels—capillaries as they are called—and thus finds entrance into the blood. The oxygen mixes with fluid, which it so changes as to fit it for the nutrition and building up of the new, and assisting to remove the old and worn-out materials of the organs. Mention has been made in a previous paragraph of the blood circulating in the lungs and throwing out its gaseous refuse in the form of carbonic acid and animalized exhalations.

There is no tampering with the respiratory wants. The lungs must have their due supply of pure air or the entire animal machine suffers. The lungs suffer, the heart suffers, the brain suffers, and the mind works slowly; the stomach is weakened and digests badly, muscular movement is enfeebled, the senses are dull, the natural color of health yields to a pallid and dingy hue. The movements of inspiration and expiration, which make up respiration, constitute the natural ventilation of the human frame. This living ventilation is carried on unceasingly from birth to death, by the infant as well as by the adult, by the philosopher as well as by the solitary artisan in his close, polluted atmosphere. Whether the surrounding air be pure or pestilential, we drink of it twenty times a minute. If of the latter kind, we look old in our youth; if of the former, we maintain the appearance of youth in old age. The average chance of living to the proverbial age of three-score years and ten may be considered the test of the purity of the air we breathe.

TEN WAYS TO COMMIT SUICIDE.

Wearing thin shoes, stockings, and insufficient clothing in cold and rainy weather; leading a lazy, excited, theatre-going, dancing life; sleeping on feathers in a seven by nine room; eating hot stimulating food too fast, and too much of it, and at improper times; beginning with tea and coffee in childhood, and adding tobacco and spirits in due time; marrying in haste, and living in continual ferment thereafter; following unhealthy occupations to make money; taking bitters, and gormandizing between meals; giving way to fits of passion, or keeping in perpetual worry; going to bed at midnight and getting up at noon, and eating when you catch it. To which may be added a recipe for killing children:—paregoric, cordials, candy and rich cake, and when they are made sick thereby; mercury, tartaric-emetic, castor-oil and sulphur.

REMEDY FOR DYPHTHERIA.

ELD. GRANT:—I would like to point out a remedy in your valuable paper for this fatal disease. We have tried it in our own family, and found it to effect a cure in every case where it has been applied.

As soon as the symptoms appear, apply a flannel wet with kerosene oil to the throat. In about twenty-four hours it will draw out the inflammation, so the throat will be about well, unless in very bad cases, when it will require a longer time to effect a cure.

ALCOHOL.—Alcohol is a product of dissolution—of the wreck and disorganization of the principles of human food. It has the same origin as those malignant and fatal exhalations which constitute the genius of pestilence. Indeed, the same act which gives birth to alcohol, also brings into the world a twin compound, which is one of the promptest and subtlest of all poisons—Carbonic Acid Gas.—Youmans on Alcohol.

NEURALGIA.—A New Hampshire gentleman says: "Take two large table spoonfuls of cologne and two tea spoonfuls of fine salt; mix them together in a small bottle; every time you have any acute affection of the nerve, or neuralgia, simply breathe the fumes in your nose from the bottle, and you will be immediately relieved."

CURE FOR CANCER.—It is asserted by one who has proved its efficacy, that a certain cure for cancer is the juice of the sheep sorrel, or saggitate, expressed, and exposed on a pewter plate in the sun until somewhat jellied. Apply it on the skin over and around the cancer.

CURE FOR CORNS.—One who has tried it says that the best cure for corns is to keep them well wet with a strong solution of common washing soda, when they will soon and permanently disappear.

HOUR OF PRAYER.

O, if there is an hour
When angels visit earth,
'Tis when eve's bright dews shower
Their gems on folded flower,
And hushed day's voice of mirth,
With all its weary care;
The blessed hour of rest—
When, on the silent air,
The low, sweet voice of prayer
Rises from every grateful breast.
Yes, when birds seek their nests
At day's sweet closing hour,
And grief is lulled to rest,
Then angels are our guests,
If e'er they visit mortal bower.
O, blessed hour of prayer!
Season of happy rest,
When we to God repair,
Angel delights to share
With heaven, and ever blest.

THE FREEDMEN'S MISSION.

LETTER FROM BRO. FLAGG.

DEAR BRO. AND SIS.:—Quite a long time has elapsed since my last letter to the Crisis. And I doubt not some of you may be anxious to know something more about the condition of the Freedmen, and what the Lord is doing for them.

When I sent my last letter to the Crisis, I was just leaving for Memphis, Tenn. On my way, I stopped two days at Cairo, southern Ill., waiting for the boat. While there, I visited many of the Freedmen living at that place, who, during the war, were driven there for safety. As the place is quite large, and fast increasing, being situated at the junction of the Ohio and Mississippi rivers; it affords an abundance of labor, offering a good inducement for the Freedmen to remain.

Leaving that place Saturday evening, Jan. 6th, after two nights' and one day's ride down the Mississippi. I arrived at Memphis Monday morning, about 9 A. M. I found Bro. Himes stopping at Bro. Bywater's, about one mile east from the river. We took a stroll together through the suburbs of the city, visiting and taking a look at the thousands of Freedmen living in the suburban districts of the city proper; and seeking to obtain, by observation and inquiry, such information as might be useful in aiding ourselves and others in the great work of improving the condition of the Freedmen. During my short stay there, I lost no time, so far as I was able, to gather as much information as possible in relation to the condition, habits, morals and prospects of the thousands of Freedmen living in and around the city of Memphis; a brief notice of which may not be uninteresting to you.

THEIR MORAL CONDITION.

Among all the Freedmen I have visited, there appears to be a kind feeling towards each other, with a disposition to assist and aid each other amid their hardships, far more than is usually found among white people with superior advantages. And, although there are comparatively very few among them who can read or write, yet, with few exceptions, there can be found at least one in, or connected with, almost every family, who can read and write. And whenever they receive a paper, book, or religious tract, the one who can read will do so in the hearing of others, who will sit around and listen with interest. Those who can read appear to be very fond of books or religious tracts, which they promise to read in the hearing of their friends. In passing their houses, you will often hear them singing some of their religious hymns, which are so full of peculiar sweetness and melody, that you almost feel ashamed to sing in their presence. And I must say, since coming among them I seldom sing; and if I do, I am careful not to be heard much. This much is not only true of the African people at Memphis, but also of St. Louis; and from what I can learn from the Freedmen themselves, it is true of them all.

THEIR EMPLOYMENT AT MEMPHIS.

Many, if not most of the women, take in washing from the white people, for which they receive $1.50 per day. Many of the Freedmen own a mule and dray, with which they earn from four to ten dollars a day. Others work in various kinds of business as formerly, but for such wages as they can get. In one of their shanties, I saw a young married woman making a bed-quilt on the floor from some old ragged coarse cloth, putting inside a very thick wadding of the very nicest white cotton, which she had picked up about the city and by the side of the roads, there being large quantities scattered from the great number of loads continually coming into the city every day; some already pressed and baled out in the country, and others brought to the city packed in crockery crates and other ways, to be pressed and baled in the city for shipping.

THEIR HOUSES AND RENTS.

Most of the Freedmen live in the suburbs encircling the city, from a mile to a mile and a half from the city proper. Their houses are mere shanties, made of the poorest rough boards, set up endwise, like a woodshed or a barn. Many of them are without any windows; consequently without any light except what they get from the door, which is set open for that purpose. There is not a single timber inside of the house; and the roof rests upon the top of the boards, which are only held together by a narrow strip of cross board, running around the building, to which the others are nailed. The roof is simply covered with what might be called shingles, three feet in length, and having the exact appearance of barrel staves, just as they are split out, without being shaved or planed. These rest upon small rafters, made of round poles, about the size of large hoop poles. Three of these layers will cover one side of a building, ten and a half feet wide. The average length of their buildings is seventeen feet. The boards, running up to the roof on the end of the building, are left square, instead of being cut with a bevel so as to fit the roof; thus leaving a three-cornered hole big enough to put your hat through. The chimney runs up a little way on the outside. The houses are neither lathed nor plastered, which leaves them full of holes and cracks all around the building. The doors are made like those of the cheapest barns. Shanties of this kind, one mile from the city, rent from $78 to $120 dollars a year. There are many other shanties, made a little better, but precisely on the same plan, and [illegible] not so cold here but that the magnolia tree, which grows about the city (such as we have for house plants at the north), grows here as large as a horse chestnut; and the leaves, which are very large, are just as green during winter as in summer. And I have seen, in many of the front yards, rose and other bushes with their green foliage as at the first of Sept. north.

After a stay of one short week at Memphis, I deemed it more expedient for me to return to St. Louis, mostly for two very good reasons: First, my health was so poor, on account of the warm climate and damp atmosphere, that I was not able to go out to a single evening meeting. And second, I did not feel satisfied to go away and leave the Freedmen of St. Louis, where my labors had been blest with a fair prospect of continued labor with good results. Besides, every thing was so high at Memphis, that my scanty means, with no prospect of any increase, afforded me but little encouragement to remain. Board could not be obtained in private families for less than twelve to fifteen dollars a week; and other things in proportion. While at St. Louis, I pay but five dollars a week for my board, not including my washing, which the colored sisters are very willing to do free. But while I did remain at Memphis, I lost no time, so far as I was able, in visiting the Freedmen, and learning as much as I could of their condition, habits, and general history. And from all the information I obtained from various sources, I think I am fully justified in saying that Memphis presents as promiscuous a class of Freedmen as can be found in any other southern city; having come, during and since the war, from all the surrounding States.

There you find men and women who have toiled all their lives in the cotton and other fields, under the lash and burning sun; commencing work at daylight, and ceasing only at dark; having no other shelter at night but a poor hovel, no better than the barns we build for our cattle. This class have been treated like cattle, having but little or no better advantages; and consequently are very ignorant. Still, among this class can be found a fair number who can read the Bible and other books to their comrades and friends. And also among this class can be found as many, according to their number, who enjoy the life and power of religion, as any other class who enjoy superior advantages. And among this class, even, I have frequently seen a Bible lying upon their tables or window sills; and I would ask them if they could read? Sometimes they would answer, Yes, I can read a little. At other times they would say they could not read, but that they had a husband, son or daughter, or some other friend, who could and often did read the Bible to them.

I think, on the whole, notwithstanding their ignorance and the inferior advantages which they have had, there are many more among them in proportion to their number who are not only living up to the light they have, but are doing more towards winning souls to Christ than an equal number among any other class of people whose advantages and facilities for doing good are very far superior to theirs. And with all the disadvantages they must necessarily suffer, in not being able to read and write, there is one great advantage to be gained in preaching the plain, pure gospel, with all its doctrines and prophecies, unto them, for the simple reason that their minds have not been poisoned and embittered against the most precious and glorious truths of the gospel of the kingdom, by the knowledge they might have obtained by reading from the multitude of theological books and tracts so pregnant with infidelic creeds, traditions, and satanic systems of modern theology, so universal throughout all the different branches of modern literature. And I never have met with a people in my life who are so free from prejudice, and receive the gospel with so much delight, as those who can neither read nor write. And as astonishing as it may appear to those enjoying all the superior advantages of an education, it is nevertheless true that they can and do understand the Bible, seemingly, just as well as those who can read. And they are as ready to discover the least discrepancy in a scriptural argument as any others. And they are just as particular in having a plain "Thus saith the Lord" for every thing you preach, as any people I ever met with. And although a common education, to say the least, is very much needed among them, and by them greatly desired, nevertheless, it is not a thing which is absolutely necessary for them to have as a prerequisite, in order to understand and appreciate all the doctrines, instructions and prophecies of the Bible, when preached to them in a plain, easy manner, according to the simplicity of the gospel.

And, if the coming of Jesus Christ to judgment is as near as we profess to believe, then we, as the stewards of God, should lose no time in giving to them the gospel of the kingdom, in preference to every thing else, to the extent of all our means, as the only thing that has the life and power of salvation in bringing them into a condition to meet their God in peace. And this agrees fully with the plain instructions of our Savior, "But seek ye first the kingdom of God, and his righteousness, and all these things shall be added unto you." Matt. 6: 33.

THE WORK AT ST. LOUIS.

I came back to this place from Memphis, Jan. 16th. I found the good work going on and spreading among the African churches of the city. On my return to this place, some of the colored people informed me that praying and singing of spiritual songs and hymns could be heard in almost every lane and alley. For the colored people, instead of living in the streets of the city, live mostly in the lanes and alleys, in small houses, such as were built for them by their owners when they were slaves. But since they have become free, they hire the same houses, paying from $48 to $72 a year for only one room. And I never felt the force of our Savior's words, to go out quickly into the lanes and alleys, till I came among the poor Freedmen.

The African brethren inform me that there never was such a waking up throughout the city among that class as now. In the Methodist colored church, on 11th St., where Bro. Himes and myself both preached when we first came to the city, they are now having a great revival. One hundred and eight converts have already come out on the Lord's side. The work is still going on. In the colored Baptist church on 8th St., a powerful work is going on. Last Sunday week thirty six were baptized there. And in the 7th St. African church, where I have labored principally, the work has been going on from the first. But it is impossible to tell how many have been converted to God; and very many of them have united with the other churches. But I met with converts all through the city who are praising God for free salvation.

I have tried in vain for nearly six weeks to hire a church, a hall, or a large vacant store, or storage house, where I could preach and feel perfectly free. If I could have succeeded, I have no doubt I could have had three hundred members in a few weeks. But I have given up all hopes of obtaining any place of my own to worship in, for the present. I have tried in the wisdom of God to be faithful in my mission of labor and love. I have tried to preach the great crowning truths of the gospel in relation to Christ's speedy coming and kingdom. And I think I am justified in saying that a good number of the outcast and down-trodden have been blest and sanctified through those truths.

I have become attached to the African people of this city; and although I am preparing to leave for the East, I have promised to return in the fall, the Lord willing, and build or hire some place to worship in. Those who subscribed for the Crisis are very much delighted with the paper. The paper is doing much good, and those who can read the paper do so in the hearing of those who cannot read.

I am devoting what leisure moments I have in collecting as many of their hymns and melodies as I can to carry with me when I go East. And I have compiled and arranged them in harmony for publication. I have a great many things to tell you. Next Lord's day I expect to preach at Ridge Prairie, where I labored two weeks, since coming out here, with good success. And some time next week I leave for Carlinville, Ill., where I expect to preach one week or more. From there I go to Chicago, Ill., and remain with my youngest brother, who resides there, until March 18th, during which time I intend to preach to the brethren in that city. From there I expect the Lord will want me to work my passage home by preaching the word of life to the brethren and sisters in all such places, on or near my route, as may be desired.

I trust in the will of Providence that I may soon be able to see and talk with you more fully upon those subjects which ought to interest us more than all others, in view of the little time we have to work for the salvation of those living in darkness, concerning the glory that is so soon to be revealed. I do hope and pray, yea, I do believe that the time is speedily coming when our brethren and sisters must see the necessity of giving to the millions of poor Freedmen and others of the South and West, in view of our soon coming King, the gospel, above all other things, by which our own hearts have been made to rejoice, knowing that our redemption is nigh at hand. Your Bro. in Christ, homeward bound to the haven of eternal rest, H. K. FLAGG.

St. Louis, Mo., Feb. 24th, 1866.

P. S.—My heart is made to rejoice exceedingly by the reception of a kind letter of encouragement received from Bro. Grant some two weeks since. It gave me new life and zeal to work. I also received a kind letter of remembrance from Bro. D. D. Chaffee, of So. Wilbraham, Mass., enclosing for me five dollars of the Lord's money. It was received with gratitude. H. K. F.

PARTIES.—THE INJURY THEY DO

Often when it comes the time of year to work, when the evenings are long, and business is light, and the very time to make an extra effort, at this moment somebody in the church will give a party, and invite some christian friends, so as to have a religious party. And then some other family must do the same to return the compliment. Then another and another, till it grows into an organized system of parties, that consume the whole winter. Abominable! This is the grand device of the devil, because it appears so innocent, and so proper, to promote a good feeling, and increase the acquaintance of christians with each other. And so, instead of prayer meetings, they will have these parties. The evils of these parties are very great. They are often got up at great expense, and the most abominable gluttony is practiced in them. It is said that the expense is from one hundred to two thousand dollars. I have been told in some instances, professed christians have given great parties, and made great entertainments, and excused their ungodly prodigality in the use of Jesus Christ's money, by giving what was left, after the feast was ended, to the poor! thus making it a virtue to feast, and riot, even to surfeiting, on the bounties of God's providence, under pretence of benefiting the poor. This is the same in principle with a splendid ball which was given some years since in a neighboring city. The ball was gotten up for the benefit of the poor, and each gentleman was to pay a certain sum, and after the ball was ended, whatever remained of the funds thus raised, was given to the poor.

Truly, this is a strange charity, to eat and drink and dance, and when they have rioted and feasted until they can enjoy it no longer, they deal out to the poor the crumbs that have fallen from the table. I do not see why such a ball is not quite as pious as such christian parties. The evil of balls does not consist simply in the exercise of dancing, but in the dissipation, and surfeiting, any temptations connected with them. But it is said they are christian parties, and that they are all, or nearly all, professors of religion who attend them. And furthermore that they are concluded often with prayer. Now I regard this as one of the worst features about them; that after the waste of time and money, the excesses in eating and drinking, the vain conversation, and nameless fooleries with which such a season is filled up, an attempt should be made to sanctify it, and palm it off upon God, by concluding it with prayer. Say what you will, it would not be more absurd or incongruous, or impious, to close a ball or a theatre or a card party with prayer. Has it come to this, that professors of religion, professing to desire the salvation of the world, when such calls are made upon them from the four winds of heaven, to send the gospel, to furnish Bibles and tracts, and missionaries to save the world from death, that they should spend hundreds of dollars in an evening, and then go to the monthly concert and pray for the heathen! In some instances, I have been told they find a salve for their consciences in the fact that their minister attends their parties. This, of course, would give weight to such an example, and if one professor of religion makes a party and invited their minister, others must do the same. The next step they take, may be for each to give a ball, and appoint their minister a manager! Why not? And perhaps, by and by, he will do them the favor to play the fiddle. In my estimation it might quite as well do it as to go and conclude such a party with prayer.

But I should advise any congregation, who are calculating to have a circle of parties, in the meantime to dismiss their minister, and let him go and preach where the people would be ready to receive the word and profit by it, and not have him stay and be distressed, and grieved, and killed by attempting to promote religion among them, while they are heart and hand in the service of the devil. In relation to parties, say what you please about their being an innocent recreation, I appeal to any of you who have ever attended them, to say whether they fit you for prayer, or increase your spirituality, or whether sinners are ever converted in them, or saints made to agonize in prayer for souls?—Rev. C. J. Finney.

GO TELL JESUS.

Bury thy sorrow,
The world has its share,
Bury it deeply,
Hide it with care.

Think of it calmly
When curtained by night,
Tell it to Jesus,
And all will be right.

Gather the sunlight
Aglow on thy way,
Gather the moon-beams,
Each soft silver ray.

Hearts grow weary
With heavier woe,
Droop 'mid the darkness—
Go comfort them, go!

Bury thy sorrow,
Let others be blest,
Give them the sunshine,
Tell Jesus the rest.

THE FIRST DAY SABBATH.

BRO. GRANT:—The following historical facts taken from Gilfillan's celebrated work on "The Sabbath," pp. 368–9, should be well considered by all who would desire a correct view of the christian Sabbath:—

"The history of the earlier centuries of christianity throws light on the meaning of certain Scripture terms which have been the occasion of a vexed question among controversialists. In designating what is now known amongst us as the christian Sabbath, the Fathers make use of names which they never apply to any other day of the week. With them 'the eighth day,' 'the day of the Sun,' 'the first day of the week,' and 'the Lord's day,' signify one particular day and no other. Barnabas, or whoever was the author of the Catholic Epistle ascribed to him, mentions 'the eighth day' as that on which 'Jesus rose from the dead,' and which the christians of his time observed as a festal day.* We are informed by Justin Martyr that the christians of the second century assembled on 'the day of the Sun,' and that they did so 'because on this first day God made the world, and Jesus Christ our Savior rose from the dead.'† The same Father affirms that 'Christ rose from the dead on the eighth day, which,' he adds, 'may be called the eighth and yet remains the first.'‡ In the third century, Cyprian represents the eighth day as both 'the first after the Sabbath, and the Lord's day.'§

"When we compare these passages with each other, we find that 'the eighth day,' 'the day of the Sun,' or Sunday, 'the day of the Redeemer's resurrection,' 'the first day of the week,' and 'the Lord's day,' are, according to the combined testimony of Barnabas, Justin Martyr, and Cyprian, the same day. . . . As 'the Sabbath' had been for so long a time the well known title of the weekly holy day among the Jews, it was obviously needful, for preventing mistake, that the institution which had passed to a new day should have a new name. But as time advanced, and (may not we add) as the Lord's day came to be no longer in danger of being confounded with the Jewish 'Sabbath, the old name was gradually resumed and attached to the christian holy day."

The above from Gilfillan is in harmony with other testimony which I have recently embodied in an article and sent to the Voice of the West. T. M. PREBLE.

For the World's Crisis.

"I LOVE EVERY BODY."

You do, friend? how much do you love every body? And what kind of love is it? Bible? the love of the holy prophets and apostles,—of Jesus Christ? Is your love gospel? If not, it is spurious, false, sickly, sentimental, or hypocritical. Does this love of yours lead you to obey God in rebuking sin of every kind, rise up against evil doers, and stand up against the workers of iniquity; reprove, rebuke, exhort with all long suffering and doctrine?

Have you the love of Phineas, when he executed judgment and the plague was stayed? See Num. 25: 7, 8. Have you the love of Nathan the prophet, when he said to King David, "Thou art the man"? Have you the love of Elijah, Elisha, Isaiah, Jeremiah, Ezekiel, Daniel, who set their faces like a flint against every sin, cried aloud and spared not? Have you Samuel's love, who hewed Agag to pieces, and reproved King Saul to his face for his wickedness?

Have you the love of John the Baptist, who laid the axe at the root of all evil, rebuked Herod for his incest, at the risk of his head, and who said to self-righteous Sadducees and Pharisees, "O generation of vipers, who hath warned you to flee from the wrath to come?" Matt. 3: 7, 8. Is your love like Paul's love, who said to Elymas the sorcerer, "O full of all subtlety and all mischief, thou child of the devil, thou enemy of all righteousness, wilt thou not cease to pervert the right ways of the Lord?" Acts 13: 10, 11.

If you have not the love here specified, it is spurious, false, sickly, sentimental or hypocritical. Indeed, what you call love is hatred. "Thou shalt not hate thy brother in thy heart; thou shalt in any wise rebuke him, and not suffer sin to rest upon him." Lev. 19: 17. "Be not deceived; God is not mocked."

Some parents profess to love their children very much, but how much do they love them? enough to subdue their stubborn wills and restrain them from wickedness? What kind of love was Eli's toward Stephen and Phineas, sons of Belial? Did he love them well enough to correct them betimes, teach them to obey God, have respect unto all his commandments? What did God think of Eli's love in household discipline? Turn to 1 Sam. 2: 27. How readest thou? What kind of love was David's towards his children, in letting them have their own lusts, pride and ambition? [illegible] the same way. Eli and David suffered their "little ones" to grow up in idleness, in all manner of sin and folly, to live as they listed, to be lovers of pleasure more than lovers of God." Instead of love, God calls this hatred. "He that spareth his rod, hateth his son; but he that loveth him, chasteneth him betimes." Prov. 13: 24.

Beloved reader, do you love enough to confess your faults, to go to those you have injured, and on your bended knees make hearty confession? If not, your love is spurious, false. We know a church member who professes to "love every body," even with a sanctified love; and this same individual has been instrumental in sundering the tenderest ties of kindred love and affection, mar the peace of families and the peace of Jerusalem sufficient to cause angels to weep tears of blood. And yet he asserts his innocence, and refuses to make any reparation or confession of his guilt, or acknowledge the evil he has done and is now doing; meanwhile, he continues his profession of perfect love. Could Satan himself desire a love better calculated to suit his infernal purposes? "He that hateth his brother is in darkness, and knoweth not whither he goeth, because that darkness (sin) hath blinded his eyes." 1 John 2: 11. "If any man say I love God, and hateth his brother, he is a liar." 1 John 4: 20.

We know a flaming professor, professing to "love every body," while at the same time the words of his mouth, the tone of his voice, the look of his eye, and every moving muscle of his face betrays him, gives the lie to his professions. We have meetings for prayer, praise and testimony so full of this kind of love that the individuals composing it have so much love they cannot find it in their loving hearts to rebuke popular sins, staring them full in the face. Is this the love God requires? or is it spurious, false, sickly sentiment?

To profess to "love every body" is popular and fashionable; it requires very little, if any self-denying or cross-bearing. One can profess love, perfect love, the love that "loves every body," and the Lord with all his "heart, soul and strength," and still love the world, be proud and covetous, follow worldly fashions, adorn his exterior with artificials, "gold, pearls, and costly array," read novels, romances, silly love tales, talk nonsense, attend pleasure parties, fancy fairs, sit down, eat, drink, make merry, and rise up to play, sip the wine cup and brandy bottle, chew and smoke tobacco, wink at popular sins in the pulpit and out of it, advocate the doctrine of expediency and compromise, carry religion in one hand, the world, sin, and Satan in the other.

Friends, is this exaggeration? "We speak that we do know, and testify that we have seen."

"Who is the honest man?
He that doth still and strongly good pursue,
To God, his neighbor, and himself, most true,
Whom neither force nor fawning can
Unpin, or wrench from giving all their due."

LETTERS ON REVISION.

LETTER II.—THE PARAGRAPH DIVISION.

On opening the octavo Revised New Testament, published by the American Bible Union, our eyes are greeted with a handsome and attractive page, made up of a large, clear type, and beautiful, white paper, which, by contrast, sets out the print with great distinctness. But we notice, as an improvement over the ordinary mode of printing the Scriptures, the division into paragraphs.

The common division of the Bible into chapters, was made by Cardinal Hugo, about the middle of the thirteenth century, and of the Old Testament into verses, by the Jewish Rabbi Nathan, about the middle of the fifteenth century; both of them to facilitate references by a Concordance. The New Testament was first printed in verses by Robert Stephens, a learned French printer, in the middle of the sixteenth century.

This division into chapters is very convenient for reading and reference; but it is not always judiciously made. See John 7: 53 and 8: 1. 1 Cor. 10: 33, and 11: 1; 13: 1; 14: 1. Phil. 3: 21 and 4: 1. Col. 3: 25 and 4: 1. In these instances the connection is intimate, and does not justify so radical a separation as that of chapters in the ordinary printed form.

In the Revised Testament, these evils are avoided by a careful and judicious division into paragraphs, according to the sense. And the desired advantages for reading and reference are secured, by indicating the chapter with the usual Roman capitals at its commencement and at the top of each right-hand page, and the verses, by placing its number at the beginning of each verse, in small figures, in the upper part of the printed line at the point required.

By this arrangement, and a careful and thorough revision of the text, the Bible is made plain even to "the way-faring man." And, without reproving look or voice, it seems to invite us to give our attention as we read; that we may understand what God our Savior is speaking to us, and may hide his word prayerfully in our hearts, and be led forth with joy in his ways.

THE NARROW WAY.

"Strait . . . and narrow is the way which leadeth unto life, and few there be that find it."

The way to life is truly a very strait and narrow way, and many who think they are walking in it are far from it. No one can travel in it except he has on the whole armor of God. He cannot wear any of Satan's armor in this path. If he gets on any of it he will be too large to go in the narrow way; for Satan causes men to feel very large sometimes; then they require a great amount of room, more than they can possibly have in it, so they undertake to remove the lines which bound it, that the way may be subjected to them, instead of their being subjected to it. But they cannot do this. The lines are immovable, and firm as the word of God can make them.

We must become small, every rough corner must be hewn off. We must be squared by the gospel rule if we travel the road to life. We must not undertake to carry sin in one hand and righteousness in the other; for we shall lose our balance if we do. We must put off every sin, not indulge in the least amusement with which evil is connected.

Some have an idea that after they get about so far they must have a hobby to ride; but when we cannot "walk in the truth," and think we must ride a hobby, we are far from the narrow way, for no hobbies are allowed to travel there. [illegible] some points, they cannot be christians, thus making tests, dividing the church. Others think they must conform to the world so far as not to lose their popularity. They must dress as well as, or a little better than others.

But God does not tell us of any such persons being in the narrow way. If we wish Jesus to know us when he comes, we must not disguise ourselves by these externals. If we intend to be saved, let us put off every thing which is unlike Christ, and put on his armor, and be ready for the battle, no matter if it does go against the old man in us, and cause him to feel uneasy; he had better be uneasy, and you have the control of him, than that he should get the control of you. If it is a little crossing to be humble, it is better to bear the cross and secure a crown, than to yield to Satan and lose it.

We have so many easily besetting sins, if we do not watch and pray every moment we shall be overcome by them. We must keep our eye on the mark, shun the very appearance of evil, and run with patience the race which is set before us. We have but a short distance to go now. Our race is almost run. Soon Jesus will come to judge the world in righteousness.

Do let us get into the narrow way, and keep in it, until He comes. It ends in the broad fields of the glorious Kingdom. It may be narrow, but it is at last an abundant entrance into our glorious Eden home.

INTEMPERANCE.

I have been for more than forty years a close observer of life and manners in various parts of the United States, and I know not the evil that will bear a moment's comparison with intemperance. It is no exaggeration to say that this single cause has produced more vice, crime, poverty and wretchedness, domestic and social, than all the other ills that scourge us, combined. In truth, it is scarcely possible to meet with misery in any shape, in this country, which will not be found, on close examination, to have proceeded, directly or indirectly, from ardent spirits. Want is one of its immediate consequences. The sad spectacle of destitute families, and of ignorant, half-naked, vicious children, ought never to be presented in a country like this, where the demand for labor is constant, the field unlimited, the sources of supply inexhaustible, and where there are none to make us afraid; and it never would be presented, or very rarely, were it not for the desolation brought upon families by the use of this deadly poison. It paralyzes the arm, the brain, the heart. All the best affections, all the energies of the mind, wither under its influence. The man becomes a maniac, and is locked up in a hospital, or imbrues his hands in the blood of his wife and children, and is sent to the gallows; or, if he escapes these consequences, he becomes a walking pestilence, miserable in himself, and loathsome to all others.

How often do we see whole families contaminated by the vicious example of the parent!—husbands, wives, daughters and sons, all drunkards and furies, sometimes wives murdering their husbands, husbands their wives, and worst of all, if worse can be, children murdering their parents. I am persuaded that if we could have a statistical survey and report of the affairs of unhappy families and individuals, with the causes of their misery, we should find nine cases of ten, if not a still greater proportion, resulting from the use of ardent spirits.

If some fatal plague, of a contagious character, were imported into our country, and had commenced its ravages, we should see prompt and vigorous measures adopted to extinguish it. But what are the most fearful plagues that ever carried death and havoc in their train, compared with this? They are only occasional, this is perennial. They are confined by climate or place, this malady is of all climates, and all times and places. They kill the body at once, this consumes both body and soul. What parent can ever feel that his son is safe while the living fountain of poison is within his reach? God grant that it may soon become a fountain sealed! Delightful relief would it be to turn from the awful and horrid past, to the pure, peaceful, and happy future! to see the springs of life and intelligence renewed on every hand, and health, industry and prosperity glowing around us! May God crown his own work with speedy success!—Attorney General Wirt.

FRESH AIR FOR BREATHING.

When persons speak of the necessity of fresh air for health, they are not always aware of its composition, and of the various purposes which it serves in the animal economy. It is a "thing," a substance to be weighed and measured, as one would water. Thus, it is estimated, that every grown-up human being in ordinary health makes twenty respirations (which consist in drawing into the lungs and giving out from them air) per minute, 1200 per hour, or 28,000 in a single day and night.

During this period of twenty-four hours there is an abstraction, by each person, from the atmospheric magazine of his or her portion of air, amounting to fifty-seven hogsheads, of which each one retains vital oxygen to the amount of about twenty pounds. This last-mentioned gas, which constitutes about one-fifth part of the atmospheric air, enters into the blood, and there serves to maintain the activity of all the functions of life, corporeal as well as mental. It has been estimated that about one-fourth of all the air drawn into the lungs by inspiration is altered in these organs, and is no longer fitted for breathing. The alteration consists, first, in the abstraction of the vitalizing element of oxygen; and secondly, in the addition of the deleterious and poisonous gas (carbonic acid) which, together with volatilized animal matter, escapes from the blood circulating in the lungs, and is given out by them during expiration, and finally escapes into the common or outer atmosphere. The atmosphere, it will thus be seen, not only supplies oxygen, or the vital element of the air, but it is also a great reservoir into which flow all the exhalations from the bodies of men and animals, and those resulting from animal and vegetable decay which takes place on the surface of the earth. If not carried away into space in the upper air, these exhalations would prove to be a destructive poison to all the people congregated in cities and towns. The process by which these exhalations are removed is ventilation; and the more complete it is, the healthier are the inhabitants; as, on the other hand, its imperfection and neglect are productive of diseases of the worst kind.

Fresh air is a food, the introduction of which into the lungs is more immediately and constantly necessary than that commonly reckoned as food, which is taken into the stomach. The call for the aerial food is incessant, and allows of no pause; that for solid and liquid food is periodical, and allows of postponement for many hours. A standard authority on the subject says: "It affords mechanical support, it is a heat-modifying medium, it swallows up gases exposed to it, it supplies a food to man, out of which he is in part built up, it feeds him with the active principle (oxygen) [illegible] air which reaches those cells by breathing, and chiefly its oxygenous portion, permeates their sides and enters those of the minute blood vessels—capillaries as they are called—and thus finds entrance into the blood. The oxygen mixes with fluid, which it so changes as to fit it for the nutrition and building up of the new, and assisting to remove the old and worn-out materials of the organs. Mention has been made in a previous paragraph of the blood circulating in the lungs and throwing out its gaseous refuse in the form of carbonic acid and animalized exhalations.

There is no tampering with the respiratory wants. The lungs must have their due supply of pure air or the entire animal machine suffers. The lungs suffer, the heart suffers, the brain suffers, and the mind works slowly; the stomach is weakened and digests badly, muscular movement is enfeebled, the senses are dull, the natural color of health yields to a pallid and dingy hue. The movements of inspiration and expiration, which make up respiration, constitute the natural ventilation of the human frame. This living ventilation is carried on unceasingly from birth to death, by the infant as well as by the adult, by the philosopher as well as by the solitary artisan in his close, polluted atmosphere. Whether the surrounding air be pure or pestilential, we drink of it twenty times a minute. If of the latter kind, we look old in our youth; if of the former, we maintain the appearance of youth in old age. The average chance of living to the proverbial age of three-score years and ten may be considered the test of the purity of the air we breathe.

TEN WAYS TO COMMIT SUICIDE

Wearing thin shoes, stockings, and insufficient clothing in cold and rainy weather, leading a lazy, excited, theatre-going, dancing life; sleeping on feathers in a seven by nine room; eating hot stimulating food too fast, and too much of it, and at improper times, beginning with tea and coffee in childhood, and adding tobacco and spirits in due time; marrying in haste, and living in continual ferment thereafter; following unhealthy occupations to make money; taking bitters, and gormandizing between meals; giving way to fits of passion, or keeping in perpetual worry, going to bed at midnight and getting up at noon, and eating when you catch it. To which may be added a recipe for killing children—paregoric, cordials, candy and rich cake, and when they are made sick thereby, mercury, tartaric-emetic, castor-oil and sulphur.

REMEDY FOR DYPHTHERIA.

ELD. GRANT:—I would like to point out a remedy in your valuable paper for this fatal disease. We have tried it in our own family and found it to effect a cure in every case where it has been applied.

As soon as the symptoms appear, apply a flannel wet with kerosene oil to the throat. In about twenty-four hours it will draw out the inflammation, so the throat will be about well, unless in very bad cases, when it will require a longer time to effect a cure.

ALCOHOL.—Alcohol is a product of dissolution—of the wreck and disorganization of the principles of human food. It has the same origin as those malignant and fatal exhalations which constitute the genius of pestilence. Indeed, the same act which gives birth to alcohol, also brings into the world a twin compound, which is one of the promptest and subtlest of all poisons—Carbonic Acid Gas.—Youmans on Alcohol.

NEURALGIA.—A New Hampshire gentleman says: "Take two large table spoonfuls of cologne and two tea spoonfuls of fine salt, mix them together in a small bottle; every time you have any acute affection of the nerve, or neuralgia, simply breathe the fumes in your nose from the bottle, and you will be immediately relieved."

CURE FOR CANCER.—It is asserted by one who has proved its efficacy, that a certain cure for cancer is the juice of the sheep sorrel, or sagyllale, expressed, and exposed on a pewter plate in the sun until somewhat jellied. Apply it on the skin over and around the cancer.

CURE FOR CORNS.—One who has tried it says that the best cure for corns is to keep them well wet with a strong solution of common washing soda, when they will soon and permanently disappear.

HOUR OF PRAYER.

O, if there is an hour
When angels visit earth,
'Tis when eve's bright dews shower
Their gems on folded flower,
And hushed day's voice of mirth,
With all its weary care;
The blessed hour of rest—
When, on the silent air,
The low, sweet voice of prayer
Rises from every grateful breast.
Yes, when birds seek their nests
At day's sweet closing hour,
And grief is lulled to rest,
Then angels are our guests,
If e'er they visit mortal bower.
O, blessed hour of prayer!
Season of happy rest,
When we to God repair,
Angel delights to share
With heaven, and ever blest.

THE FREEDMEN'S MISSION.

LETTER FROM BRO. FLAGG.

DEAR BRO. AND SRS.:—Quite a long time has elapsed since my last letter to the Crisis. And I doubt not some of you may be anxious to know something more about the condition of the Freedmen, and what the Lord is doing for them.

When I sent my last letter to the Crisis, I was just leaving for Memphis, Tenn. On my way, I stopped two days at Cairo, southern Ill., waiting for the boat. While there, I visited many of the Freedmen living at that place, who, during the war, were driven there for safety. As the place is quite large, and fast increasing, being situated at the junction of the Ohio and Mississippi rivers; it affords an abundance of labor, offering a good inducement for the Freedmen to remain.

Leaving that place Saturday evening, Jan. 6th, after two nights' and one day's ride down the Mississippi. I arrived at Memphis Monday morning, about 9 A. M. I found Bro. Himes stopping at Bro. Bywater's, about one mile east from the river. We took a stroll together through the suburbs of the city, visiting and taking a look at the thousands of Freedmen living in the suburban districts of the city proper; and seeking to obtain, by observation and inquiry, such information as might be useful in aiding ourselves and others in the great work of improving the condition of the Freedmen. During my short stay there, I lost no time, so far as I was able, to gather as much information as possible in relation to the condition, habits, morals and prospects of the thousands of Freedmen living in and around the city of Memphis; a brief notice of which may not be uninteresting to you.

THEIR MORAL CONDITION.

Among all the Freedmen I have visited, there appears to be a kind feeling towards each other, with a disposition to assist and aid each other amid their hardships, far more than is usually found among white people with superior advantages. And, although there are comparatively very few among them who can read or write, yet, with few exceptions, there can be found at least one in, or connected with, almost every family, who can read and write. And whenever they receive a paper, book, or religious tract, the one who can read will do so in the hearing of others, who will sit around and listen with interest. Those who can read appear to be very fond of books or religious tracts, which they promise to read in the hearing of their friends. In passing their houses, you will often hear them singing some of their religious hymns, which are so full of peculiar sweetness and melody, that you almost feel ashamed to sing in their presence. And I must say, since coming among them I seldom sing; and if I do, I am careful not to be heard much. This much is not only true of the African people at Memphis, but also of St. Louis; and from what I can learn from the Freedmen themselves, it is true of them all.

THEIR EMPLOYMENT AT MEMPHIS.

Many, if not most of the women, take in washing from the white people, for which they receive $1.50 per day. Many of the Freedmen own a mule and dray, with which they earn from four to ten dollars a day. Others work in various kinds of business as formerly, but for such wages as they can get. In one of their shanties, I saw a young married woman making a bed-quilt on the floor from some old ragged coarse cloth, putting inside a very thick wadding of the very nicest white cotton, which she had picked up about the city and by the side of the roads, there being large quantities scattered from the great number of loads continually coming into the city every day; some already pressed and baled out in the country, and others brought to the city packed in crockery crates and other ways, to be pressed and baled in the city for shipping.

THEIR HOUSES AND RENTS.

Most of the Freedmen live in the suburbs encircling the city, from a mile to a mile and a half from the city proper. Their houses are mere shanties, made of the poorest rough boards, set up endwise, like a woodshed or a barn. Many of them are without any windows; consequently without any light except what they get from the door, which is set open for that purpose. There is not a single timber inside of the house; and the roof rests upon the top of the boards, which are only held together by a narrow strip of cross board, running around the building, to which the others are nailed. The roof is simply covered with what might be called shingles, three feet in length, and having the exact appearance of barrel staves, just as they are split out, without being shaved or planed. These rest upon small rafters, made of round poles, about the size of large hoop poles. Three of these layers will cover one side of a building, ten and a half feet wide. The average length of their buildings is seventeen feet. The boards, running up to the roof on the end of the building, are left square, instead of being cut with a bevel so as to fit the roof; thus leaving a three-cornered hole big enough to put your hat through. The chimney runs up a little way on the outside. The houses are neither lathed nor plastered, which leaves them full of holes and cracks all around the building. The doors are make like those of the cheapest barns. Shanties of this kind, one mile from the city, rent from $72 to $120 dollars a year. There are many other shanties, made a little better, but precisely on the same plan, and rent much higher. None that I have seen have but one room. Shanties four times as large, and built on the same plan, having four rooms, each room designed for a family, rent from five to six hundred dollars a year.

THE CLIMATE.

The climate is such at Memphis, that even with these houses the inmates can live comparatively warm, and do not suffer in that respect like thousands of poor people we have at the north, where it is much colder. It is not so cold here but that the magnolia tree, which grows about the city (such as we have for house plants at the north), grows here as large as a horse chestnut; and the leaves, which are very large, are just as green during winter as in summer. And I have seen, in many of the front yards, rose and other bushes with their green foliage as at the first of Sept. north.

After a stay of one short week at Memphis, I deemed it more expedient for me to return to St. Louis, mostly for two very good reasons: First, my health was so poor, on account of the warm climate and damp atmosphere, that I was not able to go out to a single evening meeting. And second, I did not feel satisfied to go away and leave the Freedmen of St. Louis, where my labors had been blest with a fair prospect of continued labor with good results. Besides, every thing was so high at Memphis, that my scanty means, with no prospect of any increase, afforded me but little encouragement to remain. Board could not be obtained in private families for less than twelve to fifteen dollars a week; and other things in proportion. While at St. Louis, I pay but five dollars a week for my board, not including my washing, which the colored sisters are very willing to do free. But while I did remain at Memphis, I lost no time, so far as I was able, in visiting the Freedmen, and learning as much as I could of their condition, habits, and general history. And from all the information I obtained from various sources, I think I am fully justified in saying that Memphis presents as promiscuous a class of Freedmen as can be found in any other southern city; having come, during and since the war, from all the surrounding States.

There you find men and women who have toiled all their lives in the cotton and other fields, under the lash and burning sun; commencing work at daylight, and ceasing only at dark; having no other shelter at night but a poor hovel, no better than the barns we build for our cattle. This class have been treated like cattle, having but little or no better advantages; and consequently are very ignorant. Still, among this class can be found a fair number who can read the Bible and other books to their comrades and friends. And also among this class can be found as many, according to their number, who enjoy the life and power of religion, as any other class who enjoy superior advantages. And among this class, even, I have frequently seen a Bible lying upon their tables or window sills; and I would ask them if they could read? Sometimes they would answer, Yes, I can read a little. At other times they would say they could not read, but that they had a husband, son or daughter, or some other friend, who could and often did read the Bible to them.

I think, on the whole, notwithstanding their ignorance and the inferior advantages which they have had, there are many more among them in proportion to their number who are not only living up to the light they have, but are doing more towards winning souls to Christ than an equal number among any other class of people whose advantages and facilities for doing good are very far superior to theirs. And with all the disadvantages they must necessarily suffer, in not being able to read and write, there is one great advantage to be gained in preaching the plain, pure gospel, with all its doctrines and prophecies, unto them, for the simple reason that their minds have not been poisoned and embittered against the most precious and glorious truths of the gospel of the kingdom, by the knowledge they might have obtained by reading from the multitude of theological books and tracts so pregnant with infidelic creeds, traditions, and satanic systems of modern theology, so universal throughout all the different branches of modern literature. And I never have met with a people in my life who are so free from prejudice, and receive the gospel with so much delight, as those who can neither read nor write. And as astonishing as it may appear to those enjoying all the superior advantages of an education, it is nevertheless true that they can and do understand the Bible, seemingly, just as well as those who can read. And they are as ready to discover the least discrepancy in a scriptural argument as any others. And they are just as particular in having a plain "Thus saith the Lord" for every thing you preach, as any people I ever met with. And although a common education, to say the least, is very much needed among them, and by them greatly desired; nevertheless, it is not a thing which is absolutely necessary for them to have as a prerequisite, in order to understand and appreciate all the doctrines, instructions and prophecies of the Bible, when preached to them in a plain, easy manner, according to the simplicity of the gospel.

And, if the coming of Jesus Christ to judgment is as near as we profess to believe, then we, as the stewards of God, should lose no time in giving to them the gospel of the kingdom, in preference to every thing else, to the extent of all our means, as the only thing that has the life and power of salvation in bringing them into a condition to meet their God in peace. And this agrees fully with the plain instructions of our Savior, "But seek ye first the kingdom of God, and his righteousness, and all these things shall be added unto you." Matt. 6 : 33.

THE WORK AT ST. LOUIS.

I came back to this place from Memphis, Jan. 16th. I found the good work going on and spreading among the African churches of the city. On my return to this place, some of the colored people informed me that praying and singing of spiritual songs and hymns could be heard in almost every lane and alley. For the colored people, instead of living in the streets of the city, live mostly in the lanes and alleys, in small houses, such as were built for them by their owners when they were slaves. But since they have become free, they hire the same houses, paying from $48 to $72 a year for only one room. And I never felt the force of our Savior's words, to go out quickly into the lanes and alleys, till I came among the poor Freedmen.

The African brethren inform me that there never was such a waking up throughout the city among that class as now. In the Methodist colored church, on 11th St., where Bro. Himes and myself both preached when we first came to the city, they are now having a great revival. One hundred and eight converts have already come out on the Lord's side. The work is still going on. In the colored Baptist church on 8th St., a powerful work is going on. Last Sunday week thirty-six were baptized there. And in the 7th St. African church, where I have labored principally, the work has been going on from the first. But it is impossible to tell how many have been converted to God; and very many of them have united with the other churches. But I met with converts all through the city who are praising God for free salvation.

I have tried in vain for nearly six weeks to hire a church, a hall, or a large vacant store, or storage house, where I could preach and feel perfectly free. If I could have succeeded, I have no doubt I could have had three hundred members in a few weeks. But I have given up all hopes of obtaining any place of my own to worship in, for the present. I have tried in the wisdom of God to be faithful in my mission of labor and love. I have tried to preach the great crowning truths of the gospel in relation to Christ's speedy coming and kingdom. And I think I am justified in saying that a good number of the outcast and down-trodden have been blest and sanctified through those truths.

I have become attached to the African people of this city; and although I am preparing to leave for the East, I have promised to return in the fall, the Lord willing, and build or hire some place to worship in. Those who subscribed for the Crisis are very much delighted with the paper. The paper is doing much good, and those who can read the paper do so in the hearing of those who cannot read.

I am devoting what leisure moments I have in collecting as many of their hymns and melodies as I can to carry with me when I go East. And I have compiled and arranged them in harmony for publication. I have a great many things to tell you. Next Lord's day I expect to preach at Ridge Prairie, where I labored two weeks, since coming out here, with good success. And some time next week I leave for Carlinville, Ill., where I expect to preach one week or more. From there I go to Chicago, Ill., and remain with my youngest brother, who resides there, until March 18th, during which time I intend to preach to the brethren in that city. From there I expect the Lord will want me to work my passage home by preaching the word of life to the brethren and sisters in all such places, on or near my route, as may be desired.

I trust in the will of Providence that I may soon be able to see and talk with you more fully upon those subjects which ought to interest us more than all others, in view of the little time we have to work for the salvation of those living in darkness, concerning the glory that is so soon to be revealed. I do hope and pray, yea, I do believe that the time is speedily coming when our brethren and sisters must see the necessity of giving to the millions of poor Freedmen and others of the South and West, in view of our soon coming King, the gospel, above all other things; by which our own hearts have been made to rejoice, knowing that our redemption is nigh at hand. Your Bro. in Christ, homeward bound to the haven of eternal rest, H. K. FLAGG.

St. Louis, Mo., Feb. 24th, 1866.

P. S.—My heart is made to rejoice exceedingly by the reception of a kind letter of encouragement received from Bro. Grant some two weeks since. It gave me new life and zeal to work. I also received a kind letter of remembrance from Bro. D. D. Chaffee, of So Wilbraham, Mass., enclosing for me five dollars of the Lord's money. It was received with gratitude. H. K. F.

PARTIES.—THE INJURY THEY DO.

Often when it comes the time of year to work, when the evenings are long, and business is light, and the very time to make an extra effort, at this moment somebody in the church will give a party, and invite some christian friends, so as to have a religious party. And then some other family must do the same to return the compliment. Then another and another, till it grows into an organized system of parties, that consume the whole winter. Abominable! This is the grand device of the devil, because it appears so innocent, and so proper, to promote a good feeling, and increase the acquaintance of christians with each other. And so, instead of prayer meetings, they will have these parties. The evils of these parties are very great. They are often got up at great expense, and the most abominable gluttony is practiced in them. It is said that the expense is from one hundred to two thousand dollars. I have been told in some instances, professed christians have given great parties, and made great entertainments, and excused their ungodly prodigality in the use of Jesus Christ's money, by giving what was left, after the feast was ended, to the poor! thus making it a virtue to feast, and riot, even to surfeiting, on the bounties of God's providence, under pretence of benefiting the poor. This is the same in principle with a splendid ball which was given some years since in a neighboring city. The ball was gotten up for the benefit of the poor, and each gentleman was to pay a certain sum, and after the ball was ended, whatever remained of the funds thus raised, was given to the poor.

Truly, this is a strange charity, to eat and drink and dance, and when they have rioted and feasted until they can enjoy it no longer, they deal out to the poor the crumbs that have fallen from the table. I do not see why such a ball is not quite as pious as such christian parties. The evil of balls does not consist simply in the exercise of dancing, but in the dissipation, and surfeiting, any temptations connected with them. But it is said they are christian parties, and that they are all, or nearly all, professors or religion who attend them. And furthermore that they are concluded often with prayer. Now I regard this as one of the worst features about them; that after the waste of time and money, the excesses in eating and drinking, the vain conversation, and nameless fooleries with which such a season is filled up, an attempt should be made to sanctify it, and palm it off upon God, by concluding it with prayer. Say what you will, it would not be more absurd or incongruous, or impious, to close a ball or a theatre or a card party with prayer. Has it come to this, that professors of religion, professing to desire the salvation of the world, when such calls are made upon them from the four winds of heaven, to send the gospel, to furnish Bibles and tracts, and missionaries to save the world from death, that they should spend hundreds of dollars in an evening, and then go to the monthly concert and pray for the heathen! In some instances, I have been told they find a salvo for their consciences in the fact that their minister attends their parties. This, of course, would give weight to such an example, and if one professor of religion sends a party and invited their minister, others must do the same. The next step they take, may be for each to give a ball, and appoint their minister a manager! Why not? And perhaps, by and by, he will do them the favor to play the fiddle. In my estimation he might quite as well do it as to go and conclude such a party with prayer. . . .

But I should advise any congregation, who are calculating to have a circle of parties, in the meantime to dismiss their minister, and let him go and preach where the people would be ready to receive the word and profit by it, and not have him stay and be distressed, and grieved, and killed by attempting to promote religion among them, while they are heart and hand in the service of the devil. In relation to parties, say what you please about their being an innocent recreation, I appeal to any of you who have ever attended them, to say whether they fit you for prayer, or increase your spirituality, or whether sinners are ever converted in them, or saints made to agonize in prayer for souls?—Rev. C. J. Finney.

GO TELL JESUS.

Bury thy sorrow,
The world has its share,
Bury it deeply,
Hide it with care.

Think of it calmly
When curtained by night,
Tell it to Jesus,
And all will be right.

Gather the sunlight
Aglow on thy way,
Gather the moon-beams,
Each soft silver ray.

Hearts grow weary
With heavier woe,
Droop 'mid the darkness—
Go comfort them, go!

Bury thy sorrow,
Let others be blest,
Give them the sunshine,
Tell Jesus the rest.

THE FIRST DAY SABBATH.

BRO. GRANT:—The following historical facts taken from Gilfillan's celebrated work on "The Sabbath," pp. 368–9, should be well considered by all who would desire a correct view of the christian Sabbath:—

"The history of the earlier centuries of christianity throws light on the meaning of certain Scripture terms which have been the occasion of a vexed question among controversialists. In designating what is now known amongst us as the christian Sabbath, the Fathers make use of names which they never apply to any other day of the week. With them 'the eighth day,' 'the day of the Sun,' 'the first day of the week,' and 'the Lord's day,' signify one particular day and no other. Barnabas, or whoever was the author of the Catholic Epistle ascribed to him, mentions 'the eighth day' as that on which 'Jesus rose from the dead,' and which the christians of his time observed as a festal day.* We are informed by Justin Martyr that the christians of the second century assembled on 'the day of the Sun,' and that they did so 'because on this first day God made the world, and Jesus Christ our Savior rose from the dead.'† The same Father affirms that 'Christ rose from the dead on the eighth day, which,' he adds, 'may be called the eighth and yet remains the first.'‡ In the third century, Cyprian represents the eighth day as both 'the first after the Sabbath, and the Lord's day.' §

"When we compare these passages with each other, we find that 'the eighth day,' 'the day of the Sun,' or Sunday, 'the day of the Redeemer's resurrection,' 'the first day of the week,' and 'the Lord's day,' are, according to the combined testimony of Barnabas, Justin Martyr, and Cyprian, the same day. . . . As 'the Sabbath' had been for so long a time the well known title of the weekly holy day among the Jews, it was obviously needful, for preventing mistake, that the institution which had passed to a new day should have a new name. But as time advanced, and (may not we add) as the Lord's day came to be no longer in danger of being confounded with the Jewish Sabbath, the old name was gradually resumed and attached to the christian holy day."

The above from Gilfillan is in harmony with other testimony which I have recently embodied in an article and sent to the Voice of the West. T. M. PREBLE.

"I LOVE EVERY BODY."

You do, friend? how much do you love every body? And what kind of love is it? Bible? the love of the holy prophets and apostles,—of Jesus Christ? Is your love gospel? If not, it is spurious, false, sickly, sentimental, or hypocritical. Does this love of yours lead you to obey God in rebuking sin of every kind, rise up against evil doers, and stand up against the workers of iniquity; reprove, rebuke, exhort with all long suffering and doctrine?

Have you the love of Phineas, when he executed judgment and the plague was stayed? See Num. 25 : 7, 8. Have you the love of Nathan the prophet, when he said to King David, "Thou art the man"? Have you the love of Elijah, Elisha, Isaiah, Jeremiah, Ezekiel, Daniel, who set their faces like a flint against every sin, cried aloud and spared not? Have you Samuel's love, who hewed Agag to pieces, and reproved King Saul to his face for his wickedness?

Have you the love of John the Baptist, who laid the axe at the root of all evil, rebuked Herod for his incest, at the risk of his head, and who said to self-righteous Sadducees and Pharisees, "O generation of vipers, who hath warned you to flee from the wrath to come?" Matt. 3 : 7, 8. Is your love like Paul's love, who said to Elymas the sorcerer, "O full of all subtlety and all mischief, thou child of the devil, thou enemy of all righteousness, wilt thou not cease to pervert the right ways of the Lord?" Acts 13 : 10, 11.

If you have not the love here specified, it is spurious, false, sickly, sentimental or hypocritical. Indeed, what you call love is hatred. "Thou shalt not hate thy brother in thy heart; thou shalt in any wise rebuke him, and not suffer sin to rest upon him." Lev. 19 : 17. "Be not deceived; God is not mocked."

Some parents profess to love their children very much, but how much do they love them? enough to subdue their stubborn wills and restrain them from wickedness? What kind of love was Eli's toward Stephen and Phineas, sons of Belial. Did he love them well enough to correct them betimes, teach them to obey God, have respect unto all his commandments? What did God think of Eli's love in household discipline? Turn to 1 Sam. 2 : 27. How readest thou? What kind of love was David's towards his children, in letting them do as they pleased, serve Satan and their own lusts, pride and ambition?

How many parents love their children in the same way. Eli and David suffered their "little ones" to grow up in idleness, in all manner of sin and folly, to live as they listed, to be lovers of pleasure more than lovers of God." Instead of love, God calls this hatred. "He that spareth his rod, hateth his son; but he that loveth him, chasteneth him betimes." Prov. 13 : 24.

Beloved reader, do you love enough to confess your faults, to go to those you have injured, and on your bended knees make hearty confession? If not, your love is spurious, false. We know a church member who professes to "love every body," even with a sanctified love; and this same individual has been instrumental in sundering the tenderest ties of kindred love and affection, mar the peace of families and the peace of Jerusalem sufficient to cause angels to weep tears of blood. And yet he asserts his innocence, and refuses to make any reparation or confession of his guilt, or acknowledge the evil he has done and is now doing; meanwhile, he continues his profession of perfect love. Could Satan himself desire a love better calculated to suit his infernal purposes? "He that hateth his brother is in darkness, and knoweth not whither he goeth, because that darkness (sin) hath blinded his eyes." 1 John 2: 11. "If any man say I love God, and hateth his brother, he is a liar." 1 John 4: 20.

We know a flaming professor, professing to "love every body," while at the same time the words of his mouth, the tone of his voice, the look of his eye, and every moving muscle of his face betrays him, gives the lie to his professions. We have meetings for prayer, praise and testimony so full of this kind of love that the individuals composing it have so much love they cannot find it in their loving hearts to rebuke popular sins, staring them full in the face. Is this the love God requires? or is it spurious, false, sickly sentiment?

To profess to "love every body" is popular and fashionable; it requires very little, if any self-denying or cross-bearing. One can profess love, perfect love, the love that "loves every body," and the Lord with all his "heart, soul and strength," and still love the world, be proud and covetous, follow worldly fashions, adorn his exterior with artificials, "gold, pearls, and costly array," read novels, romances, silly love tales, talk nonsense, attend pleasure parties, fancy fairs, sit down, eat, drink, make merry, and rise up to play, sip the wine cup and brandy bottle, chew and smoke tobacco, wink at popular sins in the pulpit and out of it, advocate the doctrine of expediency and compromise, carry religion in one hand, the world, sin, and Satan in the other.

Friends, is this exaggeration? "We speak that we do know, and testify that we have seen."

"Who is the honest man?
He that doth still and strongly good pursue,
To God, his neighbor, and himself, most true,
Whom neither force nor fawning can
Unpin, or wrench from giving all their due."

LETTERS ON REVISION.

LETTER II.—THE PARAGRAPH DIVISION.

On opening the octavo Revised New Testament, published by the American Bible Union, our eyes are greeted with a handsome and attractive page, made up of a large, clear type, and beautiful, white paper, which, by contrast, sets out the print with great distinctness. But we notice, as an improvement over the ordinary mode of printing the Scriptures, the division into paragraphs.

The common division of the Bible into chapters, was made by Cardinal Hugo, about the middle of the thirteenth century; and of the Old Testament into verses, by the Jewish Rabbi Nathan, about the middle of the fifteenth century; both of them to facilitate references by a Concordance. The New Testament was first printed in verses by Robert Stephens, a learned French printer, in the middle of the sixteenth century.

This division into chapters is very convenient for reading and reference; but it is not always judiciously made. See John 7 : 53 and 8 : 1. 1 Cor. 10 : 33, and 11 : 1; 13 : 1; 14 : 1. Phil. 3 : 21 and 4 : 1. Col. 3 : 25 and 4 : 1. In these instances the connection is intimate, and does not justify so radical a separation as that of chapters in the ordinary printed form.

In the Revised Testament, these evils are avoided by a careful and judicious division into paragraphs, according to the sense. And the desired advantages for reading and reference are secured, by indicating the chapter with the usual Roman capitals at its commencement and at the top of each right-hand page; and the verses, by placing its number at the beginning of each verse, in small figures, in the upper part of the printed line at the point required.

By this arrangement, and a careful and thorough revision of the text, the Bible is made plain even to "the way-faring man." And, without reproving look or voice, it seems to invite us to give our attention as we read; that we may understand what God our Savior is speaking to us, and may hide his word prayerfully in our hearts, and be led forth with joy in his ways.

THE NARROW WAY.

"Strait . . . and narrow is the way which leadeth unto life, and few there be that find it."

The way to life is truly a very strait and narrow way, and many who think they are walking in it are far from it. No one can travel in it except he has on the whole armor of God. He cannot wear any of Satan's armor in this path. If he gets on any of it he will be too large to go in the narrow way; for Satan causes men to feel very large sometimes; then they require a great amount of room, more than they can possibly have in it, so they undertake to remove the lines which bound it, that the way may be subjected to them, instead of their being subjected to it. But they cannot do this. The lines are immovable, and firm as the word of God can make them.

We must become small, every rough corner must be hewn off. We must be squared by the gospel rule if we travel the road to life. We must not undertake to carry sin in one hand and righteousness in the other; for we shall lose our balance if we do. We must put off every sin, not indulge in the least amusement with which evil is connected.

Some have an idea that after they get about so far they must have a hobby to ride; but when we cannot "walk in the truth," and think we must ride a hobby, we are far from the narrow way, for no hobbies are allowed to travel there. Some think if their brothers or sisters do not believe just as they do on some points, they cannot be christians, thus making tests, dividing the church. Others think they must conform to the world so far as not to lose their popularity. They must dress as well as, or a little better than others.

But God does not tell us of any such persons being in the narrow way. If we wish Jesus to know us when he comes, we must not disguise ourselves by these externals. If we intend to be saved, let us put off every thing which is unlike Christ, and put on his armor, and be ready for the battle, no matter if it does go against the old man in us, and cause him to feel uneasy; he had better be uneasy, and you have the control of him, than that he should get the control of you. If it is a little crossing to be humble, it is better to bear the cross and secure a crown, than to yield to Satan and lose it.

We have so many easily besetting sins, if we do not watch and pray every moment we shall be overcome by them. We must keep our eye on the mark, shun the very appearance of evil, and run with patience the race which is set before us. We have but a short distance to go now. Our race is almost run. Soon Jesus will come to judge the world in righteousness.

Do let us get into the narrow way, and keep in it, until He comes. It ends in the broad fields of the glorious Kingdom. It may be narrow, but it is at last an abundant entrance into our glorious Eden home.

INTEMPERANCE.

I have been for more than forty years a close observer of life and manners in various parts of the United States, and I know not the evil that will bear a moment's comparison with intemperance. It is no exaggeration to say that this single cause has produced more vice, crime, poverty and wretchedness, domestic and social, than all the other ills that scourge us, combined. In truth, it is scarcely possible to meet with misery in any shape, in this country, which will not be found, on close examination, to have proceeded, directly or indirectly, from ardent spirits. Want is one of its immediate consequences. The sad spectacle of destitute families, and of ignorant, half-naked, vicious children, ought never to be presented in a country like this, where the demand for labor is constant, the field unlimited, the sources of supply inexhaustible, and where there are none to make us afraid; and it never would be presented, or very rarely, were it not for the desolation brought upon families by the use of this deadly poison. It paralyzes the arm, the brain, the heart. All the best affections, all the energies of the mind, wither under its influence. The man becomes a maniac, and is locked up in a hospital, or imbrues his hands in the blood of his wife and children, and is sent to the gallows; or, if he escapes these consequences, he becomes a walking pestilence, miserable in himself, and loathsome to all others.

How often do we see whole families contaminated by the vicious example of the parent!—husbands, wives, daughters and sons, all drunkards and furies; sometimes wives murdering their husbands, husbands their wives, and worst of all, if worse can be, children murdering their parents. I am persuaded that if we could have a statistical survey and report of the affairs of unhappy families and individuals, with the causes of their misery, we should find nine cases of ten, if not a still greater proportion, resulting from the use of ardent spirits.

If some fatal plague, of a contagious character, were imported into our country, and had commenced its ravages, we should see prompt and vigorous measures adopted to extinguish it. But what are the most fearful plagues that ever carried death and havoc in their train, compared with this? They are only occasional; this is perennial. They are confined by climate or place; this malady is of all climates, and all times and places. They kill the body at once; this consumes both body and soul. What parent can ever feel that his son is safe while the living fountain of poison is within his reach? God grant that it may soon become a fountain sealed! Delightful relief would it be to turn from the awful and horrid past, to the pure, peaceful, and happy future! to see the springs of life and intelligence renewed on every hand, and health, industry and prosperity glowing around us! May God crown his own work with speedy success!—Attorney General Wirt.

FRESH AIR FOR BREATHING.

When persons speak of the necessity of fresh air for health, they are not always aware of its composition, and of the various purposes which it serves in the animal economy. It is a "thing," a substance to be weighed and measured, as one would water. Thus, it is estimated, that every grown-up human being in ordinary health makes twenty respirations (which consist in drawing into the lungs and giving out from them air) per minute, 1200 per hour, or 28,000 in a single day and night.

During this period of twenty-four hours there is an abstraction, by each person, from the atmospheric magazine of his or her portion of air, amounting to fifty-seven hogsheads, of which each one retains vital oxygen to the amount of about twenty pounds. This last-mentioned gas, which constitutes about one-fifth part of the atmospheric air, enters into the blood, and there serves to maintain the activity of all the functions of life, corporeal as well as mental. It has been estimated that about one-fourth of all the air drawn into the lungs by inspiration is altered in these organs, and is no longer fitted for breathing. The alteration consists, first, in the abstraction of the vitalizing element of oxygen; and secondly, in the addition of the deleterious and poisonous gas (carbonic acid) which, together with volatilized animal matter, escapes from the blood circulating in the lungs, and is given out by them during expiration, and finally escapes into the common or outer atmosphere. The atmosphere, it will thus be seen, not only supplies oxygen, or the vital element of the air, but it is also a great reservoir into which flow all the exhalations from the bodies of men and animals, and those resulting from animal and vegetable decay which takes place on the surface of the earth. If not carried away into space in the upper air, these exhalations would prove to be a destructive poison to all the people congregated in cities and towns. The process by which these exhalations are removed is ventilation; and the more complete it is, the healthier are the inhabitants; as, on the other hand, its imperfection and neglect are productive of diseases of the worst kind.

Fresh air is a food, the introduction of which into the lungs is more immediately and constantly necessary than that commonly reckoned as food, which is taken into the stomach. The call for the aerial food is incessant, and allows of no pause; that for solid and liquid food is periodical, and allows of postponement for many hours. A standard authority on the subject says: "It affords mechanical support, it is a heat-modifying medium, it swallows all gases exposed to it, it supplies a food to man, out of which he is in part built up, it feeds him with the active principle (oxygen) by which the warmth of the body is sustained. The minute terminations of the bronchi, themselves branching off from the windpipe into the substance of the lungs, are called air cells, and number about six hundred millions; the air which reaches these cells by breathing, and chiefly its oxygenous portion, permeates their sides and enters those of the minute blood vessels—capillaries as they are called—and thus finds entrance into the blood. The oxygen mixes with fluid, which it so changes as to fit it for the nutrition and building up of the new, and assisting to remove the old and worn-out materials of the organs. Mention has been made in a previous paragraph of the blood circulating in the lungs and throwing out its gaseous refuse in the form of carbonic acid and animalized exhalations.

There is no tampering with the respiratory wants. The lungs must have their due supply of pure air or the entire animal machine suffers. The lungs suffer, the heart suffers, the brain suffers, and the mind works slowly; the stomach is weakened and digests badly, muscular movement is enfeebled, the senses are dull, the natural color of health yields to a pallid and dingy hue. The movements of inspiration and expiration, which make up respiration, constitute the natural ventilation of the human frame. This living ventilation is carried on unceasingly from birth to death, by the infant as well as by the adult, by the philosopher as well as by the solitary artisan in his close, polluted atmosphere. Whether the surrounding air be pure or pestilential, we drink of it twenty times a minute. If of the latter kind, we look old in our youth; if of the former, we maintain the appearance of youth in old age. The average chance of living to the proverbial age of three-score years and ten may be considered the test of the purity of the air we breathe.

TEN WAYS TO COMMIT SUICIDE

Wearing thin shoes, stockings, and insufficient clothing in cold and rainy weather, leading a lazy, excited, theatre-going, dancing life; sleeping on feathers in a seven by nine room; eating hot stimulating food too fast, and too much of it, and at improper times, beginning with tea and coffee in childhood, and adding tobacco and spirits in due time, marrying in haste, and living in continual ferment thereafter; following unhealthy occupations to make money; taking bitters, and gormandizing between meals; giving way to fits of passion, or keeping in perpetual worry, going to bed at midnight and getting up at noon, and eating when you catch it. To which may be added a recipe for killing children:—paregoric, cordials, candy and rich cake, and when they are made sick thereby, mercury, tartaric-emetic, castor-oil and sulphur.

REMEDY FOR DYPHTHERIA.

ELD. GRANT:—I would like to point out a remedy in your valuable paper for this fatal disease. We have tried it in our own family, and found it to effect a cure in every case where it has been applied.

As soon as the symptoms appear, apply a flannel wet with kerosene oil to the throat. In about twenty-four hours it will draw out the inflammation, so the throat will be about well, unless in very bad cases, when it will require a longer time to effect a cure.

ALCOHOL.—Alcohol is a product of dissolution—of the wreck and disorganization of the principles of human food. It has the same origin as those malignant and fatal exhalations which constitute the genius of pestilence. Indeed, the same act which gives birth to alcohol, also brings into the world a twin compound, which is one of the promptest and subtlest of all poisons—Carbonic Acid Gas.—Youmans on Alcohol.

NEURALGIA.—A New Hampshire gentleman says: "Take two large table spoonfuls of cologne and two tea spoonfuls of fine salt; mix them together in a small bottle; every time you have any acute affection of the nerve, or neuralgia, simply breathe the fumes in your nose from the bottle, and you will be immediately relieved."

CURE FOR CANCER.—It is asserted by one who has proved its efficacy, that a certain cure for cancer is the juice of the sheep sorrel, or saggitate, expressed, and exposed on a pewter plate in the sun until somewhat jellied. Apply it on the skin over and around the cancer.

CURE FOR CORNS.—One who has tried it says that the best cure for corns is to keep them well wet with a strong solution of common washing soda, when they will soon and permanently disappear.

HOUR OF PRAYER.

O, if there is an hour
When angels visit earth,
'Tis when eve's bright dews shower
Their gems on folded flower,
And hushed day's voice of mirth,
With all its weary care;
The blessed hour of rest—
When, on the silent air,
The low, sweet voice of prayer
Rises from every grateful breast.
Yes, when birds seek their nests
At day's sweet closing hour,
And grief is lulled to rest,
Then angels are our guests,
If e'er they visit mortal bower.
O, blessed hour of prayer!
Season of happy rest,
When we to God repair,
Angel delights to share
With heaven, and ever blest.

THE FREEDMEN'S MISSION.

LETTER FROM BRO. FLAGG.

DEAR BRN. AND SRS.:—Quite a long time has elapsed since my last letter to the Crisis. And I doubt not some of you may be anxious to know something more about the condition of the Freedmen, and what the Lord is doing for them.

When I sent my last letter to the Crisis, I was just leaving for Memphis, Tenn. On my way, I stopped two days at Cairo, southern Ill., waiting for the boat. While there, I visited many of the Freedmen living at that place, who, during the war, were driven there for safety. As the place is quite large, and fast increasing, being situated at the junction of the Ohio and Mississippi rivers; it affords an abundance of labor, offering a good inducement for the Freedmen to remain.

Leaving that place Saturday evening, Jan. 6th, after two nights' and one day's ride down the Mississippi. I arrived at Memphis Monday morning, about 9 A. M. I found Bro. Himes stopping at Bro. Bywater's, about one mile east from the river. We took a stroll together through the suburbs of the city, visiting and taking a look at the thousands of Freedmen living in the suburban districts of the city proper; and seeking to obtain, by observation and inquiry, such information as might be useful in aiding ourselves and others in the great work of improving the condition of the Freedmen. During my short stay there, I lost no time, so far as I was able, to gather as much information as possible in relation to the condition, habits, morals and prospects of the thousands of Freedmen living in and around the city of Memphis; a brief notice of which may not be uninteresting to you.

THEIR MORAL CONDITION.

Among all the Freedmen I have visited, there appears to be a kind feeling towards each other, with a disposition to assist and aid each other amid their hardships, far more than is usually found among white people with superior advantages. And, although there are comparatively very few among them who can read or write, yet, with few exceptions, there can be found at least one in, or connected with, almost every family, who can read and write. And whenever they receive a paper, book, or religious tract, the one who can read will do so in the hearing of others, who will sit around and listen with interest. Those who can read appear to be very fond of books or religious tracts, which they promise to read in the hearing of their friends. In passing their houses, you will often hear them singing some of their religious hymns, which are so full of peculiar sweetness and melody, that you almost feel ashamed to sing in their presence. And I must say, since coming among them I seldom sing; and if I do, I am careful not to be heard much. This much is not only true of the African people at Memphis, but also of St. Louis; and from what I can learn from the Freedmen themselves, it is true of them all.

THEIR EMPLOYMENT AT MEMPHIS.

Many, if not most of the women, take in washing from the white people, for which they receive $1.50 per day. Many of the Freedmen own a mule and dray, with which they earn from four to ten dollars a day. Others work in various kinds of business as formerly, but for such wages as they can get. In one of their shanties, I saw a young married woman making a bed-quilt on the floor from some old ragged coarse cloth, putting inside a very thick wadding of the very nicest white cotton, which she had picked up about the city and by the side of the roads, there being large quantities scattered from the great number of loads continually coming into the city every day; some already pressed and baled out in the country, and others brought to the city packed in crockery crates and other ways, to be pressed and baled in the city for shipping.

THEIR HOUSES AND RENTS.

Most of the Freedmen live in the suburbs encircling the city, from a mile to a mile and a half from the city proper. Their houses are mere shanties, made of the poorest rough boards, set up endwise, like a woodshed or a barn. Many of them are without any windows; consequently without any light except what they get from the door, which is set open for that purpose. There is not a single timber inside of the house; and the roof rests upon the top of the boards, which are only held together by a narrow strip of cross board, running around the building, to which the others are nailed. The roof is simply covered with what might be called shingles, three feet in length, and having the exact appearance of barrel staves, just as they are split out, without being shaved or planed. These rest upon small rafters, made of round poles, about the size of large hoop poles. Three of these layers will cover one side of a building, ten and a half feet wide. The average length of their buildings is seventeen feet. The boards, running up to the roof on the end of the building, are left square, instead of being cut with a bevel so as to fit the roof; thus leaving a three-cornered hole big enough to put your hat through. The chimney runs up a little way on the outside. The houses are neither lathed nor plastered, which leaves them full of holes and cracks all around the building. The doors are made like those of the cheapest barns. Shanties of this kind, one mile from the city, rent from $72 to $120 dollars a year. There are many other shanties, made a little better, but precisely on the same plan, and rent much higher. None that I have seen have but one room. Shanties four times as large, and built on the same plan, having four rooms, each room designed for a family, rent from five to six hundred dollars a year.

THE CLIMATE.

The climate is such at Memphis, that even with these houses the inmates can live comparatively warm, and do not suffer in that respect like thousands of poor people we have at the north, where it is much colder. It is not so cold here but that the magnolia tree, which grows about the city (such as we have for house plants at the north), grows here as large as a horse chestnut; and the leaves, which are very large, are just as green during winter as in summer. And I have seen, in many of the front yards, rose and other bushes with their green foliage as at the first of Sept. north.

After a stay of one short week at Memphis, I deemed it more expedient for me to return to St. Louis, mostly for two very good reasons: First, my health was so poor, on account of the warm climate and damp atmosphere, that I was not able to go out to a single evening meeting. And second, I did not feel satisfied to go away and leave the Freedmen of St. Louis, where my labors had been blest with a fair prospect of continued labor with good results. Besides, every thing was so high at Memphis, that my scanty means, with no prospect of any increase, afforded me but little encouragement to remain. Board could not be obtained in private families for less than twelve to fifteen dollars a week; and other things in proportion. While at St. Louis, I pay but five dollars a week for my board, not including my washing, which the colored sisters are very willing to do free. But while I did remain at Memphis, I lost no time, so far as I was able, in visiting the Freedmen, and learning as much as I could of their condition, habits, and general history. And from all the information I obtained from various sources, I think I am fully justified in saying that Memphis presents as promiscuous a class of Freedmen as can be found in any other southern city; having come, during and since the war, from all the surrounding States.

There you find men and women who have toiled all their lives in the cotton and other fields, under the lash and burning sun; commencing work at daylight, and ceasing only at dark; having no other shelter at night but a poor hovel, no better than the barns we build for our cattle. This class have been treated like cattle, having but little or no better advantages; and consequently are very ignorant. Still, among this class can be found a fair number who can read the Bible and other books to their comrades and friends. And also among this class can be found as many, according to their number, who enjoy the life and power of religion, as any other class who enjoy superior advantages. And among this class, even, I have frequently seen a Bible lying upon their tables or window sills; and I would ask them if they could read? Sometimes they would answer, Yes, I can read a little. At other times they would say they could not read, but that they had a husband, son or daughter, or some other friend, who could and often did read the Bible to them.

I think, on the whole, notwithstanding their ignorance and the inferior advantages which they have had, there are many more among them in proportion to their number who are not only living up to the light they have, but are doing more towards winning souls to Christ than an equal number among any other class of people whose advantages and facilities for doing good are very far superior to theirs. And with all the disadvantages they must necessarily suffer, in not being able to read and write, there is one great advantage to be gained in preaching the plain, pure gospel, with all its doctrines and prophecies, unto them, for the simple reason that their minds have not been poisoned and embittered against the most precious and glorious truths of the gospel of the kingdom, by the knowledge they might have obtained by reading from the multitude of theological books and tracts so pregnant with infidelic creeds, traditions, and satanic systems of modern theology, so universal throughout all the different branches of modern literature. And I never have met with a people in my life who are so free from prejudice, and receive the gospel with so much delight, as those who can neither read nor write. And as astonishing as it may appear to those enjoying all the superior advantages of an education, it is nevertheless true that they can and do understand the Bible, seemingly, just as well as those who can read. And they are as ready to discover the least discrepancy in a scriptural argument as any others. And they are just as particular in having a plain "Thus saith the Lord" for every thing you preach, as any people I ever met with. And although a common education, to say the least, is very much needed among them, and by them greatly desired; nevertheless, it is not a thing which is absolutely necessary for them to have as a prerequisite, in order to understand and appreciate all the doctrines, instructions and prophecies of the Bible, when preached to them in a plain, easy manner, according to the simplicity of the gospel.

And, if the coming of Jesus Christ to judgment is as near as we profess to believe, then we, as the stewards of God, should lose no time in giving to them the gospel of the kingdom, in preference to every thing else, to the extent of all our means, as the only thing that has the life and power of salvation in bringing them into a condition to meet their God in peace. And this agrees fully with the plain instructions of our Savior, "But seek ye first the kingdom of God, and his righteousness, and all these things shall be added unto you." Matt. 6: 33.

THE WORK AT ST. LOUIS.

I came back to this place from Memphis, Jan. 16th. I found the good work going on and spreading among the African churches of the city. On my return to this place, some of the colored people informed me that praying and singing of spiritual songs and hymns could be heard in almost every lane and alley. For the colored people, instead of living in the streets of the city, live mostly in the lanes and alleys, in small houses, such as were built for them by their owners when they were slaves. But since they have become free, they hire the same houses, paying from $48 to $72 a year for only one room. And I never felt the force of our Savior's words, to go out quickly into the lanes and alleys, till I came among the poor Freedmen.

The African brethren inform me that there never was such a waking up throughout the city among that class as now. In the Methodist colored church, on 11th St., where Bro. Himes and myself both preached when we first came to the city, they are now having a great revival. One hundred and eight converts have already come out on the Lord's side. The work is still going on. In the colored Baptist church on 8th St., a powerful work is going on. Last Sunday week thirty-six were baptized there. And in the 7th St. African church, where I have labored principally, the work has been going on from the first. But it is impossible to tell how many have been converted to God; and very many of them have united with the other churches. But I met with converts all through the city who are praising God for free salvation.

I have tried in vain for nearly six weeks to hire a church, a hall, or a large vacant store, or storage house, where I could preach and feel perfectly free. If I could have succeeded, I have no doubt I could have had three hundred members in a few weeks. But I have given up all hopes of obtaining any place of my own to worship in, for the present. I have tried in the wisdom of God to be faithful in my mission of labor and love. I have tried to preach the great crowning truths of the gospel in relation to Christ's speedy coming and kingdom. And I think I am justified in saying that a good number of the outcast and down-trodden have been blest and sanctified through those truths.

I have become attached to the African people of this city; and although I am preparing to leave for the East, I have promised to return in the fall, the Lord willing, and build or hire some place to worship in. Those who subscribed for the Crisis are very much delighted with the paper. The paper is doing much good, and those who can read the paper do so in the hearing of those who cannot read.

I am devoting what leisure moments I have in collecting as many of their hymns and melodies as I can to carry with me when I go East. And I have compiled and arranged them in harmony for publication. I have a great many things to tell you. Next Lord's day I expect to preach at Ridge Prairie, where I labored two weeks, since coming out here, with good success. And some time next week I leave for Carlinville, Ill., where I expect to preach one week or more. From there I go to Chicago, Ill., and remain with my youngest brother, who resides there, until March 18th, during which time I intend to preach to the brethren in that city. From there I expect the Lord will want me to work my passage home by preaching the word of life to the brethren and sisters in all such places, on or near my route, as may be desired.

I trust in the will of Providence that I may soon be able to see and talk with you more fully upon those subjects which ought to interest us more than all others, in view of the little time we have to work for the salvation of those living in darkness, concerning the glory that is so soon to be revealed. I do hope and pray, yea, I do believe that the time is speedily coming when our brethren and sisters must see the necessity of giving to the millions of poor Freedmen and others of the South and West, in view of our soon coming King, the gospel, above all other things; by which our own hearts have been made to rejoice, knowing that our redemption is nigh at hand. Your Bro. in Christ, homeward bound to the haven of eternal rest, H. K. FLAGG.

St. Louis, Mo., Feb. 24th, 1866.

P. S.—My heart is made to rejoice exceedingly by the reception of a kind letter of encouragement received from Bro. Grant some two weeks since. It gave me new life and zeal to work. I also received a kind letter of remembrance from Bro. D. D. Chaffee, of So. Wilbraham, Mass., enclosing for me five dollars of the Lord's money. It was received with gratitude. H. K. F.

PARTIES.—THE INJURY THEY DO.

Often when it comes the time of year to work, when the evenings are long, and business is light, and the very time to make an extra effort, at this moment somebody in the church will give a party, and invite some christian friends, so as to have a religious party. And then some other family must do the same to return the compliment. Then another and another, till it grows into an organized system of parties, that consume the whole winter. Abominable! This is the grand device of the devil, because it appears so innocent, and so proper, to promote a good feeling, and increase the acquaintance of christians with each other. And so, instead of prayer meetings, they will have these parties. The evils of these parties are very great. They are often got up at great expense, and the most abominable gluttony is practiced in them. It is said that the expense is from one hundred to two thousand dollars. I have been told in some instances, professed christians have given great parties, and made great entertainments, and excused their ungodly prodigality in the use of Jesus Christ's money, by giving what was left, after the feast was ended, to the poor! thus making it a virtue to feast, and riot, even to surfeiting, on the bounties of God's providence, under pretence of benefiting the poor. This is the same in principle with a splendid ball which was given some years since in a neighboring city. The ball was gotten up for the benefit of the poor, and each gentleman was to pay a certain sum, and after the ball was ended, whatever remained of the funds thus raised, was given to the poor.

Truly, this is a strange charity, to eat and drink and dance, and when they have rioted and feasted until they can enjoy it no longer, they deal out to the poor the crumbs that have fallen from the table. I do not see why such a ball is not quite as pious as such christian parties. The evil of balls does not consist simply in the exercise of dancing, but in the dissipation, and surfeiting, any temptations connected with them. But it is said they are christian parties, and that they are all, or nearly all, professors or religion who attend them. And furthermore that they are concluded often with prayer. Now I regard this as one of the worst features about them; that after the waste of time and money, the excesses in eating and drinking, the vain conversation, and nameless fooleries with which such a season is filled up, an attempt should be made to sanctify it, and palm it off upon God, by concluding it with prayer. Say what you will, it would not be more absurd or incongruous, or impious, to close a ball or a theatre or a card party with prayer. Has it come to this, that professors of religion, professing to desire the salvation of the world, when such calls are made upon them from the four winds of heaven, to send the gospel, to furnish Bibles and tracts, and missionaries to save the world from death, that they should spend hundreds of dollars in an evening, and then go to the monthly concert and pray for the heathen! In some instances, I have been told they find a salvo for their consciences in the fact that their minister attends their parties. This, of course, would give weight to such an example, and if one professor of religion made a party and invited their minister, others must do the same. The next step they take, may be for each to give a ball, and appoint their minister a manager! Why not? And perhaps, by and by, he will do them the favor to play the fiddle. In my estimation he might quite as well do it as to go and conclude such a party with prayer.

But I should advise any congregation, who are calculating to have a circle of parties, in the meantime to dismiss their minister, and let him go and preach where the people would be ready to receive the word and profit by it, and not have him stay and be distressed, and grieved, and killed by attempting to promote religion among them, while they are heart and hand in the service of the devil. In relation to parties, say what you please about their being an innocent recreation, I appeal to any of you who have ever attended them, to say whether they fit you for prayer, or increase your spirituality, or whether sinners are ever converted in them, or saints made to agonize in prayer for souls?—Rev. C. J. Finney.

GO TELL JESUS.

Bury thy sorrow,
The world has its share,
Bury it deeply,
Hide it with care.

Think of it calmly
When curtained by night,
Tell it to Jesus,
And all will be right.

Gather the sunlight
Aglow on thy way,
Gather the moon-beams,
Each soft silver ray.

Hearts grow weary
With heavier woe,
Droop 'mid the darkness—
Go comfort them, go!

Bury thy sorrow,
Let others be blest,
Give them the sunshine,
Tell Jesus the rest.

THE FIRST DAY SABBATH.

BRO. GRANT:—The following historical facts taken from Gilfillan's celebrated work on "The Sabbath," pp. 368–9, should be well considered by all who would desire a correct view of the christian Sabbath:—

"The history of the earlier centuries of christianity throws light on the meaning of certain Scripture terms which have been the occasion of a vexed question among controversialists In designating what is now known amongst us as the christian Sabbath, the Fathers make use of names which they never apply to any other day of the week. With them 'the eighth day,' 'the day of the Sun,' 'the first day of the week,' and 'the Lord's day,' signify one particular day and no other. Barnabas, or whoever was the author of the Catholic Epistle ascribed to him, mentions 'the eighth day' as that on which 'Jesus rose from the dead,' and which the christians of his time observed as a festal day.* We are informed by Justin Martyr that the christians of the second century assembled on 'the day of the Sun,' and that they did so 'because on this first day God made the world, and Jesus Christ our Savior rose from the dead.'† The same Father affirms that 'Christ rose from the dead on the eighth day, which,' he adds, 'may be called the eighth and yet remains the first.'‡ In the third century, Cyprian represents the eighth day as both 'the first after the Sabbath, and the Lord's day.'§

"When we compare these passages with each other, we find that 'the eighth day,' 'the day of the Sun,' or Sunday, 'the day of the Redeemer's resurrection,' 'the first day of the week,' and 'the Lord's day,' are, according to the combined testimony of Barnabas, Justin Martyr, and Cyprian, the same day. . . . As 'the Sabbath' had been for so long a time the well known title of the weekly holy day among the Jews, it was obviously needful, for preventing mistake, that the institution which had passed to a new day should have a new name. But as time advanced, and (may not we add) as the Lord's day came to be no longer in danger of being confounded with the Jewish Sabbath, the old name was gradually resumed and attached to the christian holy day."

The above from Gilfillan is in harmony with other testimony which I have recently embodied in an article and sent to the Voice of the West. T. M. PREBLE.

For the World's Crisis.

"I LOVE EVERY BODY."

You do, friend? how much do you love every body? And what kind of love is it? Bible? the love of the holy prophets and apostles,—of Jesus Christ? Is your love gospel? If not, it is spurious, false, sickly, sentimental, or hypocritical. Does this love of yours lead you to obey God in rebuking sin of every kind, rise up against evil doers, and stand up against the workers of iniquity; reprove, rebuke, exhort with all long suffering and doctrine?

Have you the love of Phineas, when he executed judgment and the plague was stayed? See Num. 25: 7, 8. Have you the love of Nathan the prophet, when he said to King David, "Thou art the man"? Have you the love of Elijah, Elisha, Isaiah, Jeremiah, Ezekiel, Daniel, who set their faces like a flint against every sin, cried aloud and spared not? Have you Samuel's love, who hewed Agag to pieces, and reproved King Saul to his face for his wickedness?

Have you the love of John the Baptist, who laid the axe at the root of all evil, rebuked Herod for his incest, at the risk of his head, and who said to self-righteous Sadducees and Pharisees, "O generation of vipers, who hath warned you to flee from the wrath to come?" Matt. 3: 7, 8. Is your love like Paul's love, who said to Elymas the sorcerer, "O full of all subtlety and all mischief, thou child of the devil, thou enemy of all righteousness, wilt thou not cease to pervert the right ways of the Lord?" Acts 13: 10, 11.

If you have not the love here specified, it is spurious, false, sickly, sentimental or hypocritical. Indeed, what you call love is hatred. "Thou shalt not hate thy brother in thy heart; thou shalt in any wise rebuke him, and not suffer sin to rest upon him." Lev. 19: 17. "Be not deceived; God is not mocked."

Some parents profess to love their children very much, but how much do they love them? enough to subdue their stubborn wills and restrain them from wickedness? What kind of love was Eli's toward Stephen and Phinehas, sons of Belial. Did he love them well enough to correct them betimes, teach them to obey God, have respect unto all his commandments? What did God think of Eli's love in household discipline? Turn to 1 Sam. 2: 27. How readest thou? What kind of love was David's towards his children, in letting them do as they pleased, serve Satan and their own lusts, pride and ambition?

How many parents love their children in the same way. Eli and David suffered their "little ones" to grow up in idleness, in all manner of sin and folly, to live as they listed, to be lovers of pleasure more than lovers of God." Instead of love, God calls this hatred. "He that spareth his rod, hateth his son; but he that loveth him, chasteneth him betimes." Prov. 13: 24.

Beloved reader, do you love enough to confess your faults, to go to those you have injured, and on your bended knees make hearty confession? If not, your love is spurious, false. We know a church member who professes to "love every body," even with a sanctified love; and this same individual has been instrumental in sundering the tenderest ties of kindred love and affection, mar the peace of families and the peace of Jerusalem sufficient to cause angels to weep tears of blood. And yet he asserts his innocence, and refuses to make any reparation or confession of his guilt, or acknowledge the evil he has done and is now doing; meanwhile, he continues his profession of perfect love. Could Satan himself desire a love better calculated to suit his infernal purposes? "He that hateth his brother is in darkness, and knoweth not whither he goeth, because that darkness (sin) hath blinded his eyes." 1 John 2: 11. "If any man say I love God, and hateth his brother, he is a liar." 1 John 4: 20.

We know a flaming professor, professing to "love every body," while at the same time the words of his mouth, the tone of his voice, the look of his eye, and every moving muscle of his face betrays him, gives the lie to his professions. We have meetings for prayer, praise and testimony so full of this kind of love that the individuals composing it have so much love they cannot find it in their loving hearts to rebuke popular sins, staring them full in the face. Is this the love God requires? or is it spurious, false, sickly sentiment?

To profess to "love every body" is popular and fashionable; it requires very little, if any self-denying or cross-bearing. One can profess love, perfect love, the love that "loves every body," and the Lord with all his "heart, soul and strength," and still love the world, be proud and covetous, follow worldly fashions, adorn his exterior with artificials, "gold, pearls, and costly array," read novels, romances, silly love tales, talk nonsense, attend pleasure parties, fancy fairs, sit down, eat, drink, make merry, and rise up to play, sip the wine cup and brandy bottle, chew and smoke tobacco, wink at popular sins in the pulpit and out of it, advocate the doctrine of expediency and compromise, carry religion in one hand, the world, sin, and Satan in the other.

Friends, is this exaggeration? "We speak that we do know, and testify that we have seen."

"Who is the honest man?
He that doth still and strongly good pursue;
To God, his neighbor, and himself, most true;
Whom neither force nor fawning can
Unpin, or wrench from giving all their due."

LETTERS ON REVISION.

LETTER II.—THE PARAGRAPH DIVISION.

On opening the octavo Revised New Testament, published by the American Bible Union, our eyes are greeted with a handsome and attractive page, made up of a large, clear type, and beautiful, white paper, which, by contrast, sets out the print with great distinctness. But we notice, as an improvement over the ordinary mode of printing the Scriptures, the division into paragraphs.

The common division or the Bible into chapters, was made by Cardinal Hugo, about the middle of the thirteenth century; and of the Old Testament into verses, by the Jewish Rabbi Nathan, about the middle of the fifteenth century; both of them to facilitate references by a Concordance. The New Testament was first printed in verses by Robert Stephens, a learned French printer, in the middle of the sixteenth century.

This division into chapters is very convenient for reading and reference; but it is not always judiciously made. See John 7: 53 and 8: 1. 1 Cor. 10: 33, and 11: 1; 13: 1; 14: 1. Phil. 3: 21 and 4: 1. Col. 3: 25 and 4: 1. In these instances the connection is intimate, and does not justify so radical a separation as that of chapters in the ordinary printed form.

In the Revised Testament, these evils are avoided by a careful and judicious division into paragraphs, according to the sense. And the desired advantages for reading and reference are secured, by indicating the chapter with the usual Roman capitals at its commencement and at the top of each right-hand page; and the verses, by placing its number at the beginning of each verse, in small figures, in the upper part of the printed line at the point required.

By this arrangement, and a careful and thorough revision of the text, the Bible is made plain even to "the way-faring man." And, without reproving look or voice, it seems to invite us to give our attention as we read; that we may understand what God our Savior is speaking to us, and may hide his word prayerfully in our hearts, and be led forth with joy in his ways.

THE NARROW WAY.

"Strait . . . and narrow is the way which leadeth unto life, and few there be that find it."

The way to life is truly a very strait and narrow way, and many who think they are walking in it are far from it. No one can travel in it except he has on the whole armor of God. He cannot wear any of Satan's armor in this path. If he gets on any of it he will be too large to go in the narrow way; for Satan causes men to feel very large sometimes; then they require a great amount of room, more than they can possibly have in it, so they undertake to remove the lines which bound it, that the way may be subjected to them, instead of their being subjected to it. But they cannot do this. The lines are immovable, and firm as the word of God can make them.

We must become small, every rough corner must be hewn off. We must be squared by the gospel rule if we travel the road to life. We must not undertake to carry sin in one hand and righteousness in the other; for we shall lose our balance if we do. We must put off every sin, not indulge in the least amusement with which evil is connected.

Some have an idea that after they get about so far they must have a hobby to ride; but when we cannot "walk in the truth," and think we must ride a hobby, we are far from the narrow way, for no hobbies are allowed to travel there. Some think if their brothers or sisters do not believe just as they do on some points, they cannot be christians, thus making tests, dividing the church. Others think they must conform to the world so far as not to lose their popularity. They must dress as well as, or a little better than others.

But God does not tell us of any such persons being in the narrow way. If we wish Jesus to know us when he comes, we must not disguise ourselves by these externals. If we intend to be saved, let us put off every thing which is unlike Christ, and put on his armor, and be ready for the battle, no matter if it does go against the old man in us, and cause him to feel uneasy; he had better be uneasy, and you have the control of him, than that he should get the control of you. If it is a little crossing to be humble, it is better to bear the cross and secure a crown, than to yield to Satan and lose it.

We have so many easily besetting sins, if we do not watch and pray every moment we shall be overcome by them. We must keep our eye on the mark, shun the very appearance of evil, and run with patience the race which is set before us. We have but a short distance to go now. Our race is almost run. Soon Jesus will come to judge the world in righteousness.

Do let us get into the narrow way, and keep in it, until He comes. It ends in the broad fields of the glorious Kingdom. It may be narrow, but it is at last an abundant entrance into our glorious Eden home.

INTEMPERANCE.

I have been for more than forty years a close observer of life and manners in various parts of the United States, and I know not the evil that will bear a moment's comparison with intemperance. It is no exaggeration to say that this single cause has produced more vice, crime, poverty and wretchedness, domestic and social, than all the other ills that scourge us, combined. In truth, it is scarcely possible to meet with misery in any shape, in this country, which will not be found, on close examination, to have proceeded, directly or indirectly, from ardent spirits. Want is one of its immediate consequences. The sad spectacle of destitute families, and of ignorant, half-naked, vicious children, ought never to be presented in a country like this, where the demand for labor is constant, the field unlimited, the sources of supply inexhaustible, and where there are none to make us afraid; and it never would be presented, or very rarely, were it not for the desolation brought upon families by the use of this deadly poison. It paralyzes the arm, the brain, the heart. All the best affections, all the energies of the mind, wither under its influence. The man becomes a maniac, and is locked up in a hospital, or imbrues his hands in the blood of his wife and children, and is sent to the gallows; or, if he escapes these consequences, he becomes a walking pestilence, miserable in himself, and loathsome to all others.

How often do we see whole families contaminated by the vicious example of the parent!—husbands, wives, daughters and sons, all drunkards and furies; sometimes wives murdering their husbands, husbands their wives, and worst of all, if worse can be, children murdering their parents. I am persuaded that if we could have a statistical survey and report of the affairs of unhappy families and individuals, with the causes of their misery, we should find nine cases of ten, if not a still greater proportion, resulting from the use of ardent spirits.

If some fatal plague, of a contagious character, were imported into our country, and had commenced its ravages, we should see prompt and vigorous measures adopted to extinguish it. But what are the most fearful plagues that ever carried death and havoc in their train, compared with this? They are only occasional; this is perennial. They are confined by climate or place; this malady is of all climates, and all times and places. They kill the body at once; this consumes both body and soul. What parent can ever feel that his son is safe while the living fountain of poison is within his reach? God grant that it may soon become a fountain sealed! Delightful relief would it be to turn from the awful and horrid past, to the pure, peaceful, and happy future! to see the springs of life and intelligence renewed on every hand, and health, industry and prosperity glowing around us! May God crown his own work with speedy success!—Attorney General Wirt.

FRESH AIR FOR BREATHING.

When persons speak of the necessity of fresh air for health, they are not always aware of its composition, and of the various purposes which it serves in the animal economy. It is a "thing," a substance to be weighed and measured, as one would water. Thus, it is estimated, that every grown-up human being in ordinary health makes twenty respirations (which consist in drawing into the lungs and giving out from them air) per minute, 1200 per hour, or 28,000 in a single day and night

During this period of twenty-four hours there is an abstraction, by each person, from the atmospheric magazine of his or her portion of air, amounting to fifty-seven hogsheads, of which each one retains vital oxygen to the amount of about twenty pounds. This last-mentioned gas, which constitutes about one-fifth part of the atmospheric air, enters into the blood, and there serves to maintain the activity of all the functions of life, corporeal as well as mental. It has been estimated that about one-fourth of all the air drawn into the lungs by inspiration is altered in these organs, and is no longer fitted for breathing The alteration consists, first, in the abstraction of the vitalizing element of oxygen; and secondly, in the addition of the deleterious and poisonous gas (carbonic acid) which, together with volatilized animal matter, escapes from the blood circulating in the lungs, and is given out by them during expiration, and finally escapes into the common or outer atmosphere. The atmosphere, it will thus be seen, not only supplies oxygen, or the vital element of the air, but it is also a great reservoir into which flow all the exhalations from the bodies of men and animals, and those resulting from animal and vegetable decay which takes place on the surface of the earth. If not carried away into space in the upper air, these exhalations would prove to be a destructive poison to all the people congregated in cities and towns. The process by which these exhalations are removed is ventilation; and the more complete it is, the healthier are the inhabitants; as, on the other hand, its imperfection and neglect are productive of diseases of the worst kind.

Fresh air is a food, the introduction of which into the lungs is more immediately and constantly necessary than that commonly reckoned as food, which is taken into the stomach. The call for the aerial food is incessant, and allows of no pause; that for solid and liquid food is periodical, and allows of postponement for many hours. A standard authority on the subject says: "It affords mechanical support, it is a heat-modifying medium, it swallows all gases exposed to it, it supplies a food to man, out of which he is in part built up, it feeds him with the active principle (oxygen) by which the warmth of the body is sustained. The minute terminations of the bronchi, themselves branching off from the windpipe into the substance of the lungs, are called air cells, and number about six hundred millions; the air which reaches these cells by breathing, and chiefly its oxygenous portion, permeates their sides and enters those of the minute blood vessels—capillaries as they are called—and thus finds entrance into the blood. The oxygen mixes with fluid, which it so changes as to fit it for the nutrition and building up of the new, and assisting to remove the old and worn-out materials of the organs. Mention has been made in a previous paragraph of the blood circulating in the lungs and throwing out its gaseous refuse in the form of carbonic acid and animalized exhalations.

There is no tampering with the respiratory wants. The lungs must have their due supply of pure air or the entire animal machine suffers. The lungs suffer, the heart suffers, the brain suffers, and the mind works slowly; the stomach is weakened and digests badly, muscular movement is enfeebled, the senses are dull, the natural color of health yields to a pallid and dingy hue. The movements of inspiration and expiration, which make up respiration, constitute the natural ventilation of the human frame. This living ventilation is carried on unceasingly from birth to death, by the infant as well as by the adult, by the philosopher as well as by the solitary artisan in his close, polluted atmosphere. Whether the surrounding air be pure or pestilential, we drink of it twenty times a minute. If of the latter kind, we look old in our youth; if of the former, we maintain the appearance of youth in old age. The average chance of living to the proverbial age of three-score years and ten may be considered the test of the purity of the air we breathe.

TEN WAYS TO COMMIT SUICIDE

Wearing thin shoes, stockings, and insufficient clothing in cold and rainy weather; leading a lazy, excited, theatre-going, dancing life; sleeping on feathers in a seven by nine room; eating hot stimulating food too fast, and too much of it, and at improper times; beginning with tea and coffee in childhood, and adding tobacco and spirits in due time; marrying in haste, and living in continual ferment thereafter; following unhealthy occupations to make money; taking bitters, and gormandizing between meals; giving way to fits of passion, or keeping in perpetual worry; going to bed at midnight and getting up at noon, and eating when you catch it. To which may be added a recipe for killing children:—paregoric, cordials, candy and rich cake, and when they are made sick thereby; mercury, tartaric-emetic, castor-oil and sulphur.

REMEDY FOR DYPHTHERIA.

ELD. GRANT:—I would like to point out a remedy in your valuable paper for this fatal disease. We have tried it in our own family, and found it to effect a cure in every case where it has been applied.

As soon as the symptoms appear, apply a flannel wet with kerosene oil to the throat. In about twenty-four hours it will draw out the inflammation, so the throat will be about well, unless in very bad cases, when it will require a longer time to effect a cure.

ALCOHOL.—Alcohol is a product of dissolution—of the wreck and disorganization of the principles of human food. It has the same origin as those malignant and fatal exhalations which constitute the genius of pestilence. Indeed, the same act which gives birth to alcohol, also brings into the world a twin compound, which is one of the promptest and subtlest of all poisons—Carbonic Acid Gas.—Youmans on Alcohol.

NEURALGIA.—A New Hampshire gentleman says: "Take two large table spoonfuls of cologne and two tea spoonfuls of fine salt; mix them together in a small bottle; every time you have any acute affection of the nerve, or neuralgia, simply breathe the fumes in your nose from the bottle, and you will be immediately relieved."

CURE FOR CANCER.—It is asserted by one who has proved its efficacy, that a certain cure for cancer is the juice of the sheep sorrel, or saggitate, expressed, and exposed on a pewter plate in the sun until somewhat jellied. Apply it on the skin over and around the cancer.

CURE FOR CORNS.—One who has tried it says that the best cure for corns is to keep them well wet with a strong solution of common washing soda, when they will soon and permanently disappear.

THE INTERCESSOR.

"Father, I bring this worthless child to Thee,
To claim thy pardon—once, yet once again,
Receive him at my hands, for he is mine.
He is a worthless child: he owns his guilt:
Look not on him—he will not bear thy glance;
Look but on me—I will hide his filthy garments.
He pleads not for himself—he dares not plead;
His cause is mine—I am his Intercessor.
By that unchanged, unchanging oath of mine,
By each pure drop of blood I lost for him,
By all the sorrows graven on my soul,
By every wound I bear, I claim it due!
Father divine! I would not have him lost!
He is a worthless child, but he is mine;
Sin hath destroyed him—sin hath died in me;
Satan hath bound him—Satan is my slave;
Death has desired him—I have conquered death.
My Father, hear him now—not him, but me;
I would not have him lost for all the worlds
Thou hast long since created for my glory,
Because he is a poor, a worthless child,
And all, his every hope, on me it lies.
I know my children, and I know him mine
By all the tears he has wept on my bosom,
By that full heart that beats against my breast,
That contrite anguish that my children know—
By all his sighs o'er outcast Israel;
By all the prayers he breathes for Judah's sons;
I know him by the sign my children bear,
That trusting love with which he clings to me.
I could not bear to see him cast away,
Vile as he is—the weakest of my flock,
The one that grieves me most, that loves me best;
Yea, tho' his sins should dim each spark of love—
I measure not my love by his returns;
And though the stripes I send to bring him home,
Should serve to drive him farther from my breast,
Still he is mine—I lured him from the world;
He has no right, no home, but in my love;
Though earth and hell combined against him rise,
I am bound to rescue him, for we are one."

O sinner, what an advocate hast thou!
Methinks I see him lead the culprit in,
Poor, sorrowful, ashamed, trembling with fear,
Shrinking behind his Lord, accused, condemned,
Well pleased to hide the form himself abhors
With that all-spotless garment of his friend—
And hear the Father's words. "For him, for thee,
My Son—his cause is thine, and thine is mine;
Take thy poor, worthless child—he is forgiven."

For the World's Crisis.

THE MILLENNIUM.

BY M. D. WELLCOME.

There is but one passage in the Scriptures that mentions the Millennium, or thousand years. Mille, a thousand, and annus, a year. Yet it is generally believed by the Christian world that there will be a Millennium after the termination of six thousand years from creation, and that it will be a period of great peace, prosperity, triumph and glory to the church of Christ.

But in respect to the character of the Millennium, i. e., whether it will be of a mixed character, good and evil existing, only the good predominating, or whether all will be righteous, there is a difference of opinion. Also, how the Millennium is to be introduced; whether by Christ's personal advent and reign, or by his spiritual presence and reign, and the revival of the martyr spirit in the church. Dr. Barnes stands forth as an expositor of the latter view, and as his "Notes" are extensively known, and much in use in Sabbath schools, we will refer to him particularly in our examination of this very important question. He adopts Prof. Stuart's language from his exposition of the 20th of Revelation upon this point.

"There is not a word of Christ's descent to the earth at the beginning of the Millennium. Nothing of the literal assembling of the Jews in Palestine; nothing of the Messiah's temporal reign on earth; nothing of the overflowing abundance of peace and plenty." Barnes then adds: "Indeed, in all this passage there is not the remotest hint of the grandeur and magnificence of the reign of Christ as a literal king upon the earth; nothing of his having a splendid capital at Jerusalem, or anywhere else; nothing of a new dispensation of a miraculous kind; nothing of the renovation of the earth to fix it for the abode of the risen saints. All this is the work of mere fancy, and no man can pretend that it is to be found in this passage."

Now we will give his views of "the state of things during that long period of a thousand years."

1. "There will be a great increase in the population of the globe. Let wars cease, and intemperance cease, and slavery cease, and the numberless passions that now shorten life be stayed, and it is easy to see that there must be a vast augmentation in the numbers of the human species."

In all this passage is there the remotest hint that wars will cease, and intemperance and slavery cease, the passions of men be stayed, and, as a result, there be a vast increase of the human species?

2. "There will be a general diffusion of intelligence on the earth. Every circumstance will be favorable to it, and the world will be in a condition to make rapid advances in knowledge."

Is there a remote hint in the passage before us that such will be the state of the Millennium? Dan. 12: 4 is cited in proof. Is the "time of the end" the millennial age?

3. "That period will be characterized by the universal diffusion of revealed truth." Is this stated in the chapter he is considering? He refers to Isa. 11: 9; 25: 7. Let us see what he finds there to prove that knowledge will be universally diffused during the Millennium. "They shall not hurt nor destroy in all my holy mountain, for the earth shall be full of the knowledge of the Lord, as the waters cover the sea." Well, this does truly look like a time when knowledge shall be universally diffused throughout the world, but how does he know that this will be in the Millennium? Not that we dispute the fact, but how does he know it to be so? "There is not the remotest hint" of such a thing "in all this passage," "and no man can pretend that it is to be found in this passage." Notes on Rev. 20.

The promise quoted from Isa. 11 is given in connection with a description of a glorious time, when the beasts shall have become wholly changed in disposition, so that the once ravening wolf now dwells with the innocent lamb; the rapacious leopard lies down with the kid, and the calf feeds safely with the noble lion. All their ferocity is gone; their food is now that of the ox, and a little child can lead them. The poisonous asp and venomous adder are harmless now, and with them the tender babe can play without fear. When is this? In the sixty-fifth chapter we have a description of the same changed condition of the wild beasts, and we find this state to be located in the new creation. It is after a new heaven and a new earth are prepared for the habitation of the righteous. Peter says it shall be after the dissolving of the heavens by fire—the melting of the elements and the earth, and the burning up of its present works. Called by him "the day of judgment and perdition of ungodly men." In the new creation, righteousness alone will dwell. See 2 Pet. 3. John the Revelator has also given us a glimpse of its glories in the twenty-first chapter.

With Barnes we can therefore agree in believing that, during the Millennium, the earth will be as full of the knowledge of the Lord as the sea is of water, yet we apply it differently; for he locates it in the present world, unregenerated by the baptism of fire, and we place it in "the world to come" (Heb. 2: 5), in the regeneration" (Matt. 19: 28), after the "restitution of all things spoken of by all the prophets since the world began" (Act 3: 21), in the new earth, when all things are made new (Rev. 21: 1–5.)

Let us now examine Dr. Barnes' other proof text, Isa. 25: 7: "And he will destroy in this mountain the face of the covering cast over all people, and the veil that is spread over all nations." What is this covering, or veil, that is spread over all people, which will one day be removed? The next verse explains it: "He will swallow up death in victory, and the Lord God will wipe away tears from off all faces, and the rebuke of his people shall he take away from off all the earth: for the Lord God hath spoken it." When is death swallowed up in victory? Paul applies it to the resurrection. 1 Cor. 15: 54. When does the Lord wipe away all tears from the face of his people? In the "new earth."—Rev. 21: 4. Then there will be no more the voice of weeping, nor the voice of crying.—Isa. 65: 13. Dr. Barnes is therefore right in applying this text also to the Millennial age, even though there be not a hint of it in the 20th of Revelation.

4. "It will be marked by unlimited subjection to the sceptre of Christ." We will examine his proof texts on this point. Psa. 2: 7: "I will declare the decree: the Lord hath said unto me, 'Thou art my Son, this day have I begotten thee.'" This text is taken out from the midst of two others connected with it. "Yet have I set my King upon my holy hill of Zion." Zion was the site of David's throne. Christ is David's son. He is the promised heir to his throne. The angel told Mary that Jesus should "be called the Son of the Highest, and the Lord God shall give unto him the throne of his father David, and he shall reign over the house of Jacob forever; and of his kingdom there shall be no end."—Luke 1: 32, 33.

The verse which follows the one quoted, is, "Ask of me, and I will give thee the heathen for thine inheritance, and the uttermost part of the earth for thy possession. Thou shalt break them with a rod of iron, thou shalt dash them in pieces like a potter's vessel."—Those who overcome, and endure unto the end, have the promise of sharing in these conquests, "even," says Christ, "as I have received of my Father." Rev. 2: 26, 27. This will be when the stone smites the image on the feet, and the gold, silver, brass, iron and clay are broken to pieces together, and like the chaff of the threshing-floor are driven away. Then the kingdom of Christ will fill the whole earth. Yes, there will be indeed an unlimited subjection to Christ, for all who will not serve him shall perish. Isa. 65: 12.

Dr. Barnes next cites Zech. 9: 10, for what purpose we do not understand, as it was fulfilled at Christ's entry into Jerusalem. Psa. 22: 27, 28. When the kingdom is the Lord's, all kindred among the nations shall worship him. Dan. 7: 27. Isa. 2: 2, 3, is cited. Isa. 2: 2–4 is considered a strong proof of a temporal millennium. It has often been quoted to show that a time is coming when religion will have the supremacy, and war will cease. However, upon a careful analysis of this chapter, and its counterpart, Mic. 4, we find that "many people" are to predict these things in the "last days," and to invite others to go with them to the house of the Lord, because the law shall go forth from Zion, and the word of the Lord from Jerusalem. The house of Jacob are invited also to go with them.

But the prophet proceeds to utter denunciatory language against those whom he denominates "soothsayers like the Philistines." He says their land is full of silver and gold, and horses and chariots, and idols; they worship that which their own fingers have made, and the mean man and the great man alike bow down in idolatrous worship, "therefore forgive them not." Then the prophet describes the day of the Lord, which is to come in all its terror upon the worldly, proud, idolatrous people, and he will bring down their haughtiness and lofty looks to the ground, and he himself shall alone be exalted. Then will the idol worshipers cast their idols to the moles and the bats—not to embrace christianity, but to go into the caves and holes of the rocks, for fear of the Lord, when he ariseth to shake terribly the earth. We have not time to dwell particularly on the specific points of this chapter, but will notice another text quoted by Dr. Barnes. Zech. 14: 9:—"And the Lord shall be king over all the earth." To this we fully agree. And the fifth verse shows that he makes his second advent with all his saints, prior to his being king over all the earth.

Rev. 11: 15 is cited. "And the seventh angel sounded; and there were great voices in heaven saying, The kingdoms of this world are become the kingdoms of our Lord and of his Christ; and he shall reign forever and ever." Here the Dr. is right again in referring to this text as affording proof of the "unlimited subjection to the sceptre of Christ," which will mark the Millennial age. All kingdoms are inherited by Christ.

Now let us analyse this text, with its surroundings, and see what events are given in connection. Seven trumpets compose the series. The last three are woe trumpets. "Woe, woe, WOE to the inhabiters of the earth, by reason of the other voices of the trumpet of the three angels, which are yet to sound!" Rev. 8: 13. "The second woe is past; and behold the third woe cometh quickly." Then comes in the text referred to. Now if the seventh trump ushers in the Millennium as understood by this commentator, when all the world is be brought under the dominion of Christ, when peace is to be universal, slavery abolished, intemperance done away, the evil passions which now lead men into sin subjugated, and righteousness and knowledge fill the earth as the waters do the sea, in what sense can it be a woe trumpet to the inhabitants of earth? Would it not be more properly the trumpet of jubilee?

Viewing this subject in the light of Revelation, rather than by the darkness of this learned Dr.'s creed, we can clearly understand why it is woe to the dwellers of earth, though a blessing to the saints of God. Let us read the succeeding verses. The four and twenty elders give thanks to God because he has taken his great power to reign. "And the nations were angry, and thy wrath is come, and the time of the dead that they should be judged, and that thou shouldst give reward unto thy servants, the prophets, and to the saints, and to all that fear thy name, small and great, and shouldst destroy them that destroy or corrupt the earth." Such are the attendant events of the sounding of the seventh trumpet. Angry nations, and the wrath of God against those who corrupt the earth, but reward to all the servants of God, both small and great.

When does the wrath of God come?—When the heavens depart as a scroll, and mountains and islands are removed out of their places. When the great white throne appears in view, and the great men, and rich men, kings, captains, bondmen and freemen, cry to rocks and mountains to fall on them, and hide them from the face of him that sitteth on the throne, and from the wrath of the Lamb, crying out in their agony, "the great day of his wrath is come, and who shall be able to stand?" Woe, truly, to the inhabitants of earth!

When are the dead judged? "Who shall judge the quick and the dead, at his appearing and kingdom." 2 Tim. 4: 1. When is the reward given to the prophets and saints? "For the Son of Man shall come in the glory of his Father, with his angels, and then shall he reward every man according to his works." "Behold, I come quickly, and my reward is with me, to give every man according as his work shall be." These texts, then, establish the fact that it is when Jesus Christ comes in the glory of his Father, with his angels, that the reward is given.

Who can fail to see a harmony in the prophetic word touching this question? Paul, in his argument on the resurrection (1 Cor. 15), says, "We shall all be changed in a moment, in the twinkling of an eye, at the last trump (the seventh is the last); for the trumpet shall sound, and the dead shall be raised incorruptible, and we shall be changed."

We have now examined the various texts cited by Dr. Barnes in proof of his views, and we have shown from the context that they go to establish the fact of Christ's personal reign on earth, with the raised and translated saints. That the state of things during the Millennium is not mixed, but all are righteous; wicked nations are destroyed; the tares no longer grow with the wheat, but are rooted up, gathered out, and cast into the furnace of fire.

We will now notice some of the Dr.'s objections to the literal view. First, he says, "One strong presumptive evidence against this interpretation, that there will be a literal resurrection of the bodies of the saints at the beginning of that Millennial period 'to live and reign with Christ on earth,' is derived from the following circumstance:—It is admitted on all hands that this doctrine, if contained in the Scriptures at all, is found in this passage only. But it is strange, not to say improbable, that the doctrine of a literal resurrection of the righteous a thousand years before the wicked, should be announced in one passage only. It is strange that in respect to so important a doctrine as this, if it be true, there is not elsewhere a hint, an intimation, or allusion, that would lead us to suppose that the righteous are to be raised in this manner. If this be a true doctrine, it would be reasonable to expect that a clear and unambiguous statement of it would be made. Certainly, if there is but one statement on the subject, that might be expected to be a perfectly clear one." The objections brought by Dr. Barnes against the doctrine of a literal resurrection of the saints, in this passage, are equally weighty against the doctrine of a literal Millennium, for it is only taught in the passage under consideration, and that "in the book which of all the books in the Bible is most distinguished for figures and symbols." Blot out the 20th of Revelation, and where will we find the doctrine of a Millennium? Are not the orthodoxy greatly in the fault here? Basing their fondly cherished faith of a thousand years spiritual reign of Christ with his martyred saints, on one passage in a symbolic book? Ought not a doctrine so important as this to be taught in a perfectly clear, unambiguous manner, by Christ and his apostles? If the first resurrection is a symbol, why not the binding of Satan, the thousand years, and the second resurrection? It is very inconsistent to make the first resurrection a symbol, and then literalize the living again of the rest of the dead, understanding it to refer to the general resurrection. If symbolic in the first, it must be in the second; if literal in the first, it must be literal in the second.

"Elsewhere," says Barnes, "the account of the resurrection is given in the most general terms."

BOSANQUET'S CHRONOLOGY.

(Concluded.)

Having now gone through and revised Bosanquet's chronology, we will give a table to show that, thus revised, it is the same with mine; or that the recent discoveries among the ruins of Nineveh prove first the incorrectness of Usher's Chronology, or Ptolemy's Canon, and the strict correctness of my chronology.

A TABLE OF BOSANQUET'S CHRONOLOGY.

B. C.	Israel.	Judah.	Babylon.	Assyria.
722	9	48		1	Tiglath Pileser, king of Assyria, reigned 27 years.
721	10	49	1	2	Mardoc Empadus, king of Babylon, reigned 12 years.
710	9	8	12	13	End of Mordoc's reign according to Ptolemy's Canon.
698	20	4		25	Isaiah's prophecy of "the spoil of Samaria." Isa. 8. 4.
696	3	6		27	End of the reign of Tiglath Pileser, in the sixth year of Ahaz.
695	4	7		1	Shalmaneser, or Sargon, reigned 15 years, and in the end
694	5	8		2	of his first year he carried off 27,280 families from Samaria, as foretold by Isaiah 8: 4.
692	7	10	1	4	Mesessi Merodach, or Marduk-Bal-adan, reigned 12 years, according to the inscription.
685	5	2	8	11	Sargon, according to the inscription, took Ashdod in his eleventh year. Isa. 20: 1.
684	6	3	9	12	In the 12th of Sargon, the war against Marduk-Baladan commenced.
683	7	4	10	13	The war against Samaria commenced in the fourth year of Hezekiah. 2 Kings 18: 9.
681	9	6	12	15	End of the kingdom of Israel, in the 6th year of Hezekiah.
680		7	1	1	Beginning of the reign of Sennacherib and his son Esarhaddon.
678		9	3	3	Sennacherib's expedition against the king of Sidon, according to the inscription.
676		11	5	5	The captivity under Sennacherib commenced on the 10th day of the 11th month.
673		14	8	8	Sennacherib slain in the 14th year of the reign of Hezekiah.
672		15	9	1	The brother of Sennacherib perhaps reigned about one year.
671		16	10	30 d.	Hagisa reigned over the Babylonians for the space of 30 days.
671		16	10	6 m	"Merodach-baladan, the son of Baladan, reigned 6 months." Isa. 39: 1.
670		17	11	1	Elibus reigned the second time over the Babylonians.
668		19	13		End of the reign of Esarhaddon, according to the Canon.
625		33	1		Nabopalassar, king of Babylon, reigned 29 years, according to Berosus.
621		37	5		An eclipse of the moon at Babylon in the 5th of Nabopalassar.
597		4	29		End of the reign of Nabopalassar, the first king by this name.
596		5	1		"Saracus king of the Chaldeans" reigned before Sardanapalus.
587		14	1		Sardanapalus or Nabopalassar reigned 21 years, says Berosus.
565		4	1		Nebuchadnezzar reigned 43 years, as admitted by all.
558		11	8		The carrying away from Jerusalem in the eighth of Nebuchadnezzar.

EXPLANATION OF THE TABLE.

B. C. 722 is the 9th year of Menahem 48th of Azariah, and the first of Tyglath Pileser, king of Assyria, who reigned 27 years. B. C. 721 is the first of Mardoc Empadus, king of Babylon. According to Ptolemy, there was a total eclipse of the moon in the first year of his reign; and according to my tables there was a total eclipse of the moon on the 19th of March, B. C. 721, fixing that as the first year of Mardoc. Ptolemy further mentions that two eclipses occurred in his second year, the first of which is supposed to have happened on the 8th of March, B. C. 720, and it is evident that Ptolemy was of the same opinion; but if he was not mistaken as to the quantity eclipsed in the one seen and "carefully observed" in A. D. 136, it is certain that there was no eclipse on the 8th of March, B. C. 720. According to my tables, the moon was eclipsed six digits at sunrise, in Babylon, September 12th, B. C. 721, which is about the quantity Ptolemy gives for the third eclipse; but for the second, he gives only three digits. The third is said to have occurred on the first of September, B. C. 720; and my tables eclipse 2½ digits at that time, which is near the quantity which Ptolemy gave for the second eclipse.

As the time these eclipses occurred is given by Ptolemy, not according to the Chaldean, but the Egyptian method of reckoning, it is evident that the dates are not of Chaldean, but Egyptian origin; therefore the mistake on the part of Ptolemy may easily be accounted for by supposing that the Chaldean record only gave the quantity eclipsed, and the year of Mardoc's reign in which they occurred. Thus, in his first year, one total; in his second year, one of six, and another of three digits.

This Mardoc Empadus is understood to be the Merodach-Baladan of Isaiah, by those who follow what is called Ptolemy's Canon, or Usher's chronology, which has been proved to be erroneous, by the late discoveries among the ruins of Nineveh; for Dr. Hincks says that "Marduk-Baladan," "of the inscriptions, is there described as the son of Yagin." Says Bosanquet, this is a "fatal blow . . . given to the received chronology, which assumes that Marduk-Baladan," "son of Yagin," "is the same as the Merodach-Baladan, son of Baladan of Scripture, which is impossible."—Sacred and Profane Chronology, pp. 60 and 66. Thus we find, when the truth is discovered, those eclipses, which appeared to be in the way of receiving the true Bible chronology, become an additional proof of its correctness.

B. C. 695. Bosanquet allows 16 years for the reign of Shalmanezer; but "the records of this king of Khorsabad extend [only] to his fifteenth year." (Appendix, p. 3.) "Colonel Rawlinson considers that Sargon and Shalmanezer are the same king." That he is correct in this may be proved thus:—Sargon, "in the inscriptions, is found to be the father of Sennacherib" (Sacred and Profane Chronology, p. 60); and in the Book of Tobit, Sennacherib is said to be the son of Enemessar, that is, Shalmanezer.

B. C. 694. Says Bosanquet, "The inscriptions relate that Shalmanezer, in his first year, . . . came against Samaria; and Isaiah, writing while Ahaz and Pekah were both reigning, . . . predicts that before his son shall be able to cry, 'My father and my mother,' . . . 'the spoil of Samaria shall be taken.'—Isaiah 8: 4. The predicted invasion is that recorded at Khorsabab, when 27,000 families and upwards were carried away."—(Appendix, p. 3.)

Says Demetrius,—"From the time when the ten tribes were made captive from Samaria (i. e., in the reign of Shalmanezer), to the reign of the fourth Ptolemy (Philopater), was 473 years and 9 months" (p. 36). The reign of the fourth Ptolemy commenced on the 10th day of the 8th month, B. C. 220, to which add 473 years and 9 months, and we have the 10th day of the 11th month, B. C. 694, for the time they were carried captive; that is, in the latter part of the first, or the beginning of the second year of the reign of Shalmanezer, at which time Tobit also was led captive.

B. C. 692. According to Ptolemy's Canon, the reign of Mesessi-Merodach commenced in B. C. 692. In the Canon he is allowed but 4 years, which is followed by an interregnum of 8 years. But, from the discoveries among the ruins of Nineveh, we learn that if he was the Marduk-Baladan of "the inscription," his reign continued through the twelve years. And whether he was the same king, or not, we know from those inscriptions (to which all other authority must yield), that the twelfth year of Marduk-Baladan did end with the beginning of the reign of Asaradin, or Esarhaddon of the Canon; for he was "subjugated by Sennacherib at the very commencement of his reign" (Appendix, p. 5); at which time he placed his son Esarhaddon on the throne of Babylon (page 64). According to the Canon, the reign of Esarhaddon commenced B. C. 680, to which add 12, and we have 692 for the beginning of the reign of Marduk-Baladan.

B. C. 685. Shalmanezer, or "Sargon, according to the inscription, took Ashdod in his eleventh year" (p. 62), which dates the contents of the 20th chapter of Isaiah in the year B. C. 685.

B. C. 684. According to "the inscriptions," a "war . . . commenced in the twelfth year of Sargon" against Marduk-Baladan; and when this Marduk-Baladan had reigned twelve years, he was "subjugated by Sennacherib at the very commencement of his reign."—Page 60, appendix, p. 5.

B. C. 681. Says Bosanquet, "Samaria was taken by Shalmanezer, . . . the second year, before Sennacherib came to the throne of Nineveh. Thus is Colonel Rawlinson's suggestion of a second invasion of Palestine, towards the end of the reign of Shalmanezer, confirmed."—(Appendix, p. 2.)

B. C. 680. "The inscription informs us the Babylonians under Morduk-Baladan, their king, were subjugated by Sennacherib at the very commencement of his reign." (Appendix, p. 5.) And Polyhistor informs us that when Sennacherib had "taken upon himself the government of the Babylonians, he appointed his son Asordanes their king, and he himself retired again into Assyria." Says Bosanquet, "This Asordanes . . . is the Asordan of the Septuagint, son of Sennacherib, who is the Esarhaddon of the Hebrew, and the Asaradinus of the Canon, as we have before shown." (Page 64.)

Now according to Ptolemy's Canon and the received chronology, this Asordanes came to the throne B. C. 680; and since he was placed on the throne by Sennacherib, when he took "upon him the government of the Babylonians," this also dates the beginning of the reign of Sennacherib; for those inscriptions, to which all other authorities must yield, give "the very commencement of his reign" for the time at which he thus "took upon himself the government of the Babylonians." Therefore, if Ptolemy's Canon may here be considered reliable, the recent discoveries among the ruins of Nineveh prove that the reign of Sennacherib commenced B. C. 680, which is a clear and positive proof of the incorrectness of the received, or Usher's chronology, which places the 14th year of Hezekiah in B. C. 713; that is, 33 years before Sennacherib came to the throne; for he was certainly on the throne in the 14th year of the reign of Hezekiah (2 Kings 19: 36). This removes a difficulty in which I had before been so much involved; which is this: we read in 2 Kings 17: 24, that "the king of Assyria brought men . . . and placed them in the city of Samaria"; and from Ezra 4: 2, we learn that the king who brought them was Esarhaddon; who, according to the received chronology, did not come to the throne until 41 years after. But now all comes natural and right. In the latter end of the year B. C. 681, Shalmanezer carried "away Israel unto Assyria" (2 Kings 18: 11); hence the earliest time at which Esarhaddon could have brought and placed those men in "the cities of Samaria," was B. C. 680; and according to the Canon, this is the very year in which he came to the throne. Thus difficulties vanish when we obtain the light of truth.

As an additional proof of the incorrectness of that chronology, which so much conflicts with the word of God, let the reader call to mind that "the king of Assyria brought men from Babylon" (2 Kings 17: 24), which could not have been done before the conquest of Babylon; and those inscriptions, found among the ruins of Nineveh, give us the beginning of the reign of Sennacherib as the date of its conquest. "The war is said to have commenced in the twelfth year of Sargon [or Shalmanezer], and "Marduk-Baladan, king of Chaldæa, was subdued after he had held Babylon for twelve years" (p. 60); and the king by whom he was subjugated was "Sennacherib [son of Sargon], at the very commencement of his reign."—(Page 5.)

B. C. 678. We have already mentioned that, according to the inscription, Sennacherib's expedition against the king of Sidon was in his third year, B. C. 678; and the inscription places his invasion of Judea after that.

B. C. 676. Says Demetrius. "The tribes of Benjamin and Levi were not carried into captivity by Senacherim, but that from this captivity to the last captivity from Jerusalem, by Nebuchadnezzar, was a period of 128 years and 6 months." The last captivity by Nebuchadnezzar occurred on the tenth day of the fifth month, B. C. 547; to which add 128 years and 6 months, and we have the tenth day of the eleventh month, B. C. 676. Thus we find an exact harmony existing between the Bible, Demetrius, and the recent discoveries among the ruins of Nineveh.

B. C. 673. We have observed that Sennacherib's first expedition against Hezekiah was B. C. 676. By comparing 2 Kings 19: 9, with Isaiah 20: 3, I believe it has become the universal opinion that there was an interval of three years between the two invasions of the land of Judea by Sennacherib. Three from 676 leaves B. C. 673 for the time of the second invasion, which was "in the 14th year of Hezekiah" (2 Kings 18: 13); and by comparing Isa. 37: 37, 38, with the first chapter of the book of Tobit, we learn that Sennacherib was slain in the 14th year of Hezekiah, which proves that his reign continued only eight years, though Dr. Hincks gives him nine. "Polyhistor gives eighteen years to Sennacherib" (appendix, p. 2); but I suppose this is only a mistake on the part of some transcriber; the original must have read eight instead of eighteen years; for Sennacherib had not ascended the throne as early as the sixth of Hezekiah; and since he was slain in the 14th of Hezekiah, his reign could not have continued over eight years.

B. C. 672. From Polyhistor, it would appear that after the death of Sennacherib, his brother reigned about one year.

B. C. 671. Says Polyhistor, "After the reign of the brother of Sennacherib, Hagisa reigned over the Babylonians; and when he had governed for the space of thirty days, he was slain by Merodach-Baladan, who held the empire by force during six months."—(P. 64.) This is the Merodach-Baladan mentioned by Isaiah 39: 1. Isaiah says he was "the son of Baladan"; and we have observed that Baladan his father was slain by Sennacherib.

B. C. 670. According to Polyhistor, Merodach-Baladan "was slain and succeeded by a person named Elibus."—P. 64. This is the second time this Elibus was on the throne; for says Polyhistor, "In the third year of his reign, Sennacherib, king of the Assyrians, levied an army against the Babylonians, and in a battle in which they were engaged routed and took him prisoner with his adherents" (p. 64), which could not have been the third year after Elibus slew Merodach Baladan, for that would have been about five years after the death of Sennacherib, who is here said to have taken Elibus prisoner; and we know from those inscriptions, to which all other authorities must yield, that the time Sennacherib subjugated the Babylonians was "at the very commencement of his reign." (Appendix, p. 5.) I suppose the truth of the matter is about this: when Sargon, the father of Sennacherib, in the twelfth year of his reign commenced the war against Marduk-Baladan, he associated this Elibus with him on the throne; for the time he was taken prisoner by Sennacherib was three years after that time. When Sennacherib took "upon himself the government of the Babylonians, he appointed his son Asordanes their king" (64), whose reign we have already observed commenced B. C. 680; hence this year B. C. 680 was also the first of Sennacherib.

B. C. 625. According to Berosus, Nabopalassar "reigned 29 years. Polyhistor also says he reigned 29 years."—Appendix, p. 13.

B. C. 621. Says Ptolemy, "In the fifth year of Nabopalassar, which is the 127th year of Nabonassar, in the Egyptian Athyr 27th to the 28th, the 11th hour, near ending in Babylon, the moon began to be eclipsed; and it was eclipsed mostly on the south part of its diameter." According to my tables, there were three digits eclipsed at 15 minutes after 4 in the morning of April the 22nd, B. C. 621, which fixes that as the fifth year of his reign.

B. C. 596. The reigns of two kings are omitted in our copy of Ptolemy's Canon, as may be seen from the following table, which is extracted from Bosanquet's "Sacred and Profane Chronology."

B. C.	BABYLON. Canon of Ptolemy.		NINEVEH. Polyhistor.		Abydenus.
680	Asaradinus	[illegible]	Sennacherib	[illegible]	Sennacherib
667	Saosduchinus	[illegible]	His son [illegible]	[illegible]	[illegible]
647	Kiniladanus	[illegible]	[illegible]	[illegible]	[illegible]
625	Nabopolassar	[illegible]	[illegible]	[illegible]	[illegible]
604	Nebuchadnezzar	[illegible]	[illegible]	[illegible]	[illegible]

It will be seen that the two kings omitted are Saracus and Sardanapalus, or the second Nabopalassar. This omission accounts for the reign of Nebuchadnezzar being placed just 38 years too high in the Canon, or just 38 years higher than Demetrius and Clemens of Alexandria placed it (p. 27). Abydenus expressly declares that "Saracus reigned over the Assyrians"; and Polyhistor says that "Saracus was king of the Chaldæans" (p. 22). We are not informed how long this king reigned, but the interval gives him ten years.

B. C. 587. Says Bosanquet, "Polyhistor speaks of Nabuchodrossor, who reigned forty-three years as son of Sardanapalus. Now we know that Nebuchadnezzar, who reigned forty-three years, was son of Nabopalassar. Sardanapalus therefore was Nabopalassar"; and according to both Berosus and Polyhistor, he reigned 21 years. As both Berosus and Polyhistor in one place give Nabopalassar 29 years, and in another give him only 21, there must have either been two kings by that name, or, as Bosanquet seems to suppose, it was the same king on the throne once before, and then again after the reign of Saracus.

B. C. 565. Nebuchadnezzar reigned 43 years, as admitted by all.

B. C. 558. "In the eighth year of Nebuchadnezzar, "he carried away all Jerusalem." 2 Kings 24: 12, 14. And says Demetrius, "From the carrying away from Jerusalem," to the reign of the fourth Ptolemy," there were "338 years and 3 months" (p. 36). Take 338 years and 3 months from the tenth day of the fifth month, B. C. 558, and we have the tenth day of the eighth month, B. C. 220, which was the beginning of the reign of the fourth Ptolemy.

Thus it will be seen that the best authorities outside of the Bible confirm and establish that chronology which we had gathered from the Bible only. When I first wrote the work called "The Sealed Book of Daniel Opened," not knowing but that there might be some well established information on the subject of chronology, which I had not yet seen, I felt anxious to have the work closely criticised; and since it has now passed through the crucible of all kinds of criticism, it would appear to be established as about correct; for our chronology, which was at first established alone by the Bible, we have once proven to be correct by astronomy; second, by the Parian Chronicle; third, by the best authorities among ancient historians; and now again by the recent discoveries among the ruins of Nineveh. Therefore, after contemplating the matter coolly and deliberately, I must conclude that the chronology of our Bible is now established in a way too firm and fixed ever to be overthrown; and if no error can be discovered in it, I must believe that Christ will come in A. D. 1868.

FREE THOUGHT.

Though the world has had nearly six thousand years' experience; and notwithstanding the millions and tens of millions who have fallen sacrifices to the principles of Popery; does it not appear strange that even in the church of our Lord Jesus Christ there is yet remaining a delight to exercise the office of judge over other men's consciences in matters of religious faith? And yet these intolerant spirits should know that the surest proof of their own error, and the greatest obstacle to their success in the undertaking of convincing every body of their orthodoxy, consigning as they do all to the realm of perdition who cannot endorse their theories, is this very spirit with which they work. "Believe as I do, or be damned"; "Believe that error and be lost"; are expressions whose import should not be on the christian's pen, or spoken from a heart owning allegiance to the God of love and the Constitution of the U. S., however susceptible of proof his theory, or however warm his zeal in defending it.

THE INTERCESSOR.

"Father, I bring this worthless child to Thee,
To claim thy pardon—once, yet once again,
Receive him at my hands, for he is mine.
He is a worthless child: he owns his guilt:
Look not on him—he will not bear thy glance;
Look but on me—I will hide his filthy garments.
He pleads not for himself—he dares not plead;
His cause is mine—I am his intercessor.
By that unchanged, unchanging oath of mine,
By each pure drop of blood I lost for him,
By all the sorrows graven on my soul,
By every wound I bear, I claim it due!
Father divine! I would not have him lost!
He is a worthless child, but he is mine;
Sin hath destroyed him—sin hath died in me;
Satan hath bound him—Satan is my slave;
Death has desired him—I have conquered death.
My Father, hear him now—not him, but me;
I would not have him lost for all the worlds
Thou hast long since created for my glory,
Because he is a poor, a worthless child,
And all, his every hope, on me it lies.
I know my children, and I know him mine
By all the tears he has wept on my bosom,
By that full heart that beats against my breast,
That contrite anguish that my children know—
By all his sighs o'er outcast Israel;
By all the prayers he breathes for Judah's sons;
I know him by the sign my children bear,
That trusting love with which he clings to me.
I could not bear to see him cast away,
Vile as he is—the weakest of my flock,
The one that grieves me most, that loves me best;
Yea, tho' his sins should dim each spark of love—
I measure not my love by his returns;
And though the stripes I send to bring him home,
Should serve to drive him farther from my breast,
Still he is mine—I lured him from the world;
He has no right, no home, but in my love;
Though earth and hell combined against him rise,
I am bound to rescue him, for we are one."

O sinner, what an advocate hast thou!
Methinks I see him lead the culprit in,
Poor, sorrowful, ashamed, trembling with fear,
Shrinking behind his Lord, accused, condemned,
Well pleased to hide the form himself abhors
With that all-spotless garment of his friend—
And hear the Father's words. "For him, for thee,
My Son—his cause is thine, and thine is mine;
Take thy poor, worthless child—he is forgiven."

For the World's Crisis.

THE MILLENNIUM.

BY M. D. WELLCOME.

There is but one passage in the Scriptures that mentions the Millennium, or thousand years. Mille, a thousand, and annus, a year. Yet it is generally believed by the Christian world that there will be a Millennium after the termination of six thousand years from creation, and that it will be a period of great peace, prosperity, triumph and glory to the church of Christ.

But in respect to the character of the Millennium, i. e., whether it will be of a mixed character, good and evil existing, only the good predominating, or whether all will be righteous, there is a difference of opinion. Also, how the Millennium is to be introduced; whether by Christ's personal advent and reign, or by his spiritual presence and reign, and the revival of the martyr spirit in the church. Dr. Barnes stands forth as an expositor of the latter view, and as his "Notes" are extensively known, and much in use in Sabbath schools, we will refer to him particularly in our examination of this very important question. He adopts Prof. Stuart's language from his exposition of the 20th of Revelation upon this point.

"There is not a word of Christ's descent to the earth at the beginning of the Millennium. Nothing of the literal assembling of the Jews in Palestine; nothing of the Messiah's temporal reign on earth; nothing of the overflowing abundance of peace and plenty." Barnes then adds: "Indeed, in all this passage there is not the remotest hint of the grandeur and magnificence of the reign of Christ as a literal king upon the earth; nothing of his having a splendid capital at Jerusalem, or anywhere else; nothing of a new dispensation of a miraculous kind; nothing of the renovation of the earth to fix it for the abode of the risen saints. All this is the work of mere fancy, and no man can pretend that it is to be found in this passage."

Now we will give his views of "the state of things during that long period of a thousand years."

1. "There will be a great increase in the population of the globe. Let wars cease, and intemperance cease, and slavery cease, and the numberless passions that now shorten life be stayed, and it is easy to see that there must be a vast augmentation in the numbers of the human species."

In all this passage is there the remotest hint that wars will cease, and intemperance and slavery cease, the passions of men be stayed, and, as a result, there be a vast increase of the human species?

2. "There will be a general diffusion of intelligence on the earth. Every circumstance will be favorable to it, and the world will be in a condition to make rapid advances in knowledge."

Is there a remote hint in the passage before us that such will be the state of the Millennium? Dan. 12: 4 is cited in proof. Is the "time of the end" the millennial age?

3. "That period will be characterized by the universal diffusion of revealed truth." Is this stated in the chapter he is considering? He refers to Isa. 11: 9; 25: 7. Let us see what he finds there to prove that knowledge will be universally diffused during the Millennium. "They shall not hurt nor destroy in all my holy mountain, for the earth shall be full of the knowledge of the Lord, as the waters cover the sea." Well, this does truly look like a time when knowledge shall be universally diffused throughout the world, but how does he know that this will be in the Millennium? Not that we dispute the fact, but how does he know it to be so? "There is not the remotest hint of such a thing "in all this passage," "and no man can pretend that it is to be found in this passage." Notes on Rev. 20.

The promise quoted from Isa. 11 is given in connection with a description of a glorious time, when the beasts shall have become wholly changed in disposition, so that the once ravening wolf now dwells with the innocent lamb; the rapacious leopard lies down with the kid, and the calf feeds safely with the noble lion. All their ferocity is gone; their food is now that of the ox, and a little child can lead them. The poisonous asp and venomous adder are harmless now, and with them the tender babe can play without fear. When is this? In the sixty-fifth chapter we have a description of the same changed condition of the wild beasts, and we find this state to be located in the new creation. It is after a new heaven and a new earth are prepared for the habitation of the righteous. Peter says it shall be after the dissolving of the heavens by fire—the melting of the elements and the earth, and the burning up of its present works. Called by him "the day of judgment and perdition of ungodly men." In the new creation, righteousness alone will dwell. See 2 Pet. 3. John the Revelator has also given us a glimpse of its glories in the twenty-first chapter.

With Barnes we can therefore agree in believing that, during the Millennium, the earth will be as full of the knowledge of the Lord as the sea is of water, yet we apply it differently; for he locates it in the present world, unregenerated by the baptism of fire, and we place it in "the world to come" (Heb. 2: 5), in the regeneration" (Matt. 19: 28), after the "restitution of all things spoken of by all the prophets since the world began" (Act 3: 21), in the new earth, when all things are made new (Rev. 21: 1-5.)

Let us now examine Dr. Barnes' other proof text, Isa. 25: 7: "And he will destroy in this mountain the face of the covering cast over all people, and the veil that is spread over all nations." What is this covering, or veil, that is spread over all people, which will one day be removed? The next verse explains it: "He will swallow up death in victory, and the Lord God will wipe away tears from off all faces, and the rebuke of his people shall be take away from off all the earth: for the Lord God hath spoken it." When is death swallowed up in victory? Paul applies it to the resurrection. 1 Cor. 15: 54. When does the Lord wipe away all tears from the face of his people? In the "new earth."—Rev. 21: 4. Then there will be no more the voice of weeping, nor the voice of crying.—Isa. 65: 13. Dr. Barnes is therefore right in applying this text also to the Millennial age, even though there be not a hint of it in the 20th of Revelation.

4. "It will be marked by unlimited subjection to the sceptre of Christ." We will examine his proof texts on this point. Psa. 2: 7: "I will declare the decree: the Lord hath said unto me, 'Thou art my Son, this day have I begotten thee.'" This text is taken out from the midst of two others connected with it. "Yet have I set my King upon my holy hill of Zion." Zion was the site of David's throne. Christ is David's son. He is the promised heir to his throne. The angel told Mary that Jesus should "be called the Son of the Highest, and the Lord God shall give unto him the throne of his father David, and he shall reign over the house of Jacob forever; and of his kingdom there shall be no end."—Luke 1: 32, 33.

The verse which follows the one quoted, is, "Ask of me, and I will give thee the heathen for thine inheritance, and the uttermost part of the earth for thy possession. Thou shalt break them with a rod of iron, thou shalt dash them in pieces like a potter's vessel."—Those who overcome, and endure unto the end, have the promise of sharing in these conquests, "even," says Christ, "as I have received of my Father." Rev. 2: 26, 27. This will be when the stone smites the image on the feet, and the gold, silver, brass, iron and clay are broken to pieces together, and like the chaff of the threshing-floor are driven away. Then the kingdom of Christ will fill the whole earth. Yes, there will be indeed an unlimited subjection to Christ, for all who will not serve him shall perish. Isa. 65: 12.

Dr. Barnes next cites Zech. 9: 10, for what purpose we do not understand, as it was fulfilled at Christ's entry into Jerusalem. Psa. 22: 27, 28. When the kingdom is the Lord's, all kindred among the nations shall worship him. Dan. 7: 27. Isa. 2: 2, 3, is cited. Isa. 2: 2-4 is considered a strong proof of a temporal millennium. It has often been quoted to show that a time is coming when religion will have the supremacy, and war will cease. However, upon a careful analysis of this chapter, and its counterpart, Mic. 4, we find that "many people" are to predict these things in the "last days," and to invite others to go with them to the house of the Lord, because the law shall go forth from Zion, and the word of the Lord from Jerusalem. The house of Jacob are invited also to go with them.

But the prophet proceeds to utter denunciatory language against those whom he denominates "soothsayers like the Philistines." He says their land is full of silver and gold, and horses and chariots, and idols; they worship that which their own fingers have made, and the mean man and the great man alike bow down in idolatrous worship, "therefore forgive them not." Then the prophet describes the day of the Lord, which is to come in all its terror upon the worldly, proud, idolatrous people, and he will bring down their haughtiness and lofty looks to the ground, and he himself shall alone be exalted. Then will the idol worshipers cast their idols to the moles and the bats—not to embrace christianity, but to go into the caves and holes of the rocks, for fear of the Lord, when he ariseth to shake terribly the earth. We have not time to dwell particularly on the specific points of this chapter, but will notice another text quoted by Dr. Barnes. Zech. 14: 9:—"And the Lord shall be king over all the earth." To this we fully agree. And the fifth verse shows that he makes his second advent with all his saints, prior to his being king over all the earth.

Rev. 11: 15 is cited. "And the seventh angel sounded; and there were great voices in heaven saying, The kingdoms of this world are become the kingdoms of our Lord and of his Christ; and he shall reign forever and ever." Here the Dr. is right again in referring to this text as affording proof of the "unlimited subjection to the sceptre of Christ," which will mark the Millennial age. All kingdoms are inherited by Christ.

Now let us analyze this text, with its surroundings, and see what events are given in connection. Seven trumpets compose the series. The last three are woe trumpets. "Woe, woe, WOE to the inhabiters of the earth, by reason of the other voices of the trumpet of the three angels, which are yet to sound!" Rev. 8: 13. "The second woe is past; and behold the third woe cometh quickly." Then comes in the text referred to. Now if the seventh trump ushers in the Millennium as understood by this commentator, when all the world is be brought under the dominion of Christ, when peace is to be universal, slavery abolished, intemperance done away, the evil passions which now lead men into sin subjugated, and righteousness and knowledge fill the earth as the waters do the sea, in what sense can it be a woe trumpet to the inhabitants of earth? Would it not be more properly the trumpet of jubilee?

Viewing this subject in the light of Revelation, rather than by the darkness of this learned Dr.'s creed, we can clearly understand why it is woe to the dwellers of earth, though a blessing to the saints of God. Let us read the succeeding verses. The four and twenty elders give thanks to God because he has taken his great power to reign. "And the nations were angry, and thy wrath is come, and the time of the dead that they should be judged, and that thou shouldst give reward unto thy servants, the prophets, and to the saints, and to all that fear thy name, small and great, and shouldst destroy them that destroy or corrupt the earth." Such are the attendant events of the sounding of the seventh trumpet. Angry nations, and the wrath of God against those who corrupt the earth, but reward to all the servants of God, both small and great.

When does the wrath of God come?—When the heavens depart as a scroll, and mountains and islands are removed out of their places. When the great white throne appears in view, and the great men, and rich men, kings, captains, bondmen and freemen, cry to rocks and mountains to fall on them, and hide them from the face of him that sitteth on the throne, and from the wrath of the Lamb, crying out in their agony, "the great day of his wrath is come, and who shall be able to stand?" Woe, truly, to the inhabitants of earth!

When are the dead judged? "Who shall judge the quick and the dead, at his appearing and kingdom." 2 Tim. 4: 1. When is the reward given to the prophets and saints? "For the Son of Man shall come in the glory of his Father, with his angels, and then shall he reward every man according to his works." "Behold, I come quickly, and my reward is with me, to give every man according as his work shall be." These texts, then, establish the fact that it is when Jesus Christ comes in the glory of his Father, with his angels, that the reward is given.

Who can fail to see a harmony in the prophetic word touching this question? Paul, in his argument on the resurrection (1 Cor. 15), says, "We shall all be changed in a moment, in the twinkling of an eye, at the last trump (the seventh is the last); for the trumpet shall sound, and the dead shall be raised incorruptible, and we shall be changed."

We have now examined the various texts cited by Dr. Barnes in proof of his views, and we have shown from the context that they go to establish the fact of Christ's personal reign on earth, with the raised and translated saints. That the state of things during the Millennium is not mixed, but all are righteous; wicked nations are destroyed; the tares no longer grow with the wheat, but are rooted up, gathered out, and cast into the furnace of fire.

We will now notice some of the Dr.'s objections to the literal view. First, he says, "One strong presumptive evidence against this interpretation, that there will be a literal resurrection of the bodies of the saints at the beginning of that Millennial period 'to live and reign with Christ on earth,' is derived from the following circumstance:—It is admitted on all hands that this doctrine, if contained in the Scriptures at all, is found in this passage only. But it is strange, not to say improbable, that the doctrine of a literal resurrection of the righteous a thousand years before the wicked, should be announced in one passage only. It is strange that in respect to so important a doctrine as this, if it be true, there is not elsewhere a hint, an intimation, or allusion, that would lead us to suppose that the righteous are to be raised in this manner. If this be a true doctrine, it would be reasonable to expect that a clear and unambiguous statement of it would be made. Certainly, if there is but one statement on the subject, that might be expected to be a perfectly clear one." The objections brought by Dr. Barnes against the doctrine of a literal resurrection of the saints, in this passage, are equally weighty against the doctrine of a literal Millennium, for it is only taught in the passage under consideration, and that "in the book which of all the books in the Bible is most distinguished for figures and symbols." Blot out the 20th of Revelation, and where will we find the doctrine of a Millennium? Are not the orthodoxy greatly in the fault here? Basing their fondly cherished faith of a thousand years spiritual reign of Christ with his martyred saints, on one passage in a symbolic book? Ought not a doctrine so important as this to be taught in a perfectly clear, unambiguous manner, by Christ and his apostles? If the first resurrection is a symbol, why not the binding of Satan, the thousand years, and the second resurrection? It is very inconsistent to make the first resurrection a symbol, and then literalize the living again of the rest of the dead, understanding it to refer to the general resurrection. If symbolic in the first, it must be in the second; if literal in the first, it must be literal in the second.

"Elsewhere," says Barnes, "the account of the resurrection is given in the most general terms."

BOSANQUET'S CHRONOLOGY.

(Concluded.)

Having now gone through and revised Bosanquet's chronology, we will give a table to show that, thus revised, it is the same with mine; or that the recent discoveries among the ruins of Nineveh prove first the incorrectness of Usher's Chronology, or Ptolemy's Canon, and the strict correctness of my chronology.

A TABLE OF BOSANQUET'S CHRONOLOGY.

B. C.	Israel.	Judah.	Babylon.	Assyria.
722	9	48		1	Tiglath Pileser, king of Assyria, reigned 27 years.
721	10	49	1	2	Mardoc Empedus, king of Babylon, reigned 12 years.
710	9	8	12	13	End of Mardoc's reign according to Ptolemy's Canon.
698	20	4		25	Isaiah's prophecy of "the spoil of Samaria." Isa. 8. 4.
696	3	6		27	End of the reign of Tiglath Pileser, in the sixth year of Ahaz.
695	4	7		1	Shalmaneser, or Sargon, reigned 15 years, and in the end of his first year he carried off 27,280 families from Samaria, as foretold by Isaiah 8: 4.
694	5	8		2
692	7	10	1	4	Mesessi Merodach, or Marduk-Bal-adan, reigned 12 years, according to the inscription.
685	5	2	8	11	Sargon, according to the inscription, took Ashdod in his eleventh year. Isa. 20: 1.
684	6	3	9	12	In the 12th of Sargon, the war against Marduk-Baladan commenced.
683	7	4	10	13	The war against Samaria commenced in the fourth year of Hezekiah. 2 Kings 18: 9.
681	9	6	12	15	End of the kingdom of Israel, in the 6th year of Hezekiah.
680		7	1	1	Beginning of the reign of Sennacherib and his son Esarhaddon.
678		9	3	3	Sennacherib's expedition against the king of Sidon, according to the inscription.
676		11	5	5	The captivity under Sennacherib commenced on the 10th day of the 11th month.
673		14	8	8	Sennacherib slain in the 14th year of the reign of Hezekiah.
672		15	9	1	The brother of Sennacherib perhaps reigned about one year.
671		16	10	30 d.	Hagisa reigned over the Babylonians for the space of 30 days.
671		16	10	6 m	"Merodach-baladan, the son of Baladan, reigned 6 months." Isa. 39: 1.
670		17	11	1	Elibus reigned the second time over the Babylonians.
668		19	13		End of the reign of Esarhaddon, according to the Canon.
625		33	1		Nabopalassar, king of Babylon, reigned 29 years, according to Berosus.
621		37	5		An eclipse of the moon at Babylon in the 5th of Nabopalassar.
597		4	29		End of the reign of Nabopalassar, the first king by this name.
596		5	1		"Saracus king of the Chaldeans" reigned before Sardanapalus.
587		14	1		Sardanapalus or Nabopalassar reigned 21 years, says Berosus.
565		4	1		Nebuchadnezzar reigned 43 years, as admitted by all.
558		11	8		The carrying away from Jerusalem in the eighth of Nebuchadnezzar.

EXPLANATION OF THE TABLE.

B. C. 722 is the 9th year of Menahem 48th of Azariah, and the first of Tyglath Pileser, king of Assyria, who reigned 27 years. B. C. 721 is the first of Mardoc Empedus, king of Babylon. According to Ptolemy, there was a total eclipse of the moon in the first year of his reign; and according to my tables there was a total eclipse of the moon on the 19th of March, B. C. 721, fixing that as the first year of Mardoc. Ptolemy further mentions that two eclipses occurred in his second year, the first of which is supposed to have happened on the 8th of March, B. C. 720, and it is evident that Ptolemy was of the same opinion; but if he was not mistaken as to the quantity eclipsed in the one seen and "carefully observed" in A. D. 136, it is certain that there was no eclipse on the 8th of March, B. C. 720. According to my tables, the moon was eclipsed six digits at sunrise, in Babylon, September 12th, B. C. 721, which is about the quantity Ptolemy gives for the third eclipse; but for the second, he gives only three digits. The third is said to have occurred on the first of September, B. C. 720; and my tables eclipse 2½ digits at that time, which is near the quantity which Ptolemy gave for the second eclipse.

As the time these eclipses occurred is given by Ptolemy, not according to the Chaldean, but the Egyptian method of reckoning, it is evident that the dates are not of Chaldean, but Egyptian origin; therefore the mistake on the part of Ptolemy may easily be accounted for by supposing that the Chaldean record only gave the quantity eclipsed, and the year of Mardoc's reign in which they occurred. Thus, in his first year, one total; in his second year, one of six, and another of three digits.

This Mardoc Empadus is understood to be the Merodach-Baladan of Isaiah, by those who follow what is called Ptolemy's Canon, or Usher's chronology, which has been proved to be erroneous, by the late discoveries among the ruins of Nineveh; for Dr. Hincks says that "Marduk-Baladan," "of the inscriptions, is there described as the son of Yagin." Says Bosanquet, this is a "fatal blow . . . given to the received chronology, which assumes that Marduk-Baladan," "son of Yagin," "is the same as the Merodach-Baladan, son of Baladan of Scripture, which is impossible."—Sacred and Profane Chronology, pp. 60 and 66. Thus we find, when the truth is discovered, those eclipses, which appeared to be in the way of receiving the true Bible chronology, become an additional proof of its correctness.

B. C. 695. Bosanquet allows 16 years for the reign of Shalmanezer; but "the records of this king of Khorsabad extend [only] to his fifteenth year." (Appendix, p. 3.) "Colonel Rawlinson considers that Sargon and Shalmanezer are the same king." That he is correct in this may be proved thus:—Sargon, "in the inscriptions, is found to be the father of Sennacherib" (Sacred and Profane Chronology, p. 60); and in the Book of Tobit, Sennacherib is said to be the son of Enemessar, that is, Shalmanezer.

B. C. 694. Says Bosanquet, "The inscriptions relate that Shalmanezer, in his first year, . . . came against Samaria; and Isaiah, writing while Ahaz and Pekah were both reigning, . . . predicts that before his son shall be able to cry, 'My father and my mother,' . . . 'the spoil of Samaria shall be taken.'—Isaiah 8: 4. The predicted invasion is that recorded at Khorsabab, when 27,000 families and upwards were carried away."—(Appendix, p. 3.)

Says Demetrius,—"From the time when the ten tribes were made captive from Samaria (i. e., in the reign of Shalmanezer), to the reign of the fourth Ptolemy (Philopater), was 473 years and 9 months" (p. 36). The reign of the fourth Ptolemy commenced on the 10th day of the 8th month, B. C. 220, to which add 473 years and 9 months, and we have the 10th day of the 11th month, B. C. 694, for the time they were carried captive; that is, in the latter part of the first, or the beginning of the second year of the reign of Shalmanezer, at which time Tobit also was led captive.

B. C. 692. According to Ptolemy's Canon, the reign of Mesessi-Merodach commenced in B. C. 692. In the Canon he is allowed but 4 years, which is followed by an interregnum of 8 years. But, from the discoveries among the ruins of Nineveh, we learn that if he was the Marduk-Baladan of "the inscription," his reign continued through the twelve years. And whether he was the same king, or not, we know from those inscriptions (to which all other authority must yield), that the twelfth year of Marduk-Baladan did end with the beginning of the reign of Asaradin, or Esarhaddon of the Canon; for he was "subjugated by Sennacherib at the very commencement of his reign" (Appendix, p. 5); at which time he placed his son Esarhaddon on the throne of Babylon (page 64). According to the Canon, the reign of Esarhaddon commenced B. C. 680, to which add 12, and we have 692 for the beginning of the reign of Marduk-Baladan.

B. C. 685. Shalmanezer, or "Sargon, according to the inscription, took Ashdod in his eleventh year" (p. 62), which dates the contents of the 20th chapter of Isaiah in the year B. C. 685.

B. C. 684. According to "the inscriptions," a "war . . . commenced in the twelfth year of Sargon" against Marduk-Baladan; and when this Marduk-Baladan had reigned twelve years, he was "subjugated by Sennacherib at the very commencement of his reign."—Page 60, appendix, p. 5.

B. C. 681. Says Bosanquet, "Samaria was taken by Shalmanezer, . . . the second year, before Sennacherib came to the throne of Nineveh. Thus is Colonel Rawlinson's suggestion of a second invasion of Palestine, towards the end of the reign of Shalmanezer, confirmed."—(Appendix, p. 2.)

B. C. 680. "The inscription informs us the Babylonians under Morduk-Baladan, their king, were subjugated by Sennacherib at the very commencement of his reign." (Appendix, p. 5.) And Polyhistor informs us that when Sennacherib had "taken upon himself the government of the Babylonians, he appointed his son Asordanes their king, and he himself retired again into Assyria." Says Bosanquet, "This Asordanes . . . is the Asordan of the Septuagint, son of Sennacherib, who is the Esarhaddon of the Hebrew, and the Asaradinus of the Canon, as we have before shown." (Page 64.)

Now according to Ptolemy's Canon and the received chronology, this Asordanes came to the throne B. C. 680; and since he was placed on the throne by Sennacherib, when he took "upon him the government of the Babylonians," his also dates the beginning of the reign of Sennacherib; for those inscriptions, to which all other authorities must yield, give "the very commencement of his reign" for the time at which he thus "took upon himself the government of the Babylonians." Therefore, if Ptolemy's Canon may here be considered reliable, the recent discoveries among the ruins of Nineveh prove that the reign of Sennacherib commenced B. C. 680, which is a clear and positive proof of the incorrectness of the received, or Usher's chronology, which places the 14th year of Hezekiah in B. C. 713; that is, 33 years before Sennacherib came to the throne; for he was certainly on the throne in the 14th year of the reign of Hezekiah (2 Kings 19: 35). This removes a difficulty in which I had before been so much involved; which is this: we read in 2 Kings 17: 24, that "the king of Assyria brought men . . . and placed them in the city of Samaria"; and from Ezra 4: 2, we learn that the king who brought them was Esarhaddon; that, according to the received chronology, did not come to the throne until 41 years after. But now all comes natural and right. In the latter end of the year B. C. 681, Shalmanezer carried "away Israel unto Assyria" (2 Kings 18: 11); hence the earliest time at which Esarhaddon could have brought and placed those men in "the cities of Samaria," was B. C. 680; and according to the Canon, this is the very year in which he came to the throne. Thus difficulties vanish when we obtain the light of truth.

As an additional proof of the incorrectness of that chronology, which so much conflicts with the word of God, let the reader call to mind that "the king of Assyria brought men from Babylon" (2 Kings 17: 24), which could not have been done before the conquest of Babylon; and those inscriptions, found among the ruins of Nineveh, give us the beginning of the reign of Sennacherib as the date of its conquest. "The war is said to have commenced in the twelfth year of Sargon [or Shalmanezer], and "Marduk-Baladan, king of Chaldæa, was subdued after he had held Babylon for twelve years" (p. 60); and the king by whom he was subjugated was "Sennacherib [son of Sargon], at the very commencement of his reign."—(Page 5.)

B. C. 678. We have already mentioned that, according to the inscription, Sennacherib's expedition against the king of Sidon was in his third year, B. C. 678; and the inscription places his invasion of Judea after that.

B. C. 676. Says Demetrius. "The tribes of Benjamin and Levi were not carried into captivity by Senacherim, but that from this captivity to the last captivity from Jerusalem, by Nebuchadnezzar, was a period of 128 years and 6 months." The last captivity by Nebuchadnezzar occurred on the tenth day of the fifth month, B. C. 547; to which add 128 years and 6 months, and we have the tenth day of the eleventh month, B. C. 676. Thus we find an exact harmony existing between the Bible, Demetrius, and the recent discoveries among the ruins of Nineveh.

B. C. 673. We have observed that Sennacherib's first expedition against Hezekiah was B. C. 676. By comparing 2 Kings 19: 9, with Isaiah 20: 3, I believe it has become the universal opinion that there was an interval of three years between the two invasions of the land of Judea by Sennacherib. Three from 676 leaves B. C. 673 for the time of the second invasion, which was "in the 14th year of Hezekiah" (2 Kings 18: 13); and by comparing Isa. 37: 37, 38, with the first chapter of the book of Tobit, we learn that Sennacherib was slain in the 14th year of Hezekiah, which proves that his reign continued only eight years, though Dr. Hincks gives him nine. "Polyhistor gives eighteen years to Sennacherib" (appendix, p. 2); but I suppose this is only a mistake on the part of some transcriber; the original must have read eight instead of eighteen years; for Sennacherib had not ascended the throne as early as the sixth of Hezekiah; and since he was slain in the 14th of Hezekiah, his reign could not have continued over eight years.

B. C. 672. From Polyhistor, it would appear that after the death of Sennacherib, his brother reigned about one year.

B. C. 671. Says Polyhistor, "After the reign of the brother of Sennacherib, Hagisa reigned over the Babylonians; and when he had governed for the space of thirty days, he was slain by Merodach-Baladan, who held the empire by force during six months."—(P. 64.) This is the Merodach-Baladan mentioned by Isaiah 39: 1. Isaiah says he was "the son of Baladan"; and we have observed that Baladan his father was slain by Sennacherib.

B. C. 670. According to Polyhistor, Merodach-Baladan "was slain and succeeded by a person named Elibus."—P. 64. This is the second time this Elibus was on the throne; for says Polyhistor, "In the third year of his reign, Sennacherib, king of the Assyrians, levied an army against the Babylonians, and in a battle in which they were engaged routed and took him prisoner with his adherents" (p. 64), which could not have been the third year after Elibus slew Merodach-Baladan, for that would have been about five years after the death of Sennacherib, who is here said to have taken Elibus prisoner; and we know from those inscriptions, to which all other authorities must yield, that the time Sennacherib subjugated the Babylonians was "at the very commencement of his reign." (Appendix, p. 5.) I suppose the truth of the matter is about this: when Sargon, the father of Sennacherib, in the twelfth year of his reign commenced the war against Marduk-Baladan, he associated this Elibus with him on the throne; for the time he was taken prisoner by Sennacherib was three years after that time. When Sennacherib took "upon himself the government of the Babylonians, he appointed his son Asordanes their king" (64), whose reign we have already observed commenced B. C. 680; hence this year B. C. 680 was also the first of Sennacherib.

B. C. 625. According to Berosus, Nabopalassar "reigned 29 years. Polyhistor also says he reigned 29 years."—Appendix, p. 13.

B. C. 621. Says Ptolemy, "In the fifth year of Nabopalassar, which is the 127th year of Nabonassar, in the Egyptian Athyr 27th to the 28th, the 11th hour, near ending in Babylon, the moon began to be eclipsed; and it was eclipsed mostly on the south one fourth of its diameter." According to my tables, there were three digits eclipsed at 15 minutes after 4 in the morning of April the 22nd, B. C. 621, which fixes that as the fifth year of his reign.

B. C. 596. The reigns of two kings are omitted in our copy of Ptolemy's Canon, as may be seen from the following table, which is extracted from Bosanquet's "Sacred and Profane Chronology."

It will be seen that the two kings omitted are Saracus and Sardanapalus, or the second Nabopalassar. This omission accounts for the reign of Nebuchadnezzar being placed just 38 years too high in the Canon, or just 38 years higher than Demetrius and Clemens of Alexandria placed it (p. 27). Abydenus expressly declares that "Saracus reigned over the Assyrians"; and Polyhistor says that "Saracus was king of the Chaldæans" (p. 22). We are not informed how long this king reigned, but the interval gives him ten years.

B. C. 587. Says Bosanquet, "Polyhistor speaks of Nabuchodrossor, who reigned forty-three years as son of Sardanapalus. Now we know that Nebuchadnezzar, who reigned forty-three years, was son of Nabopalassar. Sardanapalus therefore was Nabopalassar"; and according to both Berosus and Polyhistor, he reigned 21 years. As both Berosus and Polyhistor in one place give Nabopalassar 29 years, and in another give him only 21, there must have either been two kings by that name, or, as Bosanquet seems to suppose, it was the same king on the throne once before, and then again after the reign of Saracus.

B. C. 565. Nebuchadnezzar reigned 43 years, as admitted by all.

B. C. 558. "In the eighth year of Nebuchadnezzar, "he carried away all Jerusalem." 2 Kings 24: 12, 14. And says Demetrius, "From the carrying away from Jerusalem," to the reign of the fourth Ptolemy," there were "338 years and 3 months" (p. 36). Take 338 years and 3 months from the tenth day of the fifth month, B. C. 558, and we have the tenth day of the eighth month, B. C. 220, which was the beginning of the reign of the fourth Ptolemy.

Thus it will be seen that the best authorities outside of the Bible confirm and establish that chronology which we had gathered from the Bible only. When I first wrote the work called "The Sealed Book of Daniel Opened," not knowing but that there might be some well established information on the subject of chronology, which I had not yet seen, I felt anxious to have the work closely criticised; and since it has now passed through the crucible of all kinds of criticism, it would appear to be established as about correct; for our chronology, which was at first established alone by the Bible, we have once proven to be correct by astronomy; second, by the Parian Chronicle; third, by the best authorities among ancient historians; and now again by the recent discoveries among the ruins of Nineveh. Therefore, after contemplating the matter coolly and deliberately, I must conclude that the chronology of our Bible is now established in a way too firm and fixed ever to be overthrown; and if no error can be discovered in it, I must believe that Christ will come in A. D. 1868.

FREE THOUGHT.

Though the world has had nearly six thousand years' experience; and notwithstanding the millions and tens of millions who have fallen sacrifices to the principles of Popery; does it not appear strange that even in the church of our Lord Jesus Christ there is yet remaining a delight to exercise the office of judge over other men's consciences in matters of religious faith? And yet these intolerant spirits should know that the surest proof of their own error, and the greatest obstacle to their success in the undertaking of convincing every body of their orthodoxy, consigning as they do all to the realm of perdition who cannot endorse their theories, is this very spirit with which they work. "Believe as I do, or be damned"; "Believe that error and be lost"; are expressions whose import should not be on the christian's pen, or spoken from a heart owning allegiance to the God of love and the Constitution of the U. S., however susceptible of proof his theory, or however warm his zeal in defending it. A. L. FORRESTER.

LIFE WITHOUT TRIALS.—Without trials you cannot guess at your own strength. Men do not learn to swim on a table; they must go into deep water and buffet the surges. If you wish to understand their true character—if you would know their strength—what they are capable of—throw them over. Over with them, and if they are worth saving, they will swim ashore themselves.

THE INTERCESSOR.

"Father, I bring this worthless child to Thee,
To claim thy pardon—once, yet once again.
Receive him at my hands, for he is mine.
He is a worthless child; he owns his guilt.
Look not on him—he will not bear thy glance;
Look but on me—I will hide his filthy garments.
He pleads not for himself—he dares not plead;
His cause is mine—I am his intercessor.
By that unchanged, unchanging oath of mine,
By each pure drop of blood I lost for him,
By all the sorrows graven on my soul,
By every wound I bear, I claim it due!
Father divine! I would not have him lost!
He is a worthless child, but he is mine;
Sin hath destroyed him—sin hath died in me;
Satan hath bound him—Satan is my slave;
Death has desired him—I have conquered death.
My Father, hear him now—not him, but me.
I would not have him lost for all the worlds
Thou hast long since created for my glory,
Because he is a poor, a worthless child,
And all, his every hope, on me it lies.
I know my children, and I know him mine
By all the tears he has wept on my bosom,
By that full heart that beats against my breast,
That contrite anguish that my children know—
By all his sighs o'er outcast Israel,
By all the prayers he breathes for Judah's sons,
I know him by the sign my children bear,
That trusting love with which he clings to me.
I could not bear to see him cast away,
Vile as he is—the weakest of my flock,
The one that grieves me most, that loves me best,
Yes, tho' his sins should dim each spark of love—
I measure not my love by his returns;
And though the stripes I send to bring him home,
Should serve to drive him farther from my breast,
Still he is mine—I lured him from the world;
He has no right, no home, but in my love;
Though earth and hell combined against him rise,
I am bound to rescue him, for we are one."

O sinner, what an advocate hast thou!
Methinks I see him lead the culprit in,
Poor, sorrowful, ashamed, trembling with fear,
Shrinking behind his Lord, accused, condemned,
Well pleased to hide the form himself abhors
With that all-spotless garment of his friend—
And hear the Father's words "For him, for thee,
My Son—his cause is thine, and thine is mine.
Take thy poor, worthless child—he is forgiven."

THE MILLENNIUM.

BY M. D. WELLCOME.

There is but one passage in the Scriptures that mentions the Millennium, or thousand years. Mille, a thousand, and annus, a year. Yet it is generally believed by the Christian world that there will be a Millennium after the termination of six thousand years from creation, and that it will be a period of great peace, prosperity, triumph and glory to the church of Christ.

But in respect to the character of the Millennium, i. e., whether it will be of a mixed character, good and evil existing, only the good predominating, or whether all will be righteous, there is a difference of opinion. Also, how the Millennium is to be introduced; whether by Christ's personal advent and reign, or by his spiritual presence and reign, and the revival of the martyr spirit in the church. Dr. Barnes stands forth as an expositor of the latter view, and as his "Notes" are extensively known, and much in use in Sabbath schools, we will refer to him particularly in our examination of this very important question. He adopts Prof. Stuart's language from his exposition of the 20th of Revelation upon this point.

"There is not a word of Christ's descent to the earth at the beginning of the Millennium. Nothing of the literal assembling of the Jews in Palestine; nothing of the Messiah's temporal reign on earth; nothing of the overflowing abundance of peace and plenty." Barnes then adds: "Indeed, in all this passage there is not the remotest hint of the grandeur and magnificence of the reign of Christ as a literal king upon the earth; nothing of his having a splendid capital at Jerusalem, or anywhere else; nothing of a new dispensation of a miraculous kind; nothing of the renovation of the earth to fix it for the abode of the risen saints. All this is the work of mere fancy, and no man can pretend that it is to be found in this passage."

Now we will give his views of "the state of things during that long period of a thousand years."

1. "There will be a great increase in the population of the globe. Let wars cease, and intemperance cease, and slavery cease, and the numberless passions that now shorten life be stayed, and it is easy to see that there must be a vast augmentation in the numbers of the human species."

In all this passage is there the remotest hint that wars will cease, and intemperance and slavery cease, the passions of men be stayed, and, as a result, there be a vast increase of the human species?

2. "There will be a general diffusion of intelligence on the earth. Every circumstance will be favorable to it, and the world will be in a condition to make rapid advances in knowledge."

Is there a remote hint in the passage before us that such will be the state of the Millennium? Dan. 12: 4 is cited in proof. Is the "time of the end" the millennial age?

3. "That period will be characterized by the universal diffusion of revealed truth." Is this stated in the chapter he is considering? He refers us Isa. 11: 9; Isa. ... Let us see what he finds there to prove that knowledge will be universally diffused during the Millennium. "They shall not hurt nor destroy in all my holy mountain, for the earth shall be full of the knowledge of the Lord, as the waters cover the sea." Well, this does truly look like a time when knowledge shall be universally diffused throughout the world, but how does he know that this will be in the Millennium? Not that we dispute the fact, but how does he know it to be so? "There is not the remotest hint" of such a thing "in all this passage," "and no man can pretend that it is to be found in this passage." Notes on Rev. 20.

The promise quoted from Isa. 11 is given in connection with a description of a glorious time, when the beasts shall have become wholly changed in disposition, so that the once ravening wolf now dwells with the innocent lamb; the rapacious leopard lies down with the kid, and the calf feeds safely with the noble lion. All their ferocity is gone; their food is now that of the ox, and a little child can lead them. The poisonous asp and venomous adder are harmless now, and with them the tender babe can play without fear. When is this? In the sixty-fifth chapter we have a description of the same changed condition of the wild beasts, and we find this state to be located in the new creation. It is after a new heaven and a new earth are prepared for the habitation of the righteous. Peter says it shall be after the dissolving of the heavens by fire—the melting of the elements and the earth, and the burning up of its present works. Called by him "the day of judgment and perdition of ungodly men." In the new creation, righteousness alone will dwell. See 2 Pet. 3. John the Revelator has also given us a glimpse of its glories in the twenty-first chapter.

With Barnes we can therefore agree in believing that, during the Millennium, the earth will be as full of the knowledge of the Lord as the sea is of water, yet we apply it differently; for he locates it in the present world, unregenerated by the baptism of fire, and we place it in "the world to come" (Heb. 2: 5), in the regeneration" (Matt. 19: 28), after the "restitution of all things spoken of by all the prophets since the world began" (Act 3: 21), in the new earth, when all things are made new (Rev. 21: 1–5.)

Let us now examine Dr. Barnes' other proof text, Isa. 25: 7: "And he will destroy in this mountain the face of the covering cast over all people, and the veil that is spread over all nations." What is this covering, or veil, that is spread over all people, which will one day be removed? The next verse explains it: "He will swallow up death in victory, and the Lord God will wipe away tears from off all faces, and the rebuke of his people shall he take away from off all the earth; for the Lord God hath spoken it." When is death swallowed up in victory? Paul applies it to the resurrection. 1 Cor. 15: 54. When does the Lord wipe away all tears from the face of his people? In the "new earth."—Rev. 21: 4. Then there will be no more the voice of weeping, nor the voice of crying.—Isa. 65: 13. Dr. Barnes is therefore right in applying this text also to the Millennial age, even though there be not a hint of it in the 20th of Revelation.

4. "It will be marked by unlimited subjection to the sceptre of Christ." We will examine his proof texts on this point. Psa. 2. 7: "I will declare the decree: the Lord hath said unto me, 'Thou art my Son, this day have I begotten thee.'" This text is taken out from the midst of two others connected with it. "Yet have I set my King upon my holy hill of Zion." Zion was the site of David's throne. Christ is David's son. He is the promised heir to his throne. The angel told Mary that Jesus should "be called the Son of the Highest, and the Lord God shall give unto him the throne of his father David, and he shall reign over the house of Jacob forever; and of his kingdom there shall be no end."—Luke 1: 32, 33.

The verse which follows the one quoted, is, "Ask of me, and I will give thee the heathen for thine inheritance, and the uttermost part of the earth for thy possession. Thou shalt break them with a rod of iron, thou shalt dash them in pieces like a potter's vessel."—Those who overcome, and endure unto the end, have the promise of sharing in these conquests, "even," says Christ, "as I have received of my Father." Rev. 2: 26, 27. This will be when the stone smites the image on the feet, and the gold, silver, brass, iron and clay are broken to pieces together, and like the chaff of the threshing-floor are driven away. Then the kingdom of Christ will fill the whole earth. Yes, there will be indeed an unlimited subjection to Christ, for all who will not serve him shall perish. Isa. 65: 12.

Dr. Barnes next cites Zech. 9: 10, for what purpose we do not understand, as it was fulfilled at Christ's entry into Jerusalem. Psa. 22: 27, 28. When the kingdom is the Lord's, all kindred among the nations shall worship him. Dan. 7: 27. Isa. 2: 2, 3, is cited. Isa. 2: 2–4 is considered a strong proof of a temporal millennium. It has often been quoted to show that a time is coming when religion will have the supremacy, and war will cease. However, upon a careful analysis of this chapter, and its counterpart, Mic. 4, we find that "many people" are to predict these things in the "last days," and to invite others to go with them to the house of the Lord, because the law shall go forth from Zion, and the word of the Lord from Jerusalem. The house of Jacob are invited also to go with them.

But the prophet proceeds to utter denunciatory language against those whom he denominates "soothsayers like the Philistines." He says their land is full of silver and gold, and horses and chariots, and idols; they worship that which their own fingers have made, and the mean man and the great man alike bow down in idolatrous worship, "therefore forgive them not." Then the prophet describes the day of the Lord, which is to come in all its terror upon the worldly, proud, idolatrous people, and he will bring down their haughtiness and lofty looks to the ground, and he himself shall alone be exalted. Then will the idol worshipers cast their idols to the moles and the bats—not to embrace christianity, but to go into the caves and holes of the rocks, for fear of the Lord, when he ariseth to shake terribly the earth. We have not time to dwell particularly on the specific points of this chapter, but will notice another text quoted by Dr. Barnes. Zech. 14: 9:—"And the Lord shall be king over all the earth." To this we fully agree. And the fifth verse shows that he makes his second advent with all his saints, prior to his being king over all the earth.

Rev. 11: 15 is cited. "And the seventh angel sounded; and there were great voices in heaven saying, The kingdoms of this world are become the kingdoms of our Lord and of his Christ; and he shall reign forever and ever." Here the Dr. is right again in referring to this text as affording proof of the "unlimited subjection to the sceptre of Christ," which will mark the Millennial age. All kingdoms are inherited by Christ.

Now let us analyze this text, with its surroundings, and see what events are given in connection. Seven trumpets compose the series. The last three are woe trumpets. "Woe, WOE, WOE to the inhabiters of the earth, by reason of the other voices of the trumpet of the three angels, which are yet to sound!" Rev. 8: 13. "The second woe is past; and behold the third woe cometh quickly." Then comes in the text referred to. Now if the seventh trump ushers in the Millennium as understood by this commentator, when all the world is be brought under the dominion of Christ, when peace is to be universal, slavery abolished, intemperance done away, the evil passions which now lead men into sin subjugated, and righteousness and knowledge fill the earth as the waters do the sea, in what sense can it be a woe trumpet to the inhabitants of earth? Would it not be more properly the trumpet of jubilee?

Viewing this subject in the light of Revelation, rather than by the darkness of this learned Dr.'s creed, we can clearly understand why it is WOE to the dwellers of earth, though a blessing to the saints of God. Let us read the succeeding verses. The four and twenty elders give thanks to God because he has taken his great power to reign. "And the nations were angry, and thy wrath is come, and the time of the dead that they should be judged, and that thou shouldst give reward unto thy servants, the prophets, and to the saints, and to all that fear thy name, small and great, and shouldst destroy them that destroy or corrupt the earth." Such are the attendant events of the sounding of the seventh trumpet. Angry nations, and the wrath of God against those who corrupt the earth, but reward to all the servants of God, both small and great.

When does the wrath of God come?—When the heavens depart as a scroll, and mountains and islands are removed out of their places. When the great white throne appears in view, and the great men, and rich men, kings, captains, bondmen and freemen, cry to rocks and mountains to fall on them, and hide them from the face of him that sitteth on the throne, and from the wrath of the Lamb, crying out in their agony, "the great day of his wrath is come, and who shall be able to stand?" WOE, truly, to the inhabitants of earth!

When are the dead judged? "Who shall judge the quick and the dead, at his appearing and kingdom." 2 Tim. 4: 1. When is the reward given to the prophets and saints? "For the Son of Man shall come in the glory of his Father, with his angels, and then shall he reward every man according to his works." "Behold, I come quickly, and my reward is with me, to give every man according as his work shall be." These texts, then, establish the fact that it is when Jesus Christ comes in the glory of his Father, with his angels, that the reward is given.

Who can fail to see a harmony in the prophetic word touching this question? Paul, in his argument on the resurrection (1 Cor. 15), says, "We shall all be changed in a moment, in the twinkling of an eye, at the last trump (the seventh is the last); for the trumpet shall sound, and the dead shall be raised incorruptible, and we shall be changed."

We have now examined the various texts cited by Dr. Barnes in proof of his views, and we have shown from the context that they go to establish the fact of Christ's personal reign on earth, with the raised and translated saints. That the state of things during the Millennium is not mixed, but all are righteous; wicked nations are destroyed; the tares no longer grow with the wheat, but are rooted up, gathered out, and cast into the furnace of fire.

We will now notice some of the Dr.'s objections to the literal view. First, he says, "One strong presumptive evidence against this interpretation, that there will be a literal resurrection of the bodies of the saints at the beginning of that Millennial period 'to live and reign with Christ on earth,' is derived from the following circumstance:—It is admitted on all hands that this doctrine, if contained in the Scriptures at all, is found in this passage only. But it is strange, not to say improbable, that the doctrine of a literal resurrection of the righteous a thousand years before the wicked, should be announced in one passage only. It is strange that in respect to so important a doctrine as this, if it be true, there is not elsewhere a hint, an intimation, or allusion, that would lead us to suppose that the righteous are to be raised in this manner. If this be a true doctrine, it would be reasonable to expect that a clear and unambiguous statement of it would be made. Certainly, if there is but one statement on the subject, that might be expected to be a perfectly clear one." The objections brought by Dr. Barnes against the doctrine of a literal resurrection of the saints, in this passage, are equally weighty against the doctrine of a literal Millennium, for it is only taught in the passage under consideration, and that "in the book which of all the books in the Bible is most distinguished for figures and symbols." Blot out the 20th of Revelation, and where will we find the doctrine of a Millennium? Are not the orthodoxy greatly in the fault here? Basing their fondly cherished faith of a thousand years spiritual reign of Christ with his martyred saints, on one passage in a symbolic book? Ought not a doctrine so important as this to be taught in a perfectly clear, unambiguous manner, by Christ and his apostles? If the first resurrection is a symbol, why not the binding of Satan, the thousand years, and the second resurrection? It is very inconsistent to make the first resurrection a symbol, and then literalize the living again of the rest of the dead, understanding it to refer to the general resurrection. If symbolic in the first, it must be in the second; if literal in the first, it must be literal in the second.

"Elsewhere," says Barnes, "the account of the resurrection is given in the most general terms."

BOSANQUET'S CHRONOLOGY.

(Concluded.)

Having now gone through and revised Bosanquet's chronology, we will give a table to show that, thus revised, it is the same with mine; or that the recent discoveries among the ruins of Nineveh prove first the incorrectness of Usher's Chronology, or Ptolemy's Canon, and the strict correctness of my chronology.

A TABLE OF BOSANQUET'S CHRONOLOGY.

B. C.	Israel.	Judah.	Babylon.	Assyria.
722	9	48		1	Tiglath Pileser, king of Assyria, reigned 27 years.
721	10	49	1	2	Mardoc Empedus, king of Babylon, reigned 12 years.
710	9	8	12	13	End of Mardoc's reign according to Ptolemy's Canon.
698	20	4		25	Isaiah's prophecy of "the spoil of Samaria." Isa. 8: 4.
696	3	6		27	End of the reign of Tiglath Pileser, in the sixth year of Ahaz.
695	4	7		1	Shalmaneser, or Sargon, reigned 15 years, and in the end
694	5	8		2	of his first year he carried off 27,280 families from Samaria, as foretold by Isaiah 8: 4.
692	7	10	1	4	Mesessi Merodach, or Marduk-Bal-adan, reigned 12 years, according to the inscription.
685	5	2	8	11	Sargon, according to the inscription, took Ashdod in his eleventh year. Isa. 20: 1.
684	6	3	9	12	In the 12th of Sargon, the war against Marduk-Baladan commenced.
683	7	4	10	13	The war against Samaria commenced in the fourth year of Hezekiah. 2 Kings 18: 9.
681	9	6	12	15	End of the kingdom of Israel, in the 6th year of Hezekiah.
680		7	1	1	Beginning of the reign of Sennacherib and his son Esarhaddon.
678		9	3	3	Sennacherib's expedition against the king of Sidon, according to the inscription.
676		11	5	5	The captivity under Sennacherib commenced on the 10th day of the 11th month.
673		14	8	8	Sennacherib slain in the 14th year of the reign of Hezekiah.
672		15	9	1	The brother of Sennacherib perhaps reigned about one year.
671		16	10	30 d.	Hagisa reigned over the Babylonians for the space of 30 days.
671		16	10	6 m	"Merodach-baladan, the son of Baladan, reigned 6 months." Isa. 39: 1.
670		17	11	1	Elibus reigned the second time over the Babylonians.
668		19	13		End of the reign of Esarhaddon, according to the Canon.
625		33	1		Nabopalassar, king of Babylon, reigned 29 years, according to Berosus.
621		37	5		An eclipse of the moon at Babylon in the 5th of Nabopalassar.
597		4	29		End of the reign of Nabopalassar, the first king by this name.
596		5	1		"Saracus king of the Chaldeans" reigned before Sardanapalus.
587		14	1		Sardanapalus or Nabopalassar reigned 21 years, says Berosus.
565		4	1		Nebuchadnezzar reigned 43 years, as admitted by all.
558		11	8		The carrying away from Jerusalem in the eighth of Nebuchadnezzar.

EXPLANATION OF THE TABLE.

B. C. 722 is the 9th year of Menahem 48th of Azariah, and the first of Tyglath Pileser, king of Assyria, who reigned 27 years. B. C. 721 is the first of Mardoc Empadus, king of Babylon. According to Ptolemy, there was a total eclipse of the moon in the first year of his reign; and according to my tables there was a total eclipse of the moon on the 19th of March, B. C. 721, fixing that as the first year of Mardoc. Ptolemy farther mentions that two eclipses occurred in his second year, the first of which is supposed to have happened on the 8th of March, B. C. 720, and it is evident that Ptolemy was of the same opinion; but if he was not mistaken as to the quantity eclipsed in the one seen and "carefully observed" in A. D. 136, it is certain that there was no eclipse on the 8th of March, B. C. 720. According to my tables, the moon was eclipsed six digits at sunrise, in Babylon, September 12th, B. C. 721, which is about the quantity Ptolemy gives for the third eclipse; but for the second, he gives only three digits. The third is said to have occurred on the first of September, B. C. 720; and my tables eclipse 2½ digits at that time, which is near the quantity which Ptolemy gave for the second eclipse.

As the time these eclipses occurred is given by Ptolemy, not according to the Chaldean, but the Egyptian method of reckoning, it is evident that the dates are not of Chaldean, but Egyptian origin; therefore the mistake on the part of Ptolemy may easily be accounted for by supposing that the Chaldean record only gave the quantity eclipsed, and the year of Mardoc's reign in which they occurred. Thus, in his first year, one total; in his second year, one of six, and another of three digits.

This Mardoc Empadus is understood to be the Merodach-Baladan of Isaiah, by those who follow what is called Ptolemy's Canon, or Usher's chronology, which has been proved to be erroneous, by the late discoveries among the ruins of Nineveh; for Dr. Hincks says that "Marduk-Baladan," "of the inscriptions, is there described as the son of Yagin." Says Bosanquet, this is a "fatal blow . . . given to the received chronology, which assumes that Marduk-Baladan," "son, of Yagin," "is the same as the Merodach-Baladan, son of Baladan of Scripture, which is impossible."—Sacred and Profane Chronology, pp. 60 and 66. Thus we find, when the truth is discovered, those eclipses, which appeared to be in the way of receiving the true Bible chronology, become an additional proof of its correctness.

B. C. 695. Bosanquet allows 16 years for the reign of Shalmaneser; but "the records of this king of Khorsabad extend [only] to his fifteenth year." (Appendix, p. 3.) "Colonel Rawlinson considers that Sargon and Shalmaneser are the same king." That he is correct in this may be proved thus:—Sargon, "in the inscriptions, is found to be the father of Sennacherib" (Sacred and Profane Chronology, p. 60); and in the Book of Tobit, Sennacherib is said to be the son of Enemessar, that is, Shalmaneser.

B. C 694. Says Bosanquet, "The inscriptions relate that Shalmaneser, in his first year, . . . came against Samaria; and Isaiah, writing while Ahaz and Pekah were both reigning, . . . predicts that before his son shall be able to cry, 'My father and my mother,' . . . 'the spoil of Samaria shall be taken.'—Isaiah 8: 4. The predicted invasion is that recorded at Khorsabab, when 27,000 families and upwards were carried away."—(Appendix, p. 3.)

Says Demetrius,—"From the time when the ten tribes were made captive from Samaria (i. e., in the reign of Shalmaneser), to the reign of the fourth Ptolemy (Philopater), was 473 years and 9 months" (p. 36). The reign of the fourth Ptolemy commenced on the 10th day of the 8th month, B. C. 220, to which add 473 years and 9 months, and we have the 10th day of the 11th month, B. C. 694, for the time they were carried captive; that is, in the latter part of the first, or the beginning of the second year of the reign of Shalmaneser, at which time Tobit also was led captive.

B. C. 692. According to Ptolemy's Canon, the reign of Mesessi-Merodach commenced in B. C. 692. In the Canon he is allowed but 4 years, which is followed by an interregnum of 8 years. But, from the discoveries among the ruins of Nineveh, we learn that if he was the Marduk-Baladan of "the inscription," his reign continued through the twelve years. And whether he was the same king, or not, we know from those inscriptions (to which all other authority must yield), that the twelfth year of Marduk-Baladan did end with the beginning of the reign of Asaradin, or Esarhaddon of the Canon; for he was "subjugated by Sennacherib at the very commencement of his reign" (Appendix, p. 5); at which time he placed his son Esarhaddon on the throne of Babylon (page 64). According to the Canon, the reign of Esarhaddon commenced B. C. 680, to which add 12, and we have 692 for the beginning of the reign of Marduk-Baladan.

B. C. 685. Shalmaneser, or "Sargon, according to the inscription, took Ashdod in his eleventh year" (p. 62), which dates the contents of the 20th chapter of Isaiah in the year B. C. 685.

B. C. 684. According to "the inscriptions," a "war . . . commenced in the twelfth year of Sargon" against Marduk-Baladan; and when this Marduk-Baladan had reigned twelve years, he was "subjugated by Sennacherib at the very commencement of his reign."—Page 60, appendix, p. 5.

B. C. 681. Says Bosanquet, "Samaria was taken by Shalmaneser, . . . the second year, before Sennacherib came to the throne of Nineveh. Thus is Colonel Rawlinson's suggestion of a second invasion of Palestine, towards the end of the reign of Shalmaneser, confirmed."—(Appendix, p. 2.)

B. C. 680. "The inscription informs us the Babylonians under Morduk-Baladan, their king, were subjugated by Sennacherib at the very commencement of his reign." (Appendix, p. 5.) And Polyhistor informs us that when Sennacherib had "taken upon himself the government of the Babylonians, he appointed his son Asorlanes their king, and he himself retired again into Assyria." Says Bosanquet, "This Asordanes . . . is the Asordan of the Septuagint, son of Sennacherib, who is the Esarhaddon of the Hebrew, and the Asaradinus of the Canon, as we have before shown." (Page 64.)

Now according to Ptolemy's Canon and the received chronology, this Asordanes came to the throne B. C. 680; and since he was placed on the throne by Sennacherib, when he took "upon him the government of the Babylonians," this also dates the beginning of the reign of Sennacherib; for those inscriptions, to which all other authorities must yield, give "the very commencement of his reign" for the time at which he thus "took upon himself the government of the Babylonians." Therefore, if Ptolemy's Canon may here be considered reliable, the recent discoveries among the ruins of Nineveh prove that the reign of Sennacherib commenced B. C. 680, which is a clear and positive proof of the incorrectness of the received, or Usher's chronology, which places the 14th year of Hezekiah in B. C. 713; that is, 33 years before Sennacherib came to the throne; for he was certainly on the throne in the 14th year of the reign of Hezekiah (2 Kings 18: 13). This removes a difficulty in which I had before been so much involved; which is this: we read in 2 Kings 17: 24, that "the king of Assyria brought men . . . and placed them in the city of Samaria"; and from Ezra 4: 2, we learn that the king who brought them was Esarhaddon, who, according to the received chronology, did not come to the throne until 41 years after. But now all comes natural and right. In the latter end of the year B. C. 681, Shalmaneser carried "away Israel unto Assyria" (2 Kings 18: 11); hence the earliest time at which Esarhaddon could have brought and placed those men in "the cities of Samaria," was B. C. 680; and according to the Canon, this is the very year in which he came to the throne. Thus difficulties vanish when we obtain the light of truth.

As an additional proof of the incorrectness of that chronology, which so much conflicts with the word of God, let the reader call to mind that "the king of Assyria brought men from Babylon" (2 Kings 17: 24), which could not have been done before the conquest of Babylon; and those inscriptions, found among the ruins of Nineveh, give us the beginning of the reign of Sennacherib as the date of its conquest. "The war is said to have commenced in the twelfth year of Sargon [or Shalmaneser], and "Marduk-Baladan, king of Chaldæa, was subdued after he had held Babylon for twelve years" (p. 60); and the king by whom he was subjugated was "Sennacherib [son of Sargon], at the very commencement of his reign."—(Page 5.)

B. C. 678. We have already mentioned that, according to the inscription, Sennacherib's expedition against the king of Sidon was in his third year, B. C. 678; and the inscription places his invasion of Judea after that.

B. C. 676. Says Demetrius, "The tribes of Benjamin and Levi were not carried into captivity by Senacherim, but that from this captivity to the last captivity from Jerusalem, by Nebuchadnezzar, was a period of 128 years and 6 months." The last captivity by Nebuchadnezzar occurred on the tenth day of the fifth month, B. C. 547; to which add 128 years and 6 months, and we have the tenth day of the eleventh month, B. C. 676. Thus we find an exact harmony existing between the Bible, Demetrius, and the recent discoveries among the ruins of Nineveh.

B. C. 673. We have observed that Sennacherib's first expedition against Hezekiah was B. C. 676. By comparing 2 Kings 19: 9, with Isaiah 20: 3, I believe it has become the universal opinion that there was an interval of three years between the two invasions of the land of Judea by Sennacherib. Three from 676 leaves B. C. 673 for the time of the second invasion, which was "in the 14th year of Hezekiah" (2 Kings 18: 13); and by comparing Isa. 37: 37, 38, with the first chapter of the book of Tobit, we learn that Sennacherib was slain in the 14th year of Hezekiah, which proves that his reign continued only eight years, though Dr. Hincks gives him nine. "Polyhistor gives eighteen years to Sennacherib" (appendix, p. 2); but I suppose this is only a mistake on the part of some transcriber; the original must have read eight instead of eighteen years; for Sennacherib had not ascended the throne as early as the sixth of Hezekiah; and since he was slain in the 14th of Hezekiah, his reign could not have continued over eight years.

B. C. 672, From Polyhistor, it would appear that after the death of Sennacherib, his brother reigned about one year.

B. C. 671. Says Polyhistor, "After the reign of the brother of Sennacherib, Hagisa reigned over the Babylonians; and when he had governed for the space of thirty days, he was slain by Merodach-Baladan, who held the empire by force during six months."—(P. 64.) This is the Merodach-Baladan mentioned by Isaiah 39: 1. Isaiah says he was "the son of Baladan"; and we have observed that Baladan his father was slain by Sennacherib.

B. C. 670. According to Polyhistor, Merodach-Baladan "was slain and succeeded by a person named Elibus."—P. 64. This is the second time this Elibus was on the throne; for says Polyhistor, "In the third year of his reign, Sennacherib, king of the Assyrians, levied an army against the Babylonians, and in a battle in which they were engaged routed and took him prisoner with his adherents" (p. 64), which could not have been the third year after Elibus slew Merodach Baladan, for that would have been about five years after the death of Sennacherib, who is here said to have taken Elibus prisoner; and we know from those inscriptions, to which all other authorities must yield, that the time Sennacherib subjugated the Babylonians was "at the very commencement of his reign." (Appendix, p. 5.) I suppose the truth of the matter is about this: when Sargon, the father of Sennacherib, in the twelfth year of his reign commenced the war against Marduk-Baladan, he associated this Elibus with him on the throne; for the time he was taken prisoner by Sennacherib was three years after that time. When Sennacherib took "upon himself the government of the Babylonians, he appointed his son Asordanes their king" (64), whose reign we have already observed commenced B. C. 680; hence this year B. C. 680 was also the first of Sennacherib.

B. C. 625. According to Berosus, Nabopalassar "reigned 29 years. Polyhistor also says he reigned 29 years."—Appendix, p. 13.

B. C. 621. Says Ptolemy, "In the 5th year of Nabopalassar, which is the 127th year of Nabonassar, in the Egyptian Athyr 27th to the 28th, the 11th hour, near ending in Babylon, the moon began to be eclipsed; and it was eclipsed mostly on the south one fourth of its diameter." According to my tables, there were three digits eclipsed at 14 minutes after 4 in the morning of April the 22d, B. C. 621, which fixes that as the fifth year of his reign.

B. C. 596. The reigns of two kings are omitted in our copy of Ptolemy's Canon, as may be seen from the following table, which is extracted from Bosanquet's "Sacred and Profane Chronology."

B. C.	BABYLON. Canon of Ptolemy.	Yrs.	NINEVEH. Polyhistor.	Yrs.	Abydenus.
[illegible]	Assaradinus	[illegible]	Senacherib	[illegible]	Senacherib
[illegible]	Saosduchinus	[illegible]	His son (Esarhaddon)	[illegible]	Nergilus (Nergal)
[illegible]	Kiniladinus	[illegible]	Sammughes	[illegible]	Adramelus
[illegible]	Nabopalassar	[illegible]	His brother	[illegible]	Axerdis his brother
			Nabupalsar or Sardanapalus	[illegible]	Sardanapalus
			Saracus		Saracus
[illegible]	Nabokolassar	[illegible]	Sardanapalus and his son Nebuchadnezzar	[illegible]	Busalossorus and his son Nabuchodrossor

It will be seen that the two kings omitted are Saracus and Sardanapalus, or the second Nabopalassar. This omission accounts for the reign of Nebuchadnezzar being placed just 38 years too high in the Canon, or just 36 years higher than Demetrius and Clemens of Alexandria placed it (p. 27). Abydenus expressly declares that "Saracus reigned over the Assyrians"; and Polyhistor says that "Saracus was king of the Chaldeans" (p. 22). We are not informed how long this king reigned, but the interval gives him ten years.

B. C. 587. Says Bosanquet, "Polyhistor speaks of Nabuchodrossor, who reigned forty-three years as son of Sardanapalus. Now we know that Nebuchadnezzar, who reigned forty-three years, was son of Nabopalassar. Sardanapalus therefore was Nabopalassar"; and according to both Berosus and Polyhistor, he reigned 21 years. As both Berosus and Polyhistor in one place give Nabopalassar 29 years, and in another give him only 21, there must have either been two kings by that name, or, as Bosanquet seems to suppose, we have the same king on the throne once before, and then again after the reign of Saracus.

B. C. 565. Nebuchadnezzar reigned 43 years, as admitted by all.

B. C. 558. "In the eighth year of Nebuchadnezzar, "he carried away all Jerusalem." 2 Kings 24: 12, 14. And says Demetrius, "From the carrying away from Jerusalem, to the reign of the fourth Ptolemy," there were "338 years and 3 months" (p. 36). Take 338 years and 3 months from the tenth day of the fifth month, B. C. 558, and we have the tenth day of the eighth month, B. C. 220, which was the beginning of the reign of the fourth Ptolemy.

Thus it will be seen that the best authorities outside of the Bible confirm and establish the chronology which we had gathered from the Bible only. When I first wrote the work called "The Sealed Book of Daniel Opened," not knowing but that there might be some well established information on the subject of chronology, which I had not yet seen, I felt anxious to have the work closely criticised; and since it has now passed through the crucible of all kinds of criticism, it would appear to be established as about correct; for our chronology, which was at first established alone by the Bible, we have once proven to be correct by astronomy; second, by the Parian Chronicle; third, by the best authorities among ancient historians; and now again by the recent discoveries among the ruins of Nineveh. Therefore, after contemplating the matter coolly and deliberately, I must conclude that the chronology of our Bible is now established in a way too firm and fixed ever to be overthrown; and if no error can be discovered in it, I must believe that Christ will come in A. D. 1868.

FREE THOUGHT.

Though the world has had nearly six thousand years' experience; and notwithstanding the millions and tens of millions who have fallen sacrifices to the principles of Popery; does it not appear strange that even in the church of our Lord Jesus Christ there is yet remaining a delight to exercise the office of judge over other men's consciences in matters of religious faith? And yet these intolerant spirits should know that the surest proof of their own error, and the greatest obstacle to their success in the undertaking of convincing every body of their orthodoxy, consigning as they do all to the realm of perdition who do not endorse their theories, is this very spirit with which they work. "Believe as I do, or be damned"; "Believe that error and be lost"—are expressions whose import should not be on the christian's pen, or spoken from a heart owning allegiance to the God of love and the Constitution of the U. S., however sure may be of proof his theory, or however warm his zeal in defending it.

LIFE WITHOUT TRIALS.—Without trials you cannot guess at your own strength. Men do not learn to swim on a table; they must go into deep water and buffet the waves. If you wish to understand their true character—if you would know their strength—what they are capable—throw them overboard! Over with them, and if they are worth saving, they will swim ashore themselves.

THE SEWING MACHINES AND DICTIONARIES.

"A Webster's Dictionary is something that I very much want, and I should be glad if I could make up a list of ten subscribers, so as to obtain it. But those who sympathize with our views are so few here, that I shall be unable to get the number required. The five which I have sent are all I can get."

"With a large family to support, and no dependance but my needle, a Sewing Machine would be a great help to us; and if there were more of our faith in this place, or more who look upon it with favor, I should go to work with some hope of securing it. If the requisite number (32) were not so large, I think I could, as it is; but I must be content for the present, to go without what I so much need."

We have received a number of letters like the above, and to put the Sewing Machine and the Webster's Dictionary within the reach of all who are thus situated, we make the following offer:—

For every $5.00, with five new subscribers, and $2.50 from each for one year, one copy of WEBSTER'S, ($12.00) UNABRIDGED DICTIONARY.

For every $50.00 with sixteen new subscribers, and $2.50 from each for one year, one of GROVER & BAKER'S ($55.00) SEWING MACHINES.

This offer, with the other, extends only till the 1st of June. All names for the Dictionaries or Machines must be sent in before that date.

THE WORLD'S CRISIS.
Valuable Premiums for New Subscribers!
SEWING MACHINES AND DICTIONARIES.

To every one who shall, any time before the 1st of June, send us, with the money, THIRTY-TWO NEW SUBSCRIBERS for One Year, ($2.50 each), or Sixty-four for Six Months, ($1.25 each), we will send, by express or rail, a

Grover & Baker's
($55) SEWING MACHINE,

one of the simplest, most durable, completest and best, (in our opinion the very best), in the market. A great labor-saving machine and blessing, in the family and work room; and a gift of priceless value, which you can now, with a little effort, present to your thankful wife, sister, mother or daughter.

FOR TEN NEW SUBSCRIBERS, with the money for One Year, or Twenty for Six months, one copy of

Webster's ($12)
UNABRIDGED DICTIONARY,

containing 10,000 words and meanings not found in other Dictionaries, over 3000 fine Engravings, and more matter than any other single volume in the world. Invaluable to every student, minister, or general reader.

FOR THREE NEW SUBSCRIBERS, with the money for One Year, or Six for Six Months, one copy, postpaid, of Cruden's Condensed Concordance.

or a Bible Dictionary; either and both of which are indispensable helps in the study of the Scriptures.

The names and monies can be sent in as fast as they are obtained, and when the full number is received, the Gift will be forwarded.

Come, brethren, a general rally from Maine to California! The Judge is at the door; and, with these gifts in view, and the greater reward yet to be given to all who do what they can to prepare a people for his coming, let us every one see what we can do.

WILL YOU START A SABBATH SCHOOL?

BRO. GRANT:—The subject of neighborhood Sabbath schools has, of late, rested constantly upon my heart and mind. Scattered over the land are many churches; and connected with each one is usually a Sabbath school, where the village children and a few only from the farming districts are gathered to be instructed in the knowledge of the Holy Scriptures, which we believe and able to make us wise unto salvation. In cities, and most villages, there is provision made for some kind of Sabbath Bible instruction; often it is but indirectly taught, question books having almost universally superseded Bible lessons even in the infant classes. How much better if the universal practice was Bible lessons.

But in the great extent of country towns, not even the semblance of instruction is often seen. O my heart longs to go into each neighborhood throughout the length and breadth of the land, and labor earnestly, heartily there, till I see a Sabbath school started in the school-house, or elsewhere; where teachers will with earnest mind gather the little ones around, to sow in their hearts and minds the seed of the word of God, which liveth and abideth forever.

Twenty-five years since, in an obscure neighborhood, in a country town, there was a Sabbath school commenced. It was in the old red school-house. Thither my infant feet were led, and there in broken sentences lisped my first lesson,—"The former treatise have I made, O Theophilus, of all that Jesus began both to do and teach." Hard words and incomprehensible to a little child of three years; but, like the little acorn, it budded to become a tree. The spring time is here, the seed time is now. O that I could everywhere sow that seed; but how limited will be the extent of my utmost labor. In what way can I reach many but through the christian press?

Dear christians, scattered over hills and in the vales, let me whisper to you, Cannot you start a Sabbath school in your own district? Brothers, will you superintend and teach? Sisters, will you do likewise? O how glorious will be the harvest in the reaping day to come! His word shall not return unto him void, but shall accomplish that whereunto he hath sent it.

Watch not the clouds above thee;
Let the whirlwind round thee sweep;
God may the seed time give thee,
But another hand may reap.
Have faith, though ne'er beholding
The seed burst from its sheath;
[illegible]
Or what be spared to bloom.
Room on the narrowest ridges
The ripened grain will find;
That the Lord of the harvest coming,
In the harvest, sheaves may bind.

THE WORLD'S CRISIS AND SECOND ADVENT MESSENGER.
Boston, Wednesday, April 4, 1866.

☞ Take Notice!

All subscriptions for the Crisis are payable IN ADVANCE, at the rate of $2.50 a year; but if delayed six months beyond the time of payment, the price is $3.00 a year. Thus 50 cents a year is saved by paying in advance.

☞ Please Remember!

All remittances to this office, in the form of drafts, bank-checks and postal money-orders, should be made payable to the BUSINESS AGENT, GEO. T. ADAMS.

SPRINGFIELD.

Our meetings at Music Hall, Springfield, which followed the close of our discussion, were a happy success. The prospect in that city is very encouraging. There is a spirit of union and brotherly love among those who hold different views on some doctrinal points, over which Satan has made efforts in time past to cause divisions; but we trust his success has come to a perpetual end.

Our social meeting at noon was very interesting. It was no dull, prosy affair, but one that caused the saints to rejoice, and give glory to God.

WORCESTER.

We spent Lord's day, March 18th, with the church in Worcester, and found it in a healthy condition. Their congregations are large, and show an increasing interest. One rose for prayers, and others are quite serious. The church has decided to build a meeting house, and intend to have it ready for use within two months. They have selected a central situation near Main street, and the Bay State House.

MEETINGS IN BOSTON.

The meetings at the corner of Causeway and Lowell streets, Boston, continue to increase in interest. Bro. J. G. Hook's faithful and earnest labors have been greatly blest. Brn. Couch, Sibley, Ramsey, Bellows, Hastings, and others, have rendered efficient aid. The meetings are to be continued this week. Baptism next Lord's day. Praise the Lord for his wonderful works to the children of men.

SPIRITUALISM EXPOSED.

In a few days, we purpose to issue a tract exposing the demoniacal character of Spiritualism. For several years we have been urged to write such a work. It will consist of about eighty pages, in which we endeavor to show that the demons are the originators of Spiritualism, and that the morals, doctrines, and politics of Spiritualism are just such as we should expect, provided that demons were the founders of the system.

THE RIGHT SPIRIT.

The following accompanied an article for the Crisis:—"You can publish this, or not, just as you think best, and I shall not be offended; for I want nothing said or done that will not be for the best good of the cause, and the glory of God."

We think all our readers must be pleased with the spirit of the foregoing. Be assured, it is very comforting to an editor, to know that his contributors are willing to let him act in harmony with his best judgment, after asking the Lord daily for special wisdom. He can adopt no other principle and be a free man in the Lord. It is reasonable to suppose that the one who edits a paper feels more interest in its welfare and usefulness than any of its readers; inasmuch as the one who has the command of a ship is expected to have more care and interest for the welfare of all on board, than any other one; yet, it often happens that even a faithful captain cannot please all of his passengers, without doing injustice to others. Some may demand more attention than circumstances will allow, or require the adoption of some measure that would endanger the lives of all on board. Those who make the demand do not see the danger of the course they recommend, but the captain is sure their plan is not safe. He sees perils that they have not noticed. What is his duty in such a case? All must answer, To take the course of safety for all on board, even though he may be severely censured by some. But it would be much pleasanter for him to know that all felt like the one whose language we have quoted at the beginning of the article,—willing to let him do just as he thought best. We are rejoiced to know that we have the prayers and sympathies of the dear friends of Jesus, who are anxiously waiting for his coming and kingdom. May he bless them all with perfect peace and love. It is rest to labor for such.

THE FENIANS.

The Fenians are making preparations as fast as possible for the commencement of their terrible work. Men may laugh and sneer at the movement, and call it "puerile;" but we think the time is at hand when such will experience a great change in their sentiments. When, in the history of the world, has a party arisen of the number and strength of the Fenians, that has not made its power felt in political circles? but this party is anti-Protestant, and opposed to all institutions that are not in harmony with Catholicism.

The following from the Boston Daily Herald shows that some are beginning to open their eyes to what is going on around us.

"THE FENIANS IN POLITICS.—The Fenians are so compactly organized and so thoroughly imbued with the esprit du corps that they will be very likely to make themselves felt in our politics, especially if their plans for the deliverance of Ireland prove a failure. The Boston Pilot already intimates such a purpose. It says:—

"The Fenians demand strict neutrality. They require that the government shall oppose the equipment and sailing of privateers with precisely the same alacrity shown by England in the fitting out and departure of the Alabama, Florida, Georgia, Shenandoah and other [illegible] from her ports. They ask [illegible] they will be satisfied with no less. If they [illegible] them, they will vote for men and measures that yield them, and no public man may hope for a re-election in any city, district or state, in which the Irish vote holds the balance of power, who advocates for Great Britain and the United States in the Fenian struggle a different kind of neutrality."

In a speech made at a Fenian meeting in Roxbury, Mass., March 28th, Major Brown is reported to have said that "The chief engineers of Generals Grant and Lee are in New York to-day, working together and drawing the plans for the proposed movement on England three thousand miles from home!"

There are very strong indications that terrible scenes are not far in the future. Let us watch and be sober.

UNIVERSAL PEACE.

One extreme follows another. But a few months ago almost every one was advocating war. Now a new movement has been recently set on foot to bring about "universal peace." This has been commenced, as far as we can learn, by the Spiritualists. On the 12th of December, 1865, a "peace convention" was held in Boston, when it was urged that "a world's peace society" be formed for the purpose of establishing "permanent peace." Among the prominent actors in this new enterprise, we notice the following as reported:

"Rev. Adin Ballou, Hopedale; Lysander S. Richards, Quincy; Mrs. Ezra H. Heywood, Princeton; Rev. Dr. Beckwith, Boston; J. P. Blanchard, Boston; Alfred H. Love, Philadelphia; Edward Draper, Hopedale, Mass.; Rev. J. G. Fish, New Jersey; Wm. S. Heywood, West Newton; Henry H. Brigham, South Abington; Mrs. Lucretia Mott, Philadelphia; H. C. Wright, Boston; Dr. A. B. Child, Boston; Thomas Hunt, Salem, Mass.; Judge A. G. W. Carter, Cincinnati, Ohio; Mrs. Elizabeth B. Chase, Bellows Falls, Vt.; Wm. Lloyd Garrison, Boston."

Several of these men are noted and radical Spiritualists; and we do not know but that all of them are favorable to their sentiments. They propose to organize a "National Society," and call "a Congress of Nations to establish a permanent peace." This reminds us of what Paul says:—"For yourselves know perfectly that the day of the Lord so cometh as a thief in the night For when they shall say peace and safety, then sudden destruction cometh upon them, . . . but ye, brethren, are not in darkness, that that day should overtake you as a thief. Ye are all the children of light, and the children of the day."—1 Thess. 5: 2-5. This scripture prophecy shows that at the time of the second coming of Christ, a class who are unprepared will be saying "peace and safety," He does not intimate that there will be "peace and safety," but they will be talking about plans to establish it upon earth; while at the same time the nations will be preparing for war, if they are not actually engaged in it.

Satan has turned reformer all at once, and is causing his mediums to advocate peace, while he is at the same time doing all he can to get families, societies, churches, and nations, engaged in war. As Napoleon III., when he would make the greatest preparations for war, talks of putting his army on a "peace footing;" so Satan causes the cry of "peace and safety" at the time of the greatest danger, in order that the people may not be found "watching," as instructed by Jesus, at the time of the second advent of our Lord. The "peace and safety" cry must come just before the appearing of Jesus; and yet at the same time the state of things in the world will be the opposite. We may expect that Napoleon will call a world's peace convention.

At the peace convention in Boston, a leading speaker proposed "that all now unite in one grand effort to advance the best interests of peace." Let us watch.

INQUIRIES.

Is there much probability that the present monarch of France, despite his protestations to that effect in a public, as well as private sense, contemplates withdrawing his fleets and armies from Mexico?

Do you not think that there is a secret compact existing between the Fenian organization and Louis Napoleon; by which the latter hopes to be enabled to revolutionize and disintegrate the British Empire; and thus pave the way for universal sovereignty and the subversion of the christian religion?

R. S. FOSTER.

We have been satisfied from the beginning of the talk of Napoleon about withdrawing his troops from Mexico, that it was only talk. We came to this conclusion because we have noticed that when he takes possession of a place he holds on to it, and that his promises to the contrary are no more to be trusted than the wind. He is aiming to get control of the whole world, and this continent especially; hence he will not let go his grasp if he can avoid it. It would be very humiliating to the French pride to be obliged to back out of an enterprise like the one in Mexico. Consequently, we may expect that Napoleon's promises of a withdrawal are like those of debtors when they wish to get rid of the creditors without paying any thing.

Touching the second inquiry, we would say, it is a known fact that Napoleon is sympathizing with the Fenians, and endorsing their great movement. He evidently purposes to use them as a cat's paw in avenging the battle of Waterloo, and then for aiding him in getting possession of the United States and the Canadas.

IS IT SO?

"BRO. GRANT:—I lately heard it publicly stated that an entire church in Philadelphia, who formerly believed in the 'sleep of the dead,' had gone over to Spiritualism. Is it so? Yours for the truth,

I. H. F. VARNEY.

In answer to the above, we would say that we are somewhat acquainted with the churches in Philadelphia, which believe in the "sleep of the dead," and we have not heard of a single individual who has given up "the sleep of the dead," and "gone into Spiritualism."

A [illegible]

Thinking [illegible] are [illegible] perplexed [illegible] the world. They have been expecting a state of rest, but they see less and less signs of it. All their high hopes of the "good time coming" are blighted, and the more brightly "fast" the coming events. Their hearts are trembling in view of the omens now opening before them, and they feel some like Belshazzar when he saw the handwriting on the wall, declaring his kingdom was "finished."

The following editorial, from the Philadelphia Daily Ledger of March 20, 1866, gives a very correct view of the state of things in the world at the present time:—

THE UNREST OF THE WORLD.

"There is at the present time throughout the world a most singular state of unrest. As, after a storm on the Atlantic, the sea will heave and swell, and the waves, with a sort of unspent fury, lash the shores, or as sometimes the ground swell will be the indication of a coming as well as a departing storm; so now all the political relations of the nations, external and internal, are in such a confused state that not even the most astute politician can certainly determine whether the uneasiness that now is in progress is the precursor of a gathering storm or the settling down again into a condition of peaceful progress.

In China, where it was supposed that the rebellion had been quieted effectually, it breaks out in a new place, and at the very moment when the Emperor, relieved from apparent danger by the forces of the great christian powers, was now seeking to rid himself of them, and even driving the missionaries from Cochin China, the rebels arise again, capture a large city, and cut off the heads of Imperialists with as great zeal as ever. The people want progress. They have lost faith in the old government, and the government has not faith enough in the new arms and arts of truthfulness of Europeans to trust in them.

In Europe there is equal confusion. The haughty Spanish government, having caught up a few of the tricks of modern warfare, tries to let them off upon Chili and Peru, and restore the old and destroy the new, while insurrection is eating out her strength at home. France is uneasy about the Mexican question, and knows not whether to retire with but indifferent laurels, or to go forward into a war, not only with her own ancient allies, but with all the more liberal and enlightened of her own people. Her relations with England are all uneasy. She is withdrawing from her extradition treaty, which looks as if there might be further withdrawals of social intercourse and political closeness between the two sides of the English Channel. While England is suspending the habeas corpus in Ireland, her cabinet is breaking up from internal weakness and dissensions. The House of Commons, being more aristocratic even in its more moderate representatives than the country is, can agree upon nothing, while the people are clamorous for reform.

The Danubian Principalities, whose affairs were thought to have been settled by the treaty of Paris, are giving rise to another European consultation. And while Austria and Prussia are quarrelling about their late spoil, the latter is, or ought to be, on the point of a civil war between the king and his minister, Von Bismarck, on the one side, and the chambers of their nominal parliament on the other. On this side of the Atlantic, the whole of the British provinces, including the West Indies, are in great ferments, Fenianism on one side, and Gov. Eyre's troubles in Jamaica on the other; while the subsidence of our own recent storm is attended with many most unpleasant altercations, extending even to the relations of Congress and the President.

And there is one great underlying cause for all this, though the manifestations are so various. It is a loss of faith in the old state of affairs, without anything to supply its place by faith in the new. Our own recent war, among other things, has produced a general skepticism in the old and aristocratic forces that have governed Europe and the world, while as yet there is not sufficient belief in the new principles that have been brought into power to give the nations confidence in progress and growth as the law of national life and existence. Then, again, there has been an usual reliance on the power of the sword to set things straight. The old arms of war, which used to be thought invincible, have been superceded so suddenly that there is no doubt but what other forces are yet awaiting development that may put the people more on a par with the strong governments that oppress them.

But beyond all this, war begets more or less corruption everywhere, especially when suddenly entered into, and a taste for corruption and the sweets of its momentary success throw all things out of their usual course, and make it hard for men to settle down again into the works and ways of peace. Men at such times want to make money too fast, and often forsake the nicer points of honor and paths of eternal rectitude. The late wars have in some respects demoralized the people of most nations, and it takes time to return to the paths of rectitude and simplicity."

FRENCH TROOPS AT ROME.

The following from a Paris correspondent of the New York Journal of Commerce, dated Feb. 23d, 1866, is an interesting item; and gives another evidence that Napoleon's promises are of no consequence when he sees it for his interest to break them. The correspondent says:—

"I wish it could be said that the evacuation of Rome by the French was in as fair a way of being accomplished as that of Mexico. I fear that this is very far from being the case. The announcement of Rouher, the Minister of State, in the Senate, that a "foreign" corps of 1,200 men, evidently intended to be all, or nearly all, Frenchmen, and of whom the officers and sub-officers are even already announced to be such, was being organized for the Pope by the imperial government, is calculated to throw the most serious doubts upon the loyal execution by France of the convention of September, 1864. These men are clearly meant to be nothing but the vanguard of a French army, which is to be ready at any moment to march to their assistance. They are to be armed, equipped and organized by France; to preserve their rights as French citizens and soldiers, their grade in the French army, and their right of advancement. They in fact never cease to be French soldiers at all; although they are to be nominally "paid" by the Pope, if he can find the money, and the expense of their equipment, etc. is also to be "repaid," under the same reservation.

It is quite evident that the Emperor never intended to leave these men to deal alone with the whole Roman population, or to look on quietly while they are overpowered. They are placed in Rome in order to pledge French military honor to their protection, as well as to that of the Pope; and also to keep a safe door open for the return of larger forces, if wanted, without involving the necessity of coming into hostile conflict with Italian troops in order to effect a landing. If this be so—and things look very like it—then the whole proceeding is a dishonorable and disloyal evasion of the spirit of the treaty, while the letter of it is professed to be observed. The spirit of the convention of September was, that the Roman Government and its subjects should be left [illegible] with each other, while Italy [illegible] held her arms and look on. [illegible] Roman population will still find [illegible] face to face with the whole French [illegible], represented by this "foreign" corps. What is remarkable is, that scarcely any mention or notice, certainly no criticism, of this scandalous breach of faith has been ventured upon by any of the Liberal journals of Paris. I believe that the mot d'ordre has been sent round, requesting them to abstain from discussing the subject. I trust, however, that it will be duly noted in America, where so much sympathy and interest for Italian unity has been manifested, and will be repudiated as it deserves."

BRO. F. H. CHAMBERLAIN, who writes such good [illegible] the Crisis, is desirous of finding a situation, as a clerk. His writing is good, and easy to be read. If any of our readers wish to assist our Bro. by finding him a situation, it would be doing the Lord a favor. Bro. C. is a cripple, and would like some business in which he would not have a large amount of walking to do. His address is Sutton, Mass.

A SAD END.

Bro. Bellows gave us the following sad account which took place recently: A young lady who had been convicted again and again, but strove against the Spirit, was sitting in church, and all at once got up and said—"Lost! lost"! and dropped dead.

ERRATUM.—In the article of C. Colgrove on the "Impending Crisis" in Crisis for March 7th, instead of Ireland included in the ten kingdoms, it should have been "not included."

FOR SALE.

I will sell to any person who wishes to buy, a set of the "Signs of the Times and Advent Herald," from the commencement of its publication in 1840 till now. It is nearly perfect. Some few numbers are wanting. There is not another on sale in the world. It is valuable as presenting our history from the beginning for twenty-five years. Who wants the set for his own use? Or who will buy it and present it to the Crisis office? There are 27 volumes. Price, $30 00.

QUARTERLY SESSION OF THE N. H. STATE CONFERENCE.

Pursuant to notice, the conference met at Exeter, N. H., March 15th, 16th, 17th and 18th, 1866. Preachers present belonging to the conference were the following: J. Knowles, J. G. Smith, Geo. W. Brown, J. Morse, and A. W. Sibley.

A business session of the conference was held Saturday, A. M. The President, Eld. J. Knowles, of Lake Village, N. H., presiding.

After prayer by Bro. Geo. W. Brown, of Portsmouth, N. H., and some talk about various matters pertaining to the conference, it was voted that we commence our next quarterly session on Thursday, previous to the first Sunday in June. The following resolution was presented and passed by a full vote:

Resolved, That the Secretary be instructed to ascertain what church would like to have the next quarterly session held with them, so that due notice may be given of the same.

Since our last conference, held at Barnstead, N. H., Bro. Henry M. Bryant, who then was received as a member, has been set apart to the work of the gospel ministry by the imposition of hands and prayer, and is commended to the faithful in Christ, wherever his lot may be cast. The following was the order of the ordination service:

Sermon by Eld. Joseph Harvey, of Pittsfield, N. H. Prayer by Eld. James Morrill. Charge by Eld. Brown, of the F. W. Baptist denomination. Right hand of fellowship by Eld. John Morse, of Manchester, N. H.

Eld. Albion Ross, chairman of the committee to attend the quarterly conference in New Hampshire, was not permitted to be with us, which we regretted very much, but sent the following epistle to the conference:—

"To the brethren of the New Hampshire State Conference, convened at Exeter, N. H., in quarterly session.

DEAR BRN.:—Not having been able to meet and participate in the deliberations of any of the quarterly conferences during the present year, I very much regret that my engagements are such that they will not permit me to be with you during the present session in Exeter. I can only asked to be excused, on the ground that I am, with others, engaged in a very interesting work of the Lord in New Bedford and Fair Haven, Mass. My desire is, that in all your deliberations you may enjoy the manifest presence of the Great Head of the church. And may the God of peace sanctify you wholly, and I pray God your whole soul, body and spirit, may be preserved blameless unto the coming of our Lord Jesus Christ.

In the kingdom and patience of Jesus,

A. ROSS."

This epistle was not received till after the conference had closed.

Thus closed the business session of the conference with peace abounding in our hearts.

There was preaching by Bro. G. W. Brown, Thursday evening. Friday, A. M., social meeting; P. M., preaching by Bro. J. Knowles; evening by Bro. J. G. Smith. Saturday, A. M., Bro. J. Morse, of Manchester, N. H., preached; P. M., A. W. Sibley; evening, A. Mussey.

Sunday, it was thought expedient to move the meeting to the Christian meeting-house; it being more commodious than the Advent Chapel, where an attentive audience listened to preaching during the day by Bro. A. W. Sibley, and evening by Bro. J. Morse.

The meeting closed with the prospect of much good, the Spirit of the Lord being with us.

REFORMATION IN RICHMOND.

BRO. GRANT:—I came to this place and commenced to labor some three weeks since. I found some trying to hold on, others thought nothing could be done; but to the praise of the good Lord, I have seen his mighty power displayed in reclaiming the backslider, and converting sinners; and still the work goes on gloriously. Men are constrained to say, "The Lord is in this place." To God be all the praise. I would say to the friends that have wanted me to come and labor among them, that I shall not be able to at present; as duty seems to say, Stay here. Blessed be God for his mercy to this people.

Shall we stop it?

A poor widow in Hampshire County writes: "Will you please discontinue my paper, the 'World's Crisis.' I like it much, for it is all the Advent preaching I have; but I am a widow, and poor, and have two little children to care for. So, for these reasons, I thought it best not to take it longer. Looking for Jesus soon to come." MRS. J. R.

We shall not stop it, sister. Some friend of the Lord's poor will pay for it for you, and be rewarded when Jesus comes. Our poor list is already very large, and the donations to the Poor Fund are very small; yet we are not willing that any of God's poor shall go without bread while we have a loaf to share.

"COME OVER AND HELP US."

The calls for the gospel of the kingdom are constantly increasing from the few hundred souls (scattered everywhere among the masses) who cannot feed on the fables of these last days, nor be satisfied with the special messages of the numerous "hobby riders." During the last three months I have traveled and labored almost constantly in parts of Maine, and yet not able to reply to half the calls I have had.

Early in the winter, in company with Bro. York, I started on a tour east in a wagon, the weather extremely cold, but no sleighing. We visited Richmond and Gardiner the first Sunday, and enjoyed pleasant seasons with those who came out to hear the word of life. Some yet love the Lord, and his word is being glorified in those places.

We next visited Whitefield; preached to an attentive congregation one evening. From here we proceeded to Friendship to fill our engagements. Found a Methodist protracted meeting, and queried whether it was best to commence another meeting in the place; but learning that the masses did not attend their meetings, and were not intending to, we concluded to commence. Our house was immediately filled, and continued to be during the time allotted us to stay. We held five meetings, and had an interesting and I trust a profitable season; the brethren and sisters were fed, revived, and strengthened, while others saw and felt the force of truth, and the duty of a preparation to meet the Lord in peace at his coming.

Being invited to visit Cushing, and also Waldoboro, and not able to do both, we decided on the latter place; found a large and attentive audience, which never before heard the gospel as we preach it. We gave one discourse, and circulated about one hundred tracts, praying God to bring forth fruit from it.

We proceeded to Bristol; becoming storm-bound, we called a meeting in Bro. R. Tibbett's house; enjoyed a precious season in the Lord. Signs of reformation in that place. We learn that some twelve or fifteen have since been converted under the labors of Bro. Hiram S. Mitchell.

We next went to Round Pond Conference, which was an interesting and blessed gathering, and has been reported. Being requested to visit another village in town, we did so, and held two meetings, with no special results. Bro. York now being obliged to return home, we parted, and I went to fill engagements at Southport. Here a few entertain the gospel hope; the Methodist house had been engaged, and we preached five discourses to good congregations, with increased interest. In this place, though the religion of Jesus is respected, real christianity has nearly died out, and there is now a good time for mission efforts. Some love the truth, and hope soon to see the Lord.

From this place we returned home; found the devil having quite a revival through a speaking trance medium, who gathered large congregations to hear the new gospel. It seemed duty to expose it; we therefore gave notice for four evening lectures on "Modern Spiritualism; what is it?"

Our hall was filled and crowded, while we gave them Bible, history, and a large amount of statements from their own books, papers, and sayings of their spirits. This closed their revival, while I went to commence a protracted meeting in Falmouth. There the Lord has poured out his Spirit abundantly, and more than twenty have been converted, and many backsliders reclaimed; the work still goes on. Thank God.

We next visited Dixfield Centre, and commenced a protracted effort, in company with Bro. York. The weather was cold, the travelling bad, and a singing school three evenings in the week, with eighty scholars. This was unfavorable, but the people were pleasant and interested to hear. We gave them eight discourses, and visited many families, preaching from house to house. The Lord may bless the word. Some were blessed and strengthened.

We called at Carthage and enjoyed two meetings with the brethren, and visited several families. The Lord has worked wonders here the past year, and a good society has been gathered. Bro. J. C. Wheeler, who labors here, was absent.

On our return home, we spent one evening in Hartford, and preached to a few faithful ones, which cheered them on their way. Spent one Sunday in Lewiston, and preached to a few, who rejoiced to hear. Thus in the last three months we have traveled about three hundred miles, mostly in a wagon, and attended over one hundred meetings; seen some of the work of God, and hope for more. Still waiting for Jesus to come.

Falmouth, Me. I. C. WELLCOME.

For the World's Crisis.

WATCH!

Watchmen are the guardians of safety, and God has made the christian the guardian of his own safety, a watchman; for while he cannot keep himself, and needs the grace of God every moment to keep him, yet that will not keep him unless he puts himself on sentry, and stands guard over his interests as an accountable being, watching closely, unto prayer, every avenue of temptation, every motion of the heart, so that every word, thought and action will be challenged and closely examined as to its right to occupy the attention or dwell in the mind of one who is claiming to be the Lord's.

How much is lost by simply neglecting to watch even for a moment, more than can be gained in hours of conflict; for the enemy is ever ready to "come in like a flood," and God's Spirit will not lift up its standard unless the watchman gives the alarm and calls on the great Captain of his salvation for help.

He only can grow in grace who watches continually. If one gets tired of watching, and thinks that less vigilance will do as well, that he can be a christian and not be quite so particular, he will be like a man who has been endeavoring to pull his boat up against the stream, which he could only do by the most vigorous efforts, and yet concludes that he will not work quite so hard, and relaxing his efforts, he goes rapidly down the stream.

A moment's cessation will let the enemy in. The price of salvation is continual watchfulness. It certainly requires a great degree of spiritual discernment to distinguish enemies without and within, and patience to bear the work; but when once the man becomes a watchman, he becomes a christian, and will grow in grace rapidly.

Watch ye, then, christians. Quit you like men. Be strong. Yes, you will be strong in watching. Grace will be sufficient, and you will prevail over all your enemies; only watch and pray.

L. C. MCKINSTRY.

For the World's Crisis.

A DELICATE SUBJECT.

Many are afraid to speak about subjects that will not suit their hearers. Thus matter inside, and get tired and out of patience. But it is necessary to have something said by some one about the support of the traveling ministers, who are recognized as useful laborers among the Second Advent preachers. Their calls often come from those afar off, and no pledge given for their support. Such a call puts a preacher in a bad fix.

Do not write for a man to come unless you first consider how much his traveling expenses will be, and then how many days he will be gone from home, and how much he ought to have a day to support a family, say of four, which is a fair average. It will take $12 a week in these times, at least. If he travels fifty miles and back, it will cost on an average $5.00; that will make $17.00 for a week. All that falls short of this comes out of him or his family, and many times he does not get $10. Perhaps the people are not able to do any more. Then send for some one nearer by, or some one who has books or tracts to sell to pay part of his expenses, and do not buy a ten or a five cent tract, instead of putting into the contribution, and try to ease your conscience; you cannot cheat God, if you do his ministers.

Do not spend money for things that do you no good, double what you give for preaching, and then whine because the preachers wont come. They know who is stingy, better than you think they do. Things are double what they were five years ago, and yet ministers get no more for preaching the truth, while others have double for preaching errors. Do you love the truth? Then pay more for it, and you will get more of it.

The above will apply to a certain class; which class will find fault with this article.

REVIVAL IN W. FALMOUTH, ME.

BRO. GRANT:—In the Crisis of Mar. 14th, Bro. I. C. Wellcome gave an account of the work of God in Falmouth up to March 2nd. From that time the work continued to spread in a glorious manner, with no undue excitement; yet the people felt that God was in the place.

Sunday, Mar. 4, A. M. Bro. York preached a heart-stirring discourse on the inheritance of the saints, which was listened to with deep interest by the congregation. At the close of the afternoon service, a large number of brethren and sisters, including the converts, sat down to celebrate the Lord's Supper, and had a very interesting season. "Praise the Lord for his wonderful works to the children of men" here. The preaching brethren left for their homes and other fields of labor, but the Lord continued his work. Praise his blessed name. After spending some three days at home, the writer returned to Falmouth, continuing the meetings, and visiting from house to house, scattering the word wherever we found an opening, with good evidence that our work was not in vain in the Lord.

Sunday, March 18th, we had the privilege of burying eight happy converts in the likeness of Christ's death. O that they may be in the likeness of his resurrection! Never did I see converts give better evidence of a change of heart, or grow faster in their gifts and faith. All glory be to God.

The seed from which this revival took its rise was sown through Bro. York and Wellcome, on several funeral and other occasions, which, by the blessing of God, was working like fire under ground all ready to break out when our protracted meeting commenced, and think we think from twenty to thirty have been converted, and quite a number reclaimed. Tuesday, Mar. 20th, we left for home to take a little rest. May the Lord still carry on his work. Amen.

Correspondence.

From Bro. J. N. Runnells.

Bro. M. Grant:—Dear Sir, I have been a constant reader of the Crisis for more than two years, and acknowledge myself indebted to it for many invaluable ideas. Much light from the "Sacred Oracles" has been shed upon my mind from reading its pages. I may say that from reading the Crisis, and such books and tracts as my attention has been called to by it, I have become fully convinced that the Bible teaches that man is mortal, and that immortality can only be secured by getting into Christ, and a patient continuance in well doing.

But my experience resembles that of many others who have embraced unpopular teaching. He who feels impressed with the great importance of being "always ready" for the return of the Master, and labors to impress his friends and neighbors with the necessity of directing their minds to an investigation of this subject, will soon be regarded as a fanatic. And if he chance to avow his convictions that the great day of our Lord's second Advent is probably near at hand, he is immediately classed with infidels, heretics, speculative philosophers, and mischievous persons, in the guise of religion.

To give you some idea how Adventists are regarded, generally, I will give you the substance of some remarks that were made a few days since in a religious paper, published in Cincinnati, "The American Christian Review," edited by Messrs. Franklin and Rice. They had received a private letter informing them that a church somewhere had employed for another year the services of an Adventist, as preacher, etc. The Review informs us that the term "Advent" is used to cover up mischief. Then gives a list of the heretical notions that are adroitly covered up by this specious name:—

1st. That the kingdom of Christ has not yet come.

2d. That instead of keeping the first day we should keep the seventh.

3d. That all, both good and bad, are unconscious between death and the resurrection.

4th. That at the last judgment the wicked will be struck out of existence.

5th. That man has no soul but his breath.

6th. That man consists wholly of matter.

I have given the above very nearly in the editor's own words.

I wish to draw this editor, or the strongest man they can produce, into a discussion upon the "immortality of man," and "destiny of the wicked," and I want to know whether you will undertake to discuss these questions with them. I do not know whether I can succeed, but I will press them hard if you will promise to debate. I think such a discussion would do good, as many excellent minds can be reached, that will otherwise remain in darkness. Please let me know, and give me the propositions that you will discuss. Yours truly, J. M. Runnells.

N. Antioch, O.

We should be much pleased to discuss the 1st, 3d and 4th propositions, if we can agree about the preliminaries. We do not believe the 2d and 5th propositions, hence could not debate them. We are not prepared to speak definitely about the 6th, until the terms in it are defined; because the gentleman may not mean by them the same as we do. It would be involved in the 3d.

If arrangements can be made for an oral debate, we will endeavor to attend to it.

From Bro. A. N. Seymour.

Bro. Grant:—For three weeks past I have been laboring in the townships of Sylvania and Washington, some five and six miles west of Toledo, Ohio. My steps were directed there by Mr. Henry Ware and wife, who are old and well tried friends. They, having sold their farm in Lenawa Co., Mich., and moved to Sylvania township, requested me to make them a visit. I sent an appointment for Tuesday evening, with the request to secure me a full house the first night, which they did, and the truth of God held their attention for nearly two weeks, and the result thus far has been most blessed. Scores have become most deeply effected by the gospel that we as a people are heralding to dying men. The Lord has blessed our labors much. Praise alone belongs to our God.

This dear people are wide awake, and are determined to inform themselves thoroughly touching the glorious news that has been falling so sweetly upon their ears. They are an intelligent, enterprising, good-hearted people, from whom I have received the kindest attention from first to last. May the Lord bless them with every grace that will qualify them for usefulness and the kingdom of God. The influence here has become so permanent and strong that it is spreading over a large territory, and invitations have come in from adjacent townships to have me visit them, in one of which I have preached five discourses, and the influence here is moving with power. Sinners and backsliders are weeping, and saints rejoicing. I expect to continue the meeting after a few days. I have preached by night, visited from house to house by day, and in some instances held Bible classes. Such a thirst for knowledge pertaining to the coming of the Lord and kindred truths I have never seen in all my travels for the last twenty-five years. All are impressed with the idea that the judgment day is upon us surely.

My dear brother, my soul, body and spirit, by which I mean body, mind and strength, are thorough converts to God and his whole revealed will; and I love to preach, pray, talk and sing about the coming One more than I love to eat, drink, or sleep. Bless the dear Lord, my soul is overwhelmed with his goodness to me, and I can but rejoice in hope while my soul is full of glory. But oh! how differently some feel on the subject of the Lord's coming. One woman heard me one night, and a professed christian, who said she should not come again. Why? Said she, "It makes me faint." I wonder if she would faint if an absent and only loved daughter, who had been far and long absent, should propose to come home. Such love for Christ must blush and quake when Jesus comes. Come, Lord Jesus, and come quickly, is the burning desire of every heart sanctified by the grace of God.

L. R. Alderman of Toledo, Ohio, a book agent, who has been listening to me and reading on these great questions, has become a convert to the faith. Is now making all arrangements to go out and publish it to the world. He is an amiable man, possessing a good heart and an intelligent mind, and must do good. May the Lord who is calling him into his vineyard to labor endow him with all those heavenly graces that will make him a brilliant star in the church of Christ. Bro. Emerson Hasty will yet herald forth the proclamation of a soon-coming Savior. He is a good scholar, a devoted christian, standing aloof from all creeds and sects with his two amiable christian brothers, taking the Bible alone as their criterion, who are deeply interested in the investigation of all Bible truth. Three more lovely young christian gentlemen I never saw before in one family.

Praise the Lord, oh my soul, for the success attending a faithful presentation of the gospel proclamation by so feeble an instrumentality. Praise the Lord for ever and ever. Your Bro. looking for Jesus, A. N. Seymour.

Delta, O., Mar. 2nd, 1866.

From Bro. P. B. Manning.

Bro. Grant:—I am still in this wicked world. My health is the same as it was when I last wrote to you; and I wish to say to all of the dear children of the Lord, that I believe in faith, and that "the prayer of faith shall save the sick," and if they "have committed sins, they shall be forgiven him." Now, then, my dear brethren and sisters in Jesus Christ, don't forget me in your prayers, when you are in your closet. God has heard your prayers in days that are past and gone in my behalf, and raised me up, for which I do feel to praise his holy name.

O how I do long to be out among the dear brethren, to stir up their pure minds by way of remembrance, and try to help save some poor souls from perdition, the Lord helping me by the Holy Spirit. Truly, we are in the last days of this world's history; and O how glad I am that we are so near to the end of our pilgrimage to a better land. Brethren and sisters, cheer up, cheer up; the day breaks o'er thee; soon, if faithful to God, we shall see our blessed Lord coming down the pathway from glory to this earth again, to take his dear children home to himself. O, glory be to God for the blessed promises that are found in his word; but all these promises are on condition, if we live right, and do right, and watch and pray without ceasing, and in every thing give thanks to God; then it will be well with us here in this world, and in the world to come.

While I read in the papers the letters from the dear children of the Lord, it does rejoice my poor heart, and I can say to God be all the glory, for what he is doing in New Bedford, and in Boston; and for what he is doing in New Hampshire, in Woodstock, and other places; and my prayer is, Lord let the work go on, and begin it where thou hast not begun it. O my brethren, wake up to the work anew; time is short, and what is done must be done quickly. The Judge stands at the door.

Your brother, looking for the Lord soon to come and save all of his people,

Goffstown, N. H. B. P. Manning.

From Bro. J. S. Hinds.

Bro. Grant:—It has been a long time since I have written any thing for the Crisis, or "Voice of the West." It is now about one year since I first saw the "World's Crisis," and began to receive the light, and come to the knowledge of the truth as it is recorded in the Bible. The light and knowledge of the truth have been increasing ever since. I have not seen a Second Advent preacher since I left Camp Wilbraham; but I thank the Lord that I have had the "Crisis," and the "Voice of the West," ever since I got home. I need not say any thing in their praise, for it seems to me that any Christian that will read them must love them.

Those tracts that I received were a great help. Many of the tracts have been sent to friends at a distance, and also some of my papers to my friends that are scattered abroad in every direction, especially those who have had their letters published in the "Crisis" and "Voice." You may truly imagine that I have been made happy, and edified, and very much strengthened, by reading your letters. Then we have very often a good sermon. O how good that is to us where no one of our belief is to speak to us. Brethren and sisters, pray for me, that I may discharge my duty, whatever it may be. My heart's desire and prayer to God is that those that bear the name of Christian may depart from all unrighteousness.

Although I have but little of the things of this world, yet I feel rich sometimes, when by faith I view the promised land, the saints' inheritance in paradise. Praise the Lord. It was thirty-four years last August since I threw down my weapons against God, and sought pardon through the atonement. I have had a great many happy seasons when meeting with christians of different denominations, as I always loved all christians, and do to this day; but I cannot love error or false doctrine. Sometimes I really hate myself, when I think how long and strongly I held to the never-ending misery of the wicked. Well, I am glad to learn, by the Crisis and some other ways, that this awful doctrine is growing weak.
